In the making of mirrors a large stone table, which can be inclined by means of a screw underneath it, is used. Around the edge of this table there is a groove, which allows the superfluous mercury to run off into a receptacle at one end. While the surface of the table is perfectly level tin foil is carefully laid all over it. A strip of glass is then placed on each of three sides of the foil and the molten quicksilver is poured from ladles upon the foil until nearly a quarter of an inch deep, the affinity of the mercury for the tin foil and the obstruction of the glass keeping it from flowing off. The plate of glass for the mirror, which has been cleansed with especial care, is now dexterously slid upon the molten metal in the open side—that is, the side on which no glass slip had been placed. When exactly in its place it is held till one edge of the table has been raised by the screw and the superfluous mercury has run off. The table is then tilted back to a level, heavy weights are placed on the glass and it is left thus for several hours. It is then turned over and put in a frame, the side covered with amalgam—that is, tin foil and mercury—placed uppermost. In this position the amalgam becomes hard enough to allow the glass to be set on edge, but it must stand for several weeks to be thoroughly hardened. There are other methods of manufacturing mirrors, but the finest are still made by the method described, which was invented by the Venetians in the sixteenth century.

The chimney has the effect of brightening the light of a lamp because it increases the supply of oxygen to the flame by producing a draft, and concentrates and reflects the heat of the flame, in consequence of which the combustion of the carbon is more perfect, and very little escapes unconsumed. Lamp glasses were invented by Aime Argand, the inventor of the famous lamp and gas burner which bear his name. He had been experimenting for some time in trying to increase the light, but to no purpose. On the table before him lay the broken neck of an oil flask. This he took up earnestly and placed it, almost without thought, over the wick. A brilliant flame was the result, and the hint was not lost upon the experimentalist, who proceeded to put his discovery into practical operation at once.

THE PASTEUR GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a
PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

H. WACHHORST

Leading Jeweler of Sacramento

SIGN OF THE TOWN CLOCK,

No. 315 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

J. R. HODSON, THE LEADING PHOTOGRAPHER IN AMERICA

Studio, 521 J Street.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co. FRED. SCHNEIDER

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST.

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,
WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS
AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

Telephone No. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS.

J. H. DOLAN

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES,

Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,

SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

Telephone 248.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

RAILROAD TIME TABLE.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

June 7, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6:30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11 15 A
3:05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8 40 P
12:50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4 20 A
4:30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7 00 P
7:00 P	Knights Landing and Marysville	7 25 A
10:50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9 35 A
12:05 P	Second Class, Ogden and East	2 25 A
11:00 P	Central Atlantic Express	8 15 A
3:00 P	Ogden and East	10 30 A
3:00 P	Oroville	10 30 A
3:00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	4 00 P
10:40 A	Redding via Willows	11 40 A
2:50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12 35 A
4:35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11 15 A
6:30 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10 40 P
8:40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	8 40 P
3:05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	2 50 P
*10:00 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2 50 P
10:50 A	San Jose	9 35 A
4:30 P	Santa Barbara	11 40 A
6:15 A	Santa Rosa	8 40 P
3:05 P	Santa Rosa	7 00 P
8:50 A	Stockton and Galt	9 35 A
4:30 P	Stockton and Galt	2 25 A
12:05 P	Truckee and Reno	8 15 A
11:00 P	Truckee and Reno	2 30 P
6:30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	11 40 A
6:15 A	Vallejo	11 40 A
3:05 P	Vallejo	2 40 P
*6:35 A	Folsom and Placerville	*11 35 A
*3:10 P	Folsom and Placerville

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

Draws Exchange on all the Principal Cities
of the World.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

CAPITAL STOCK PAID UP - - - $225,500 00
RESERVE AND SURPLUS, - - - 54,253 26

Term and Ordinary Deposits Received.

Dividends Paid Semi-annually.

Money Loaned on Real Estate Only.

WM. BECKMAN, President.

GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier.

Edwin K. Alsip & Co.

ESTABLISHED 1860.

REAL ESTATE

AND INSURANCE AGENTS.

FARMING LANDS A SPECIALTY.

Catalogues issued monthly.

No. 1015 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

R. A. OLMSTED.

S. P. OLMSTED.

Fourth Street Cash Grocery.

R. A. OLMSTED & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

Fruits and Vegetables, Provisions, Flour, Hay, Grain,
and all kinds of Mill Stuffs.

Wines, Liquors, Cigars and Tobaccos.

400 L Street, S. E. cor. Fourth, Sacramento.

Fresh Butter and Eggs a Specialty. Goods delivered free of charge to any part of the City. R. R. depot or Steamboat landing. Highest price paid for Country Produce.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHREIER,

TWENTY-THIRD STREET, BET. Q AND R,

CEMENT SIDEWALKS,

Garden Walks, Carriage Drives, Etc., constructed at shortest notice, in the most workman-like manner and at lowest rates.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET.

SACRAMENTO.

THE EMERSON

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1891.

No. 19.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & CO. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

It is difficult to conjecture the feelings and emotions of men who lived before our day, when they beheld that they had thought did not exist. In 1519 a general of Spain, of the name of Hernando Cortes, projected the conquest of Mexico, and with a small army penetrated and subjugated a country theretofore unknown to the then assumed civilized world. Largely was his success due to the treachery of those who should have maintained the liberties of their own people. To such can be attributed the responsibility for the trail of blood that followed the army of the Spanish general in the march from the sea to the capital of the Montezumas. That there did exist in the interior a magnificent city; that it was the repository of the wealth of ages; that it was inhabited by a refined and cultivated people, was but hearsay to the adventurous Spaniard. It is not possible to believe he anticipated that which he beheld when he crossed the mountains and looked into the valley below—the City of Mexico, the capital of the Aztec people; verily, the Venice of the new world. It was a city larger than the Mexico of to-day. It had its magnificent palaces and temples; its perfect water supply; its admirable system of sewerage. Possible is it, Cortes could believe the reality of that he saw before him? Arriving in the city, he found it had no bonded indebtedness; in that early day cranks had not been created, and newspapers were not published; such a thing as public meetings to consume time without the accomplishment of good was unheard of; the question of high license and early closing was not agitated. The people had but one disadvantage—their ruler, Montezuma, was of weak and vacillating nature. Other cities and peoples have labored under the same disadvantage. That Montezuma met the fate he did—that he was killed by his own people—is regrettable in one sense, in that there were many good qualities about the man. He was, however, as Cæsar, one who weakened when he should have acted with determination.

In some respects Sacramento compares with the then existing Aztec capital; in others there is variance. Had Cortes lived in our day and reached here it is not likely he would have wasted time in our capture. With our disadvantages there are, however, pegs on which hope may be hanged. Death may benefit us when it carries away a few of our population who are of little use to themselves and none whatever to a progressive and enterprising people. Death, however, seems to be neglecting his duty. So far as the mass of the people are concerned, there can be no adverse criticism. They pay the oppressive burdens without murmur. Within the last two years thousands of dollars have been willingly paid for the improvement of our streets, the construction of modern sidewalks and the remodeling of awnings. There is a disposition that this good work shall proceed, and that it shall extend to the perfection of our levee and sewerage systems. We very much esteem, as doubtless the people do, the rigid policy that has been pursued by Trustee McLaughlin. The military style he has adopted has perhaps gained him the enmity of the antiquated; it is, however, deeply appreciated by those who realize they are living in the nineteenth century. There are, of course, those who believe it impolitic to make a city attractive and habitable, lest it may attract people from abroad who will bring their money and subject us to business competition; others there are who invite spirited competition, and who do not look with reproach upon a new manufacturing establishment, and who are disposed to commend rather than condemn Edison that he has made inventions that enable us to save shoe leather by talking through a telephone, and ride to our homes on a car driven by electrical power. The inventions of Edison have been surprising; there have, however, been surprises in all ages. Will it be time will come a Sacramento crank will call the attention of the world to the fact that, if Edison continues this thing, steam and horses will be of the past?

The situation here is anomalous. There is a cry for political reform, yet the base and the purity elements combine, and men that should be elected to office are not. We waste much wind and printing ink in inviting manufacturers; they, however, do not come here for prudential reasons. When the proposition is made to combat the payment of an unjust and oppressive municipal debt, our leading citizens fight it without investigation. The assurance that this stone shall be taken from our shoulders by a certain time has been given out since very many of us were in infancy. We have not the curiosity generally attributed to a woman (perhaps unjustly), but in view of the history of our financial management, we would much like to know the basis upon which the following paragraph, that has been kept standing in a daily contemporary, is founded:

Indisputable figures made by Judge Beatty show that Sacramento's funded debt will be paid—every dollar of it, principal and interest, wiped out—in less than seven years. There are few cities in the world with prospects so good as those of Sacramento from a financial point of view. Prosperity stares us in the face.

We have given the subject of the mismanagement of the bonded indebtedness considerable investigation; expressions of the street gamins by words not in Webster, at times convey in a syllable much to the mind, to instance: "rats."

We have spoken concerning Montezuma and his downfall; it was but incidental. Reference have we also made to Cæsar—great as a warrior, but a failure in the administration of civil affairs. That Cæsar realized his incapacity would seem apparent from the fact he invited his death, after having been warned by a soothsayer, and when assailed by Brutus and the others made no resistance, but resignedly threw his toga over his head and received his quietus. Brutus it would seem had much political influence, and it would appear had a larger following than had Cæsar, of the rank and file. We opine had McLaughlin been Montezuma, Cortes would have encountered trouble; had he been Cæsar the toga would have been upon the ground, Brutus would have had an interesting time, and the words of reproach "Et tu Brute" would not have been uttered. Much has been written concerning the decline and fall of the Roman empire; it is rather difficult of explanation; perhaps it may be accounted for that some of its official heads were without backbone, that the influence of the ward politician was potential, that the empire fell into the clutches of bondholders, that too many public meetings were held, and that a ridiculous attempt was made to deceive the Carthaginians and other outsiders as to its manufacturing and commercial advantages. We can readily understand if the Romans made these blunders their empire would come to the end it did. If they shouted themselves hoarse in encouragement when a proposition was made to establish an extensive brewery in their city, and before it became fairly under way curtailed its trade, we can understand they stood to their neighbors as does Sacramento to our little thriving neighbor, Stockton.

We are aware with some the course of this journal is severely criticised that it speaks the truth. Not in apology we say that course will be continued. The fact that the streets of this city were impassable in winter in very recent years was manifest. To attempt to conceal it would have been farcical; that the subject was discussed has resulted in very decided improvement. True, it was at cost, but who now feels it? It cannot be gainsaid the appearance of our business buildings is more sightly of late. More must be done. While attention has been given to our levees, much more is needed. While we boast we have a healthy city, we should recollect our death rate had been calculated upon an exaggerated population, and no account was taken of the money we paid for medical attendance and for medicines. Our sewerage system has needed "immediate" attention for years. In December, 1882, a public meeting was held at the Court-house, and the question of the disposition of the sewage elaborately discussed; the same ground was gone over as now; history does repeat itself. Much was said in the press, elaborate data collated, a committee was appointed; their report was never made, and the matter was dropped. This time we hope it will be otherwise.

Human reason has so developed that it can stand on tip-toe and look over the hill of superstition and tradition. We are too intelligent to look to dark and musty scrolls for divine inspiration, or any inspiration. Some of our most prominent evangelists, with advanced ideas, are discarding the traditions that surrounded their early training in religion. They now take broad views, and cease to adhere to the solemn demeanor during their Sunday lectures. They are more in accord with what was intended by a wise Providence. This notion of taking a text from some practical event, and talking reason and common sense to their congregations, is greatly in advance of the old Bible texts with meaningless dissertations thereon, worn threadbare centuries ago. The preacher must be up with the times in order to be appreciated by the thinking public. We have one or two of this class in our city.

That restrictions upon the use of tobacco by the immature youth of this country should be laid there can be no doubt. Boys barely out of their swaddling clothes are to be met with upon the streets of any of our cities puffing away at a cigarette stump, in most cases secured from the gutter. King John of Abyssinia decreed that the nose of any one of his subjects found taking snuff shall be cut off, while smoking and chewing tobacco forfeits life. In Morocco, persons disobeying the Sultan's decree of prohibition of smoking are imprisoned and flogged through the streets. In Massachusetts there used to be very stringent laws against the use of tobacco, and both there and in Illinois it is now illegal to sell or give tobacco to minors under 16 years of age. About the seventeenth century tobacco was prohibited in many countries. The Popes, Urban VIII and Innocent XI, fulminated against it in all the thunders of the church, and smoking was stigmatized by the sultans and priests of Turkey as a crime, punishable, in many instances, by the most barbarous of deaths. In Persia, too, smokers were treated as criminals, and in Russia, toward the early part of the seventeenth century, their noses were cut off. King James, of England, in his "Counterblaste to Tobacco," described smoking as "a custom loathsome to the eye, hateful to the nose, harmful to the brain, dangerous to the lungs, and the black, stinking fume thereof, resembling the horrible stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless."

The matter of compulsory education, which figured so prominently in the late political campaign in the northwest, is by no means a new scheme. In Sparta every boy, from his birth, was treated as the child of the state, and the education of the young was under the special care of a public officer appointed for the purpose. This education, however, had only one end in view, that of training the citizens to serve and defend their country, and the discipline was in every respect subservient to this object. According to Xenophon, the ancient Persians removed education from the hands of the parents into the hands of the state, giving the same attention to the moral training of the young as is now given to their intellectual instruction. Turning to modern nations, in the year 1524 Luther drew up a scheme of education to be laid before the Elector of Saxony, and it was not long before he saw his views with regard to compulsory education adopted throughout the whole of Germany. Melancthon was Luther's fellow laborer in this field, and in the second half of the sixteenth century Wurtemberg and Saxony adopted and promulgated school regulations based on the precepts of the two reformers. Frederick the Great of Prussia, by his general school regulation issued in 1793, enforced compulsory attendance. In 1695 Louis XIV of France obliged Protestant children to attend school.

The friends of the Prince of Wales were very anxious to protect his reputation by pledging themselves to secrecy respecting the baccarat scandal, but human nature was too powerful for them. A bit of gossip like the baronet's alleged dishonest play with the prince for banker was certain to be carried all over London in course of a week. Instead of forcing the baronet to sign a promise to abstain from card-playing, the prince would have done better if he had exposed the dishonest player and then dropped the game himself. His example would have been worth much and his own reputation in social England would have been greatly strengthened. There is an old tradition that a prince's popularity in England is largely dependent upon his vices. In order to accept that tradition it is necessary to blot out the record of the Victorian reign, conspicuous for the virtues of the Queen.

How the Crab Sheds His Shell.

With the beginning of June an industry springs up which gives employment to more men along the shores of New Jersey and Long Island than is generally known. Signs of its awakening are now to be seen in the fish markets, in the shape of flat, seaweed-lined trays full of wicked-looking crabs, and signs with the alluring invitation to buy "Shedder crabs for bait, $1 per dozen." About this time in southern waters, and a little later in the bays around the city, the ordinary murderous blue crab feels a gentle melancholy stealing over his spirit. He sulks and hides himself under grassy banks, and if caught, it will be found that the shell at the sharp ends is slightly soft and yields to the touch. He is, however, still very, very hard around the shears and willing and anxious to prove it. In this condition he is known by fishermen as a "comer," and is often kept in great flat fish-cars in a tideway, for, though not yet valuable, great possibilities are contained in his wicked, lively body.

After a few tides have flowed over him he becomes the thing that draws dollars from salt-water fishermen during the season—a shedder crab, with wicked intentions but limited capabilities. The shell cracks along the joints and the body protrudes at the legs and claws. If the crab is now left in the water for another tide, he begins to undress himself, often rolling over on his back. Gradually he wiggles one leg out of the outgrown armor, then another, and so on in succession; the shell opens underneath his body, and after much struggling and tribulation a limp and helpless soft crab lies on the bottom, a prey to every fellow-inhabitant of salt water.

If, however, the crab is taken out of the water, the process of shedding is arrested at once, and the fisherman who buys him for bait peels the shell off the unfortunate creature whenever he is ready to use him. When a crab is thus ready for "peeling" he is called "ripe," and the process is probably not painful, as the shell adheres only slightly at a few points and may be lifted off the back almost in one piece. The "shedder" stage is the only one at which the crab can be used for bait. If he is used before getting "ripe," the skin will be found so thin and the flesh so soft that it will not adhere to the hook, while later on, when the crustacean becomes a "soft" crab, the meat is too flabby for bait. But then comes the epicure's chance, and a soft crab, done to a crisp, golden brown and served on toast, with just a dreamy hint remaining of the butter that has been spent on him, will leave behind him a memory to linger like a star through a dark life of dyspepsia.

If the crab escapes the fisherman and the resultant frying-pan, a tough leather skin forms over him, and he becomes a "leather-back." Then the new shell forms, and soon he emerges, gorgeous in a hard, new shell, red, white and blue, to take up again his warfare against every other living thing, including his own relatives and the bare feet of the small boy who "treads" for clams.

"Genesis Fifty-One."

For the past 500 or 600 years the following so-called "Genesis fifty-one" has been a puzzle to biblical scholars; and to-day, were it read aloud in any mixed company, it is questionable if its fraudulent nature would be discovered, so beautiful is the spirit and language of the Old Testament imitated. Below we give this unique fraud in full:

1. And it came to pass after these things that Abraham sat in the door of his tent at about the going down of the sun.
2. And behold a man, bowed with age, came from the way of the wilderness, leaning on a staff.
3. And Abraham arose and met him and said unto him, Turn in, I pray thee, and wash thy feet, and tarry all night, and thou shalt arise early on the morrow and go thy way.
4. But the man said Nay, for I will abide under this tree.
5. And Abraham pressed him greatly, so he turned and they went into the tent; and Abraham broke unleavened bread, and they did eat.
6. And when Abraham saw that the man blessed not God, he said unto him, wherefore dost thou not worship the Most High God, creator of heaven and earth?
7. And the man answered and said, I do not worship the God thou speakest of, neither do I call upon His name, for I have made to myself a God which abideth always in my house and provideth me with all things.
8. And Abraham's anger was kindled against that man for what he had said, and he arose and drove him forth with blows into the wilderness.
9. And at midnight God called upon Abraham, saying, Abraham, where is the stranger that came by the way of thy tent at the going down of the sun.
10. And Abraham answered and said, Lord, he would not worship Thee, neither would he call upon Thy name, therefore I have driven him out from before my face into the wilderness.
11. And God said, Have I not borne with him these hundred and ninety and eight years, and nourished him, and clothed him, notwithstanding he has rebelled against Me? Couldst thou not, thee thyself being a sinner, bear with him one night?
12. And Abraham said, Let not the anger of my Lord wax against his servant; lo! I have sinned, forgive me, I pray of Thee.
13. And Abraham arose and went forth into the wilderness and sought diligently for the man until he had found him and returned with him to the tent, and when he had entertained him kindly he sent him away on the morrow with many gifts.
14. And God spake again unto Abraham, saying, for this thy sin against the stranger, thy seed shall be afflicted four hundred years in a strange land.
15. But, for thy repentance, will I deliver them, and they shall come forth with power and with gladness of heart.

The author of this pseudo-biblical curiosity is unknown. It has been traced back over 700 years to a Persian poet, who simply says "it was so related to me."

"Once upon a time," said Marshall P. Wilder to a group of interested Englishmen in his hotel in New York the other day, "a little nigger sat at a table pounding his thumb nail with a hammer," and the famous story-teller screwed his face into comical grimaces expressive of recurring pain, while his hands went through the motions suggested by the story. "Presently," he continued, "a man asked him what he was doing that for. 'Cause,' whimpered the nigger, 'it feels so good when I stop.'"

Senator Quay is a great reader of current literature, and nearly all the new books and magazines of value find their way to his table. At his modest house in Beaver he has a well-selected library in which he spends much of his time when political schemes are not claiming his attention. The gathering of seals is a hobby with him, and he has accumulated a choice collection of engraved gems.

Bones in One's Body.

(I.—BONES OF THE HEAD.)

In the head of an adult 22 we trace—
8 are in the cranium, 14 in the face;
1 frontal, 1 occipital, parietal bones 2,
2 temporal, 1 sphenoid, 1 ethmoid—that will do;
The facial bones are hard to name; the most in pairs you'll see,
Except the vomer—that is 1, and maxillary 3;
2 lachrymal, 2 palatal, 2 nasal bones between,
2 turbinated, malar 2—which just makes up 14.

(II.—BONES OF THE TRUNK.)

Spinal column 26; ribs 24;
Sternum, os hyoides—of each of them 1 more;
Ossa innominata 2; and now I hope you'll find
These 54 bones in the trunk are also in your mind!

(III.—THE UPPER EXTREMITIES.)

Clavicle or collar bone—this works like a charm!
Scapula, the shoulder blade, and humerus, the arm;
The ulna and the radius from elbow down to wrist,
And there the 8 small carpal bones must none of them be missed;
5 metacarpal bones are in the hand; and next are seen
The thumb and finger bones, which are phalanges, just 14.

(IV.—THE LOWER EXTREMITIES.)

The femur bone is in the thigh—the strongest bone of all;
Then the patella in the knee, triangular and small;
The tibia and fibula below the knee are found.
And then the 7 tarsal bones together tightly bound;
5 metatarsal form the foot; and then, within the toes,
14 phalanges will be found—
With these the list you close.

Poker at the National Capital.

A good many congressmen are credited with making considerable additions to their incomes by their skill in poker; in fact, there are some of whom it is said that poker produces their income, their salaries providing merely their stakes in the game. There is no more sure source of profit than skill in this noble pastime, which is susceptible of a higher scientific development than any other form of play, notwithstanding the fact that the ignorant and fatuous imagine it to be all chance. Henry Clay's wife was once asked if it did not afflict her very much to have her husband gamble at cards. "Not at all," she replied. "He nearly always wins." Poker is a statesmanlike game. Nevertheless, those who are eminent in the councils of the nation, and who indulge a fondness for the sport usually keep it very dark, fearing a prejudice on the part of the pious element among their constituents against this innocent, but much abused amusement. Many tales are told of a method adopted by lobbyists of conveying bribes by intentionally losing money at the game to senators and representatives. Even when the legislator whose honesty is thus assailed has no notion of accepting money for his vote, he cannot help feeling under a sort of chivalric obligation to a man whose cash he has won.

Vest is considered the best poker player in the Senate—a regular robber, in fact. He nearly always wins. If he did not he couldn't afford to play, being one of the poor members of the upper house. A while ago he was at Hot Springs, Ark., with Senator Kenna. Society there was a little mixed, and so it happened that a very gentlemanly gambler from St. Louis made a third with them in a little game of draw. It was perfectly fair, but Vest lost all the money he had, borrowed more, and saw it disappear, and finally had to give two or three notes of hand to square himself before dropping out. Thereupon, he leaned back on his chair, fanning himself and enjoying the sport as a spectator. Presently the St. Louis gambler, between the hands, began making some complimentary remarks upon a very beautiful and elaborate shirt which Vest had on. He took the liberty of feeling the texture of the garment, and, after ascertaining how much it had cost, remarked that he would like to own just such a one himself.

"Gentlemen," said Vest, rising from his chair with an air of seriousness, "I will bid you good night. You may rob me of all the money I have and all I can borrow, but I'm d—d if you can get my shirt!"

One night there was a little game in Mahone's room at Chamberlin's, and it chanced that a certain ex-member of President Arthur's cabinet, distinguished for his youthful appearance, walked in. There was a very interesting jack-pot in progress at the moment, and the host merely looked up to nod and indicate a whisky bottle on the corner of the mantelpiece. The newcomer poured out a dose into a glass, and, as is his wont, he took a small sip of the liquor to try its quality before swallowing the drink, and spat it out into the open fire. One of the players, with whom he was not acquainted, looked up at the moment from his cards, and, not having seen him take the whisky, seeing the expectorated liquid flame up from the coals, cried in astonishment: "For God's sake, young man, if your spit's as bad as that, the sooner you quit drinking the better!"

Susie—Oh! mamma, I'll never disobey you again, Mamma—Why, Susie, what have you done? Susie—Well, I drank my milk at lunch, and then I ate a pickle; and the pickle said to the milk, "Get out," and the milk said, "I won't," and they are having an awful time.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

One costume worn by the late Emma Abbott weighed 150 pounds. The mantle alone pulled the scale at 75 pounds.

Both of Henry Irving's sons have definitely decided to go upon the stage. The younger, Lawrence, had originally intended to enter the diplomatic service.

Ellen Terry played for several years under the management of Charles Reade, whom she characterizes in one sentence as "dear, lovable, aggravating, childlike, crafty, gentle, obstinate, and entirely delightful and interesting." During the progress of a play Mr. Reade would sit and watch her, and between acts send her little notes pointing out what he deemed the defects and merits of her work.

Miss Kate Vaughan, who was an English variety actress and is now the prospective duchess of Wellington, has met with an accident which will not only result in her having to undergo a serious operation, but will deprive the public of the opportunity of again seeing the most graceful dancer England ever produced. She originated the fashion of long-skirt dancing, which has since become so popular.

There will be some tears of regret over the death of that one time genial and lovable actor, J. K. Emmett, but not to the extent that would have been aroused some years ago. Once without a peer in his sweet, wholesome specialties, through his uncontrollable appetite for liquor he lost friends and opportunities, so that death brings fewer regrets, as it seemed the natural end of his chosen course. No talent or training, no graces of mind or character can survive the fatal habit of drunkenness. It dominates and finally obliterates all that is highest and best and most lovable in man's nature; it substitutes the rue for the laurel wreath, and changes loving memory into bitter regret.

Amleth, as it was formerly written, was a Prince of Jutland. Mediæval writers, however, differ as to the exact century in which he lived. The best authority on this subject, perhaps, is Saxo Grammaticus, the Danish historian, according to whom Amleth lived about 200 B. C. He was a son of Horvendii, himself a Prince of Jutland, and Gerutha, a daughter of the King of what is now Denmark. Amleth's father was murdered by his own brother, Fanzo, who soon married the wife of his victim. Amleth would have been murdered by his uncle at the time of Horvendii's death at his brother's hand, but for the fact that he feigned madness. Soon after his mother's marriage Amleth killed his father's murderer. Various stories are told concerning the final end of Amleth, none of which are authentic, according to modern investigators. A French "History of Hamlet" was circulated in England about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and is supposed to be the foundation of the famous Shakspearean play.

What makes a woman late at a theater? asks the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette. Is it that the hour between dinner and departure is not enough in which to array herself in the implements of war? Is it that in the wild delight of dressing she has taken no note of the lapse of time? Is it that the man who is to have the glory and honor of her company for the evening is so little alive to the good fortune that awaits him that he is late in presenting himself? Is it that she is pretty, and knows it, and wants the world to see her beauty? Is it that she has purposely prolonged the journey from home theaterward that thereby she may play the more on masculine susceptibilities? Is it that she may exhibit the better to the multitude assembled her new dress, her bonnet, her charm of manner, and so enjoy the more her hour of triumph? Is it to show that Emerson was right when he said that next to the consolations of religion there was no comfort under heaven like that of a well fitting gown? Is it to excite to jealous wrath and great confusion the admirer who sent no invitation! Is it to shoot an arrow into the heart of a stranger, or to excite an access of admiration in the soul of a friend? Is it to make the him, the chosen one of the evening, the envy of his acquaintances? Is it to disturb those already in their seats and prove the power of the sex by turning to their scowls of annoyance the brightness of her smile? Is it to win by native grace, modesty, and charm the attention of a crowded house from the play, from the actors on the stage? Is it to rustle into a seat, and thus afford the house an opportunity to exercise the divine virtue of polite forgiveness? Is it that she thinks that late coming is a womanly prerogative as is the going out between the acts the prerogative of men? Is it that she thinks she can crave and win pardon by the fascination of her grace? Or is it that she is careless of the comfort and convenience and wishes of the house, indifferent to its mute but intelligible protest, regardless of its rights and her obligations? Who can tell what motive inspires the woman that is late? Or is it all, and always, an accident—an accident that she regrets as much as the audience?

Book Chat.

It is said that English printers and publishers are to inaugurate a crusade against the copyright of American books. The English think that the new and equitable copyright law is all copy wrong.

Joel Chandler Harris' wife is the author's best assistant. She looks over his manuscripts before they go out, often advises upon them, and keeps a scrap-book filled with press notices of her husband's published writings.

Bill Arp, the Georgia humorist, whose jokes have aroused appreciative smiles north of Mason and Dixon's line, is sixty years old and the father of nine children. He may properly be styled the father of American humor, for he has entertained two generations of newspaper readers and is still at it.

"Pierre Loti," the new French immortal, is not the effeminate epicurean one might expect from his writings. A Paris letter describes him as short, squat and burly, turned 40, and looking the bluff, hearty tar that he is. He is not a society man, and is guilty of wearing his naval uniform at dinner and evening parties.

At Plymouth, Mass., there will begin July 1 a summer session of ethical students and workers, to be known as the "School of Applied Ethics." The session is to last six weeks, and embraces courses of lectures by some of the most prominent lecturers on ethical topics. Its value to teachers and educators generally cannot be doubted.

The book by Annie T. Sloss on "Seven Dreamers," is one of the weirdest, uncanniest books ever conceived by human fancy. It is a collection of New England stories wherein the spirit of the early forefathers of the pilgrims seems to have entered into flesh and tongue of a later day. Things occur for which no explanation can be or is attempted to be given, and throughout the narrative one seems to be treading the silent, mysterious boundaries of another life, of which only a hazy conception is formed.

Rubinstein, in his new and yet unfinished book, "Music and Musicians," will take the ground that Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz were not reformers, but placed obstacles in the way of progress in the tone-art. Of himself, the Russian says: "I am one of the have-beens" (Je suis un de ceux qui ont été). This latter statement leads the Paris correspondent of the London News to remark that this composer has always disparaged his own work. Nearly twenty years ago, when asked by a friend what he had been doing during the summer, he tersely replied: "Spoiling music-paper."

Professional Chat.

A distinguished eastern divine recently remarked that "the heresy of to day may become the orthodoxy of to-morrow." If this is true, to-morrow has the promise of more than the usual quantity of orthodoxy.

Judge Patterson of the Supreme Court of New York has just handed down an important decision, in which he holds that an illegitimate child can inherit its mother's property, regardless of a will executed before its birth and admitted to probate.

The important problem whether the justices of the new United States Appellate-Court shall or shall not wear robes is now disturbing the minds of lawyers. This is nearly as important as the mooted question in professional ethics as to whether a judge should apply to the prosecuting or the defending counsel in a case for a fresh quid of tobacco.

Abraham Lincoln wrote to a friend: Do not worry. Eat three square meals a day. Say your prayers. Think of your wife. Be courteous to your creditors. Keep your digestion good. Steer clear of billiousness. Exercise. Go slow and go easy. Maybe there are other reasons that your especial case requires to make you happy, but, my friend, these, I reckon, will give you a good lift.

Some years ago a gentleman who was elected to a judgeship was waited upon by his friends and presented with an immense floral design, the centrepiece of which was the scales of justice, made of artificial blue flowers. When the natural flowers had faded and died, the Judge removed the artificial scales and placed them on top of his library, with a solemn warning that it should be carefully preserved. The other day his servant girl, weary of well-doing, quit and disappeared from the house, taking the artificial scales with her. "Well, I'll be darned," said the Judge, when he came home that evening. "I've heard of people stealing things, but that woman's got an eye for the beautiful. Wish I could catch her, just the same. I'd weigh her with those scales."

A young medical student from the South attending lectures in New York, tells in a New Orleans paper how he cured a patient who was suffering with a curious ailment. The patient was an old nero, who for many weeks had been gradually wasting away from no apparent cause. When questioned by his family as to the nature of his trouble, the old fellow would sadly shake his head and beg them not to press the question. The young student noticed the old man's emaciated condition one day, and, becoming interested in the matter, made it his business to find out what the ailment was. It was a difficult job to extort any information from the aged patient, but finally he broke down and confessed that he had been bewitched and had a lizard in his arm. The student gravely assured the negro that taking reptiles from bewitched people was his specialty, and that he had stocked several menageries in that way. He finally succeeded in gaining the patient's confidence, and dismissed him with a supply of bread pills and instructions to call the following week. When the negro put in his appearance the next time the student had a dead lizard in readiness and convinced his patient that it was the identical one that formerly abided in his arm. He straightway began to improve, and is now vigorous and hearty.

An attorney who has won a "clothes line" suit for a New England farmer is forever after the idol of that household. He is affectionately spoken of by his first name as though he were a near and dear relative, and if he comes within a dozen miles of the home of his client he is compelled to make "a visit" and stay over night. When Senator Edmunds was a young man working for a practice in Burlington, Vt., he was called to one of the lake towns south of that place, to prosecute an aggravated case of gravel stealing. It seems that one farmer, who dwelt upon the shore of Lake Champlain, was in the habit of driving his team down to the beach, just across his "line," and shoveling blue gravel from his neighbor's ground. The neighbor stood the stealing as long as possible, remonstrating to no effect, and at last brought suit for recovery. Edmunds walked into the rural court-room, thundered a little law at the opposing attorney, a little flattery at the Judge, and a mixture of flattery and common sense at the jury, and won the case with a verdict of $1 damages and costs. Though the prosecuting farmer had sued for $5,000, he was overjoyed at the result, insisted on keeping Edmunds three days at his house, and sent him home with several barrels of his best apples, a keg of good cider, and his fee—$100. Always after that Edmunds was spoken of as "George" by the farmer and all his family, and when he afterward rose to a position of prominence in the nation the old law-invoking granger never wearied of telling how he got the start—"Right here in this here court, again Tom Hill an' all his la'yars!"

Any one that had closely followed the evidence in the case of Sir William Gordon Cumming, without any prepossession or prejudice, would scarcely have been prepared for the dramatic conclusion of that famous trial. The hissing that followed the verdict, the withdrawal of the victorious defendants with bowed heads, amid the execrations of the populace, and the ovation accorded to the defeated plaintiff, all appear so utterly illogical and absurd that some explanation appears to be in order. This was simply a suit for slander. Col. Cumming had been charged with cheating at cards. He asserted that he did not cheat, and asked damages of those who preferred the accusation. It was a simple issue of fact, to be determined by the preponderance of the evidence. There were five witnesses to one against the plaintiff, not to mention the hall confession which he had signed. It is hard to see how any one could have expected him to win under the circumstances. Assuming that the substance of the evidence has been fairly given in the cable report, we must all admit that any other verdict would have been flagrantly against the weight of evidence. Why, then, did the spectators hiss? Simply because they were trying cases altogether different from that submitted to the jury. The jury had merely to answer a very plain question: Does the preponderance of the evidence show that Sir William Gordon Cumming cheated at cards? Naturally, we may say inevitably, they said yes. Among the spectators there were various self-constituted juries. There was a jury of a part of the nobility. The question which they had to try was, Shall we have to cut Sir William Gordon Cumming hereafter, because he beat the Prince of Wales out of 150 to 200 pounds, more or less? These called to mind that all the defendants were born plebeians, and the notion that a scion of the old nobility should be sacrificed for the sake of these people of ignoble descent was repulsive to them. They naturally hissed when told that they must give up a favorite for no better reason than the testimony of a coterie of parvenus that he had been caught cheating. On the other hand, there was a great host of the common people who imagined they were trying the Prince of Wales and the defendants for the sin of gambling. They were shocked at the story that the heir apparent was going around the kingdom with the implements of gaming in his possession. As the Prince had sided with the Wilsons, they desired that he should be rebuked by a verdict against defendants that had only told the truth. Their indignation against the Prince was not unnatural, but it was utterly absurd that this feeling should seek its gratification in a false verdict from the jury.

NOTES.

Mr. Hale, that extraordinary anti-tights man out in Minnesota, prints a card in which he is at great pains to deny the story that he is the laughing-stock of the State.

The lowest body of water on the globe is the Caspian sea; its level has been gradually lowering for centuries, and now it is eighty-five feet below the level of its neighbor, the Black sea.

Two French chemists have observed that concentrated lye so alters the structure of the jute fibre that it resembles wool, and can then be woven into tissues resembling woolen stuffs.

"Unless a man has a character that won't show dirt he had better keep out of politics." This is not the usual rule. Most men in politics have characters that show dirt easier than anything else.

The coins struck in the mints of the world last year were of less value than those coined in 1889. According to a statement just issued England coined the greatest quantity of gold and the United States the most silver.

The "friends" of "Everybody's" column and "Public Echoes" are getting in their deadly work on the reading public through the medium of the dailies. For the most elaborate exhibition of poverty of thought or ideas, commend us to this class of literature.

Contempt of fame is the contempt of virtue. Never consider that vanity an offence which limits itself to wishing for the praise of good men for good actions. "Next to our own esteem," says the best of the Roman philosophers, "it is a virtue to desire the esteem of others."

Agricola, the Roman general, was born 40 A. D. It was he who first circumnavigated Britain and discovered that it was an island. It was he who established the Roman dominion and extended it even beyond the Forth. Some of the forts and walls built by him are still in existence.

He who makes up his mind that he came into this world to do something, and then goes to work to do it, will be of service to mankind. He is the one who will make his mark among men. It may be an humble mark, but it will be well worth preserving. He will not be forgotten when his life is ended.

Americans are fond of pointing with pride to the cosmopolitan features of citizenship in this country, and it is seldom that they have to look far for illustrations. A Japanese student has just been chosen as commencement speaker of the Harvard Divinity school and a negro to be class orator at the University Law school in New York.

A young St. Paul physician claims to have made $300 vaccinating people since the smallpox scare broke out. He ran out of virus and had to use mucilage, but he eased his conscience by digging a little deeper and he actually believes he earned every fee he got. He set the fears of many people at rest, and that ought to be worth something.

The Evening News has commenced its second volume. During the six months of its existence it has shown a degree of enterprise most commendable. The paper has increased in size. Our neighbor shows conclusively that it is here "for keeps." The News is newsy, but a little given to boasting—but perhaps this is excusable under the circumstances.

Never, under any consideration, young woman, marry a man in hopes of reforming him. If the reformation does not come before marriage it certainly never would after marriage. Any young lady having such an act in mind should never think of doing so until her intended had saved up enough to provide a home, showing her he was earnest in this reformation.

No issue in politics ought to be accepted without it is based on right, and, if it is based on right, it ought not to be abandoned until the test has been made by trial whether right can prevail. Unfortunately, that is not the method in politics as they are constituted at present. The question is not so much what the good of the country requires as what will gain the party votes.

The people of Switzerland are said to be making elaborate preparations for celebrating the 600th anniversary of their rugged and sturdy little republic. And they are going to give the antiquarian busybodies to understand that they do not accept the alleged discovery that William Tell was a myth. Myth or no myth, they will still render homage to his memory.

Hon. E. G. Waite, Secretary of State of California, and Mayor Francis D. Clark, President of the New York Society of California Pioneers, were elected honorary members of "The New England Associated California Pioneers of '49," at the annual meeting of that society held at Boston, June 17th. These gentlemen are selected to fill the vacancies occasioned by the deaths of Generals John C. Fremont and Wm. T. Sherman.

Charles A. Dana finishes his day's work earlier than most New York editors, because the editorial system of the Sun is different from that of other newspapers. Most of the metropolitan dailies endeavor to give editorial expression and opinion on the news as it comes into the office. But Mr. Dana's plan is to give the news time to digest, as it were, and to comment upon it next day. All the editorials are revised by him in proof; and if he has a few moments to wait while an article is being put in type, he wheels around his chair and takes down a volume in some foreign language to study.

The six Reformed Presbyterian ministers who have just been expelled because they voted at civil elections, have at least the consciousness of knowing that their acts are more rational than the attitude of most of their associates. The strict Reformed Presbyterians declare that if God is not mentioned and honored in the laws they will not vote. If they were to set to work to change the laws and vote for officials who would advocate their peculiar views, they would have more public sympathy. If they will not make any attempt to change the laws to which they object, they cannot complain that the change is not accomplished.

Hiram Johnson is evidently a substantial branch of the parent tree. We are pleased at his recent success in the responsible undertaking of the defense in a murder case. The young man has proved himself equal to the emergency. He was forced into the trial without the aid of Hon. Grove L. Johnson, and with a tact and spirit which could not be excelled by his father's gained a signal triumph for himself and client. The young blood is very impulsive, and about the only advice necessary to our ardent young advocate is to place a careful restraint upon his temper and be slower to resentment. However, he comes honestly by his impulsive and fiery disposition—it runs in the family. We congratulate our young friend.

The Mardi Gras.

It is a settled fact that the Mardi Gras feature on the Fourth of July will be unusually successful. The parade will take place in the evening, and there will be many entirely new and novel features. The finance committee have met with marked success, and the business houses along the route of march have indicated the intention to illuminate.

A Story of De Brazza.

No one who has ever seen De Brazza on his travels, said Stecklebaum, "could fail to recognize that he was born to be an explorer. I shall never forget the time I met him far up the Kwi river. One day I came to a tribe that seldom saw white men. They were not very hospitable, but finally decided to sell me food. I got on rather friendly terms with them, and they allowed me to camp in the village. Suddenly I observed a commotion among the natives. A few carriers emerged from the forest, and with them was a slender, sad faced, poorly clad white man. He was the governor of the French Congo, and he was off on one of his long tramps. De Brazza approached the natives and asked them for food.

"No," they said gruffly, "you can't get any food here. We have one white man here already. You had better go on your way."

The explorer said nothing. He simply ordered his carriers to lay down their loads in the middle of the village. Then one of his men unpacked the astronomical and other instruments, and the explorer set about making observations for position and altitude. The strangest sight the natives ever saw was this white man studying his instruments and figuring away on a bit of paper. They concluded that he was not a person to be trifled with, and that his theodolite was a powerful fetish. Soon a crowd gathered around, but the explorer frightened them away by his gruff manner and impatient gestures.

"Get away from me. Clear out. Don't you see I'm busy? Let me alone!" he said.

At length he finished his work. Some natives had been cooking their evening meal near by. Their meat and vegetables which had been boiling in a pot were ready, and the group gathered around and began to eat. De Brazza arose, took a tin plate and large spoon, quietly walked up to the pot, helped himself liberally without saying a word to anybody, sat down by a tree, and regaled himself with native cookery. He knew just what effect his actions had produced upon the native mind, and just what to do. Then he told the villagers his men were hungry and must be fed. The natives gave them all they could eat, for who dare oppose a great medicine man who carried such a remarkable fetish as a theodolite? De Brazza slept in the village that night, and next morning he paid the natives well for what they had given him, and took his departure.—Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine.

"The Alta" the First Newspaper in California.

The following is a letter to the New York Tribune, and is appropriate to the mournful occasion:

In your issue of yesterday I notice an item stating that The Alta California, of San Francisco, was about to suspend publication. I am acquainted with some facts connected with the origin of that paper, and have some recollections of that time which I think may interest your readers. The paper was first issued in Monterey, under the title of The Californian, and was edited by my brother, the Rev. Walter Colton, chaplain in the United States navy. It was the first newspaper printed in California. In my brother's journal of "Three Years in California" he gives the following interesting account of its origin:

"Saturday, July 15, 1846.—To-day the first newspaper ever published in California made its appearance. The honor, if such it be, of writing its prospectus fell to me. It is to be issued every Saturday, and is published by Semple & Colton. Little did I think when relinquishing the editorship of The North American, in Philadelphia, that my next feat in this line would be off here in California. My partner is an emigrant from Kentucky, who stands six feet eight inches in his stockings. He is in a buckskin dress, a foxskin cap; is true with his rifle, ready with his pen, and quick at the type case.

"He created the materials of our office out of the chaos of a small concern which had been used by a Roman Catholic monk in printing a few sectarian tracts. The press was old enough to be preserved as a curiosity; the mice had burrowed in the balls; there were no rules, no leads, and the types were rusty and in pi. It was only by scouring that the letters could be made to show their faces. A sheet or two of tin was procured, and these, with a jack-knife, were cut into rules and leads. Luckily we found, with the press, the greater part of a keg of ink, and now came the main scratch for paper. None could be found except what is used to envelop the tobacco of the cigar smoked here by the natives. A coaster had a small supply of this on board, which we procured. It is in sheets a little larger than the common sized foolscap. And this is the size of our first paper, which we have christened The Californian.

"Though small in dimensions, our first number is as full of news as a black walnut is of meat. We have received by couriers during the week intelligence from all the important military posts through the territory. Very little of this has transpired. It reaches the public for the first time through our sheet. We have, also, the declaration of war between the United States and Mexico, with an abstract of the debate in the Senate. A crowd was waiting when the first sheet was thrown from the press. It produced quite a little sensation. Never was a bank run upon harder, not, however, by people with paper to get specie, but exactly the reverse. One-half the paper is in English, the other in Spanish. The subscription for a year is $5; the price for a single sheet is 12½ cents, and is considered cheap at that."

It will be remembered that, in anticipation of the war with Mexico, the Government sent a squadron of war vessels and took possession of California. Commodore Stockton commanded the squadron. My brother was sent as chaplain. On arriving at Monterey, the commodore appointed him chief alcalde, or civil governor. When the little Californian was printed, he, as civil magistrate, issued his orders through it. One order forbade all gambling. He would take his officers, enter a gambling house, and fine every one present $20, and the owner of the house $100. This money, as it accumulated, was used to build the first school house in California; also the large Colton Hall, in which the Constitution was adopted. According to the rules of the navy, my brother was allowed no salary as alcalde, but only his salary as chaplain. Cheap administration! This office he filled for three years. He became quite popular with the native Californians by introducing the trial by jury, something entirely new to them.

My brother's letters to The Journal of Commerce, in this city, and the Philadelphia North American made the first announcement of the discovery of gold. An incident connected with this discovery is worth recording. When the gold was discovered, all the marines and under-officers of the war vessels ran away to the mines. The provisions in these vessels would spoil if not used. Commodore Stockton ordered them to be sold at auction. Captain Marcy and my brother invested each $1,500 in these provisions, and employed two young men to take them to the mines and to sell them at the best lay they could. At that time there was nothing cheap but gold in the mines. The young men were to have one-half they made out of the speculation. I do not remember how long they were gone; perhaps two months. But on their return my brother's share, one-quarter, amounted to $40,000! On my way to California, in 1849, I met him at Panama, on his way home. He had the $40,000 in gold dust in his trunk.

In the fall of 1849 Horace Hawes, prefect of the district of San Francisco, appointed me the first justice of the peace for San Francisco. My commission had to be sent to Monterey for approval by Governor Riley (who succeeded my brother). It came back with "Approved by the Governor. H. W. Halleck, Secretary of State." I knew little or nothing about law, though probably about as much as some of the justices lately appointed in this city. Judge Hyde, a former alcalde, told me there were no statute laws in California, and I only had to administer justice, equity, between man and man. My jurisdiction only extended to $100, and there was no appeal from my judgment, unless I felt in doubt in regard to the evidence, in which case I would give an appeal to the Court of First Instance. I had many gambling cases to settle—parties charged with cheating at cards. The only satisfaction I could give either party was to summon old gamblers to give testimony in regard to the rules of the game. I never had an appeal taken to a higher court, though I often gave the privilege—$100 was but a drop in the bucket in those days. I never knew an old Californian charged with cheating. It was always those Mississippi fellows. And here I dispensed justice for a time, or dispensed with it, as Mrs. Partington said of a certain church, "where the Gospel was dispensed with." When the lawyers addressed me as "Your Honor" I suppose I had something of the feeling of the mock duke in the play of The Honeymoon, who, after an important trial, and the crowd had retired, soliloquized to himself as follows:

"I begin to find by the strength of my nerves and the steadiness of my countenance that I was certainly intended for a great man. For what more does it require to be a great man than barely to put on the appearance of it? How many sage politicians there are who cannot comprehend the mysteries of a mouse trap; valiant generals, who would not attack a bulwark unless the wind were in their favor; profound lawyers, who would make excellent wig-blocks; skillful physicians, whose knowledge extends no further than writing death warrants in Latin, and are shining examples that a man never will want gold in his pocket so long as he carries plenty of brass in his face. It will be rather awkward, to be sure, to retire at the end of a month—but like every other great man I must make the best of my time and retire with a good grace, as a well bred dog always walks down stairs when he sees preparations for kicking him into the streets."

I am inclined to think that thoughts like these must run through the brain of some of our lately appointed justices. Certainly your item that the Alta California was about to suspend publication must have recalled memories of the early Californian days to the many veterans of '49. I have a copy of the old Californian. There being no "w" in the Spanish alphabet, they had to put two v's together to make a w. G. Q. COLTON.

Several interesting autograph letters have been sold at the rooms of Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods, the prices obtained showing that rarities in this line are always sure of finding a ready market at sums which steadily advance. A letter from Robert Burns to his father sold for £53, and five verses in the same handwriting brought £21. Oliver Goldsmith's manuscript has been steadily rising in value of late, a letter from his hand to David Garrick inducing a collector to bid as high as £41 for the document, at which price it was disposed of. An epistle from Dr. Johnson—Goldie's friend and patron—only reached the sum of £10 15s. Two letters of Alexander Pope went for £17 10s. and £6 10s. respectively, and one from Jeremy Taylor brought £8 8s. A communication from Queen Elizabeth to a correspondent abroad, which her majesty had dictated to Roger Ascham, sold for £16 16s.—Californian Messenger.

It weakens a young man's enthusiasm, no matter how much he may be in love, when he gets the first impassioned letter from his innamorata and finds that she spells dear "deer."

WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND JEWELRY.

UNCLE IKE'S, 302 K Street, Sacramento.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY, CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

JUST RECEIVED.

A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES AND CARD CASES, OF THE LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

LIFE IN NEW YORK CITY.

TREATING ALSO OF MATTERS TRANS-ATLANTIC.

The Real Facts in the Baccarat Scandal—The Russian Jews and Their Final Destination—Open-Air Theatricals—Central Park and Its Clientele—College Graduates.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, June 20th.

A man who is thoroughly conversant with London society and its modes of thought called the attention of a knot of gossipers the other day to the peculiar attitude of the London press with regard to the baccarat scandal. It may have been noticed that, though the reports of the trial were rigidly conventional, the editorials were unusually severe upon the Prince of Wales and his "set," and expressed covert or open sympathy for Sir William Gordon-Cumming. Newspapers in London are particularly careful how they uphold personal questions, and when they range themselves on the side of Sir William it indicated that there was much behind the scandal that the papers could not print. The real facts are sifting slowly through the gossip of London, although it will be many days before they get into print. Even then the power of royalty will be exerted so strongly that it is likely the real truth will never receive general credence.

The story now goes that William Gordon-Cumming was involved in an affair of the heart with a lady with whom the Prince has been on terms of the most intimate friendship. Sir William, it is said, snubbed the lady at dinner and a quarrel ensued, the whole ending by a demand for some sort of satisfaction from Gordon-Cumming. Everyone was frightened, including the Prince, and the cards were resorted to as a cloak to hide the affair from the public. The general facts in the case are generally understood by the public, though the details are still a secret. All this explains the warm partisanship of press and public for Sir William Gordon-Cumming in the face of the remarkably direct and forcible testimony against him. As for the charge of the Lord Chief-Justice, it is absurd to suppose that he could lunch daily with the Prince of Wales during the trial and then give an impartial charge to the jury. The court proceedings were theatrical. They were not intended to bring out the truth, which will appear in due time; and when it does come, will prove that the sympathy of the public was for a wronged man.

Will someone tell us where the Jews who are flying from Russia are going? As to the fact of their exodus there seems to be great unanimity; but as to their destination—their final destination—there are no two views which are precisely similar. There seems to be a panic among Christian nations on account of the possibility of the Jew taking up his abode with them. Even Baron Hirsch and his river Platte scheme are not favorably regarded by people interested in that section of the country. Sympathy with the Russian Jew is a pleasant sentiment while he is in Russia, but it is not so fine when he proposes to become one's neighbor.

Open-air theatrical performances may be fine pastimes, but they are not artistic or dramatic events. Whoever read the description in the daily papers could see that the performance of "As You Like It" at Hoboken was a lawn party and not an artistic endeavor. There is considerable difference between poetry and picnics. The drama, if it is anything, is an ideal. Realism is apt to injure, if not kill it. The real interest of the event is that we found out just who were there and what the audience wore—in addition to umbrellas.

Any fine afternoon now the park presents an interesting study for the student of human nature. Here is to be found the lucky possessor of the trim buggy and his equally fortunate friend. Here can be seen the stately dowager accompanied by her beloved and velvet-blanketed lap-dog, and here are others that constitute the bona fide afternoon clientele of the park, rich and poor, the only necessity being leisure time. During the earlier hours the little folk enjoy the park, but about 3 o'clock fashion takes command and holds sway until darkness drives all pleasure seekers home.

Now is the time when the college student, having successfully passed his final examination, steps forward to receive the much coveted degree for which he has been striving with more or less ardor for the past four years. The most notable events of this nature during the week, in this vicinity, were the commencement of Columbia College, at the new Music Hall, when three hundred students were graduated, and the commencement of the University of the City of New York, at the Metropolitan Opera House. What with the flowers, the music, and brilliant toilets in the boxes, both events will long be memorable to every participant. In listening to the reading of the various degrees as they were conferred, one could not fail to be impressed with the wonderful range of special subjects in the modern college curriculum. There were bachelors of various kinds—arts, science, law, philosophy and divinity; civil engineers, electrical engineers, mining engineers, besides doctors of medicine and of the various arts and sciences, with masters to match, enough to bewilder a graduate of the last generation. The tendency of the times is plainly toward specialization and a more thorough education in the practical affairs of life; and while the colleges still retain the classics as a part of the course, they are gradually enlarging the lists of elective studies, particularly in the direction of electrical and engineering science, which offer such extensive fields for young men of thorough education.

M.

FLASHES.

Those who augur no good—political bores.

It is not necessary for a millionaire to be a philosopher.

Selfishness shuts our hearts to the charm of humanity.

It is rather early in the season to crack the party whip—or jokes.

Too little money is inconvenient—too much often a calamity.

Many people put their money in circulation before they earn it.

Some people turn up their noses so that they won't be in the way.

The man who has a good word for everybody does more good than the surly fellow with money.

Genius may be merely a capacity for hard work, but it is hard to make the neighbors believe that there is any genius about the young woman who practices the scales four hours a day.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On Friday and Saturday nights, July 3d and 4th, Men and Women will be produced at the Metropolitan Theater, by the largest and best dramatic combination in America. The cast of characters includes some of the very brightest and best talent on the stage. From what has been written and said of Men and Women it will be a rare treat to the theater-loving public of this city.

The death of Catharine Sinclair, widow of Edwin Forrest, removes a somewhat historic dramatic character, and recalls the celebrated Forrest divorce case, in which that noted lawyer, Charles O'Connor, was attorney for Mrs. Forrest. Mrs. Forrest went on the stage after the trial, making her debut at Brougham's Lyceum, in New York city, on February 22, 1853, where she played Lady Teazle, in The School for Scandal, and made a hit, and she attempted other important roles. For many years Mrs. Forrest has lived a retired life with friends.

Our Celebration.

Everything is progressing finely, looking towards an elaborate and appropriate celebration of natal day in the capital city. There will be a splendid civic and military parade through the principal streets, breaking ranks at the capitol building where extensive literary exercises will be held, including some choice selections of vocal and instrumental music, a brief address by the President of the Day, Gov. H. H. Markham, an eloquent oration by Hon. Frank L. Coombs, the reading of the Declaration of Independence by S. Luke Howe, a fine young elocutionist. Mrs. Addie Carter will also introduce some novelties in the music line, thus making a rare and attractive literary programme. In the afternoon there will be an exhibition of the Athletic Club, at the Clunie Opera House. The day's celebration will close in the evening by a general illumination of J and K streets, and a burlesque procession which promises to be interesting. While there will be no central fireworks display, it is evident that there will be a very extensive display at hundreds of residences and business houses. There is no danger of the spirit of "76" sleeping on July 4th, 1891. It is probable that several banquets will be in order during the afternoon. The Pioneers will follow an old time custom of good cheer and "clinking" glasses on that day. The old boys know just how to make a banquet interesting.

Persons living within 150 miles of Sacramento, who wish to enjoy the Fourth of July celebration here, will have an opportunity of doing so at half-fare rates. The Southern Pacific Company has announced that it will issue excursion tickets at these rates which will be good for from the 3d to 6th.

1776.

1891.

The Fourth

GRAND PARADE

AND

Literary Exercises.

GRAND MARSHAL,

MAJOR W. H. SHERBURN.

CHIEF OF STAFF,

MAJOR JOHN A. SHEEHAN.

Division Marshals:

FIRST DIVISION.....O. W. EARLEWINE

SECOND DIVISION.....J. J. MCKINNON

THIRD DIVISION.....PERRY CURTIS

ROUTE OF PROCESSION:

Procession moves at 10 o'clock sharp—from Sixth and M streets, to Tenth, to J, to Second, to K, to Tenth, to M, countermarch to Third, draw up in line in review

FIRST DIVISION.

Patrol of Police.

Hussars, Captain Schumacher commanding, acting as escort to first division.

Grand Marshal and Aids.

Brigadier-General T. W. Sheehan and Staff.

Signal Corps.

First Artillery Regiment Band.

Colonel J. W. Guthrie and Staff.

First Artillery Regiment, Mounted Battery on left.

SECOND DIVISION.

Mexican War Veterans.

Grand Army Posts.

"Goddess of Liberty," escorted by the Sons of Veterans.

President of the Day, Gov. H. H. Markham.

Orator, Frank L. Coombs.

Reader, S. Luke Howe.

Literary Committee.

State, County and City Officials and Citizens.

THIRD DIVISION.

Hussar Band.

Fire Department.

Trades' Display.

LITERARY EXERCISES.

(To be held in Assembly Chamber.)

1. Orchestra.
2. Introduction of the President of the Day, Gov. H. H. Markham, by Mayor Comstock.
3. Invocation.
4. "Anvil Chorus"—Mesdames Bonheim, Pinkham, Ross, Howard, Larkin and Carter, and Messrs. Beaumont, Cohn, Ashworth, Beardslee, Crocker and Phillips.
5. Reading of Declaration of Independence, by S. Luke Howe.
6. "Star Spangled Banner," by the audience; solo by Mrs. A. Bonheim.
7. Oration, by Hon. Frank L. Coombs, of Napa.
8. "Red, White and Blue," by the audience; solo by Mrs. Addie Carter.
9. Prayer, by Rabbi Jos. Levy.

NATIONAL SALUTES

Will be fired by a detachment of Battery "B," First Artillery Regiment, N. G. C., at sunrise and sunset.

In the afternoon there will be an

Exhibition by the Athletic Club

At Clunie Opera House.

By order.

W. H. SHERBURN,
Grand Marshal.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemis, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block eleven, I and J. 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. je27-9t

Fine Table
Wines
From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

The Saddest Thing.

Quarrels come, and the days turn dark;
Partings are, and the parted moan;
Death stalks by, and a body stark
Lies where love once claimed its own;
But the saddest thing is a love outgrown.

A word, and the quarrel's smooth again;
A time, and the parted clasp and kiss;
And even death is eased of pain
By hope of a reunited bliss;
But a love outgrown is stript of this.

'Tis the living form and the heart long dead;
'Tis the touching hands, yet the soul alone;
'Tis the trick to walk bride-garmented
With dust and ashes upon us thrown—
The saddest thing is a love outgrown.

The Lady with the Fan.

Tchouang-Tsen, from the country of Soung, was a savant whose wisdom had developed to such an extent that he had become indifferent to all perishable things; so he was certain to be free from the common errors of men who intrigue for the purpose of acquiring useless riches or vain honors. The satisfaction obtained by him through this indifference must have been exceedingly great, as after his death he was proclaimed happy and worthy to be envied. Now, during the days that the unknown genii permitted him to pass under a blue heaven, among the flowers, bamboos and willow trees, Tchouang-Tsen had the habit of thinking while strolling in the country. One day, wandering over the flowered mountain Nam-Hoa, he found himself in the midst of a cemetery whose dead rested under heaps of pressed earth, according to the custom of the country. At the sight of those innumerable tombs, which extended far beyond his view, the savant reflected on the destiny of men:

"Alas!" said he to himself, "there is the cross-road where all the roads of life meet. When one has once taken a place in the residence of Death that one never returns to light!"

As he was passing before a tomb he saw a young lady dressed in mourning—that is, she wore a long white dress made of common stuff and seamless. Sitting by the side of that tomb, she waved a white fan over the yet moist earth of the hillock.

Curious to know the motive of so strange an action, Tchouang-Tsen saluted the lady with the utmost politeness and said to her:

"Can I take the liberty of inquiring from you, madame, the name and qualification of the person now lying in this field of repose, and why you take so much trouble in fanning the earth which covers it? I am a philosopher. I am seeking causes, and your reason for doing so escapes my understanding."

The young lady continued to agitate her fan. She blushed, lowered her head and uttered some words that the learned Tchouang-Tsen failed to hear.

He repeated his question several times, but vainly. She did not notice him any more, and it seemed as if her whole soul had passed into the hand that held the fan.

Tchouang-Tsen regretfully left her. Although he knew that everything is vanity, yet he was naturally inclined to search for the motives for human actions, and especially of woman's action. That little species of creature inspired him with a painful inquisitiveness. He continued his promenades slowly, turning his head from time to time to see the fan, that lashed the air like the wing of a giant butterfly, when all of a sudden an old woman, whom he had not seen before, made a gesture as if she wanted him to follow her. He obeyed. She conducted him under the shadow of a monument higher than any other in the cemetery.

"I heard you asking my mistress a question, to which she made no answer. I will satisfy your curiosity, through a natural willingness to oblige and also in the hope that you will give me a few pennies to buy a magical paper from the priest, a paper that will lengthen my life."

Tchouang-Tsen opened his purse and gave her a piece of silver.

"This lady is my mistress; her name is Lu-Tao; she is the widow of the famous Tao, a savant of the first order. He died fifteen days ago. He loved his wife tenderly and she adored him. At the moment of leaving this world forever, Tao asked his wife why she cried so bitterly, death being nothing else but another birth. She took the gods as witnesses that she would not survive him and would share his coffin as she had shared his couch.

"Tao said to her:

"Dear wife, do not swear such a thing."

"She replied:

"At least, if I have to survive you, if I am condemned by the genii to see again the light of the day when I shall never more see you, know that I shall never consent to be another man's wife. I shall have only one husband as I have only one soul."

"Dear wife, do not swear such a thing," answered Tao.

"O Tao, my dear husband! allow me to swear that I will not marry again within five years from this very moment."

"But Tao said to her:

"Dear wife, do not swear such a thing. Swear simply to be faithful to my memory as long as the earth retains its moisture over my coffin."

"Lu-Tao took a great oath. The good Tao closed his eyes, which he never reopened. The despair of his widow was intense. She scratched her cheeks with her pointed nails and tore her hair. Alas! everything has an end here below. Three days after Tao's death the grief of the young woman had somewhat diminished. She was informed that a former pupil of her husband wanted to see her to tell her how sorry he was for her affliction. Reasonably, she could not refuse to see that young gentleman. She met him in the yellow room; she was crying and sobbing. He was elegant, handsome and eloquent. He spoke very little about the deceased Tao and very much about the living Lu-Tao; he told her how charming she was and how much he loved her. She permitted him to say all he wanted to express. He promised her to call again. Waiting for him, Lu-Tao passes the whole day trying to dry with her fan the earth under which the good and learned Tao sleeps his last sleep."

When the old woman had finished her narrative the learned Tchouang-Tsen reflected:

Youth is short. Love gives wings to young women as well as to young men. After all, Lu-Tao is an honest woman; she is unwilling to violate her oath.—N. Y. World.

Do Deer Ever Weep?

In most species of deer, a hollow which is known to scientists as the lachrymal sinus, or tear-pit, is found. It is a cavity beneath each eye, capable of being opened at pleasure, in which a waxy substance of a peculiar, disagreeable odor is secreted. This pit is sometimes very small, but often of considerable size. Poets speak of the deer weeping, but it has not been shown this is not by poetic license solely. In the case of the wounded stag, which the contemplative Jaques watched and moralized upon, it is said:

The big round tears
Coursed one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase.

But this is Shakspeare's poetical interpretation of the appearance presented by the motion of the glistening edges of the folds of skin which enclose the so-called "tear-pits." These cavities are very marked in species of deer found in Asia and the islands of the Indian Ocean, and in the common deer of America and Europe. In some varieties in South America and Northern Asia they are less developed.

Whatever may be our situation in life, then, let us live in the assurance that it is best for us. If we suffer, it is to save us from greater suffering. If we are disappointed, it is to save us from greater disappointment. If we sustain loss of property, or friends, or place, it is that we may not sustain a greater loss, perhaps a spiritual and an eternal one. If we are bereaved of our children and those who are dear to us, it is to save us from a greater bereavement; it is for the purpose of arresting our attention to our spiritual interests, of weaning us from the world.

A lady prominently identified with the obtaining of the rights of her sex came out in a newspaper article strongly attacking trousers on the ground, mainly, that they were highly uncomfortable. An investigation set on foot by a crafty and ungallant man revealed the fact that the lady, while experimenting with a pair of trousers belonging to her pastor, surreptitiously furnished her by the good man's wife, became confused in regard to their lines of construction and put them on wrong side before; her savage newspaper article following as a matter of course.

Nothing on earth will upset a horse's stomach. This is not because the horse does not feel pain, but simply because the horse has no gall bladder. Has anybody ever seen a horse sick at sea? Has anybody ever known an emetic to have any effect on a horse? At a bull fight a horse may be seen eating with its entrails trailing on the ground. As for the contention that a horse is not as sensitive to pain as man, I think that a horse is probably a great deal more so. There is no living creature, not even a hysterical woman, so nervously sensitive as a horse.

"Mornin', mum; is the docthor in?" "I'm the doctor. What do you want?" "Sure an' if yez wor the docthor ye'd know what wuz the matter with me widout the askin'." "Yes, I can tell you. You are afflicted with chronic impecuniosity and peripateticism, resulting from congenital lassitude, aggravated by persistent alcoholization." "Great heavens! An' how long do yez give me to live?"

The preacher had been talking about the necessity for a "new heart." Little Bess' father took her on his knee and gravely asked if she understood what a new heart was. "O, yes, indeed," she answered brightly, "It's a kind of heavenly stomach!"

In Japan the act of flirting is a penal offense. Serious complications arise under the law, but the young people of both sexes know that they cannot wink and blink and giggle at each other unless they mean business.

UNION ICE COMPANY

ARE NOW PREPARED TO FURNISH

Pure Mountain Ice

NEW QUARTERS:

521 AND 523 I STREET.

CHARLES SELLINGER, Agent.

PANTS to ORDER
$3.50 to $13.50

SUITS TO ORDER
$15.00 to $50.00

1000 Patterns to Select from.

GABEL the TAILOR

426 J STREET.

D. J. MANNIX,

Contractor of Plastering

Kalsomining and Repairing

In all its branches.

Insulation of Steam Pipes and Boilers a Specialty.

Center Pieces, Brackets, and all kinds of Plaster Ornaments for sale.

Residence, 2215 O St. Shop, 1220 J St.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Guttenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than J. SLAUGHTER, Sixth and M streets.

Telephone 318.

E. JAY SWANSON,

Southeast Corner Tenth and I Streets.

The most wonderful cures performed.

OPERA HOUSE

CANDY, ICE CREAM AND SODA PARLORS, 813
K street.

R. P. PEDLAR, Proprietor.

THE

Bell Conservatory Co.

SACRAMENTO.

Floral Work and Plant Decoration

A SPECIALTY.

Telephone No. 155.

W. R. STRONG CO.

Founded 1852.

Fruit Packers

and Shippers.

PROPRIETORS OF

CAPITAL NURSERIES,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Headquarters for ALFALFA SEED and OREGON
POTATOES, in lots to suit.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET.

San Francisco Office, 313 DAVIS ST. SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar

Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

M. DUFFY,

Manufacturer of Carriages, Wagons, Carts, Etc.

REPAIRING

Done at Short Notice. All Work Warranted.

1111-1113 J Street, bet. Eleventh and Twelfth,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County
Coroner. Telephone 134.

A Chapter on Mushrooms.

The division of microscopy of the United States Department of Agriculture, in response to numerous demands from various localities, has issued a pamphlet with pictures and descriptions of edible mushrooms. In almost every section and climate are found quantities of these articles, which are little used owing to the inability of the majority of people to distinguish the nutritious from the poisonous varieties. Rollrausch and Siegel, who have made exhaustive investigation into the food values of mushrooms, state that many species deserve to be placed next to meat in nutriment. Every country in the world produces these fungus growths. In France they are widely cultivated in caves, frequently miles in extent. A cave at Merz contains twenty-one miles of beds and produces 3,000 pounds daily. They are also cultivated in the catacombs and quarries and, under the name of "truffles," are sold in large quantities. They are grown in Tahiti and Japan, and exported to China at the rate of 200 tons per annum. New Zealand sends large quantities to San Francisco and also to Hong Kong. The Chinese eat it, use it for medicine, and make a fine dye out of it. One remarkable species grows out of the body of a large caterpillar, practically converting the animal into a vegetable.

Among the tribes of Asia, besides those used for food, one variety is utilized in making snuff, and another for producing intoxication, one mushroom making a man drunk for a whole day. The same species is also converted into a "fly-killer" for European use. The old Greek and Roman writers speak of the truffle, the boletus and the puffball. In Rome all mushrooms must be sent to a central depot to receive government inspection, the yearly crop amounting to 80,000 pounds. Germany, Hungary and Russia consume large quantities, and in Terra del Fuego it is the staple article of food. England uses the common meadow mushrooms, but the consumption is small. America is especially rich in the quantity and variety of this healthful vegetable, and scientists are making especial effort to stimulate its cultivation and diffuse knowledge regarding it. Rev. Dr. Curtis, State Geologist, has found 111 species in North Carolina. Investigation shows that nearly all the varieties of Europe are found in the United States. The "puffball" reaches a circumference of several feet and a weight of thirty pounds, and the cook may go out into the garden and slice off what she wants from day to day. Mushroom "spawn" may be obtained from the seedmen, and the mushrooms can be grown in sheds, stables and shaded spots where the soil has been made very rich. They may be prepared for the table in an endless variety of ways, and are a most delicious but little appreciated article of food.

Babies Taught Mischief.

There is a limit to a baby's endurance of osculation, and the physical reaction from this also, when it comes, is charged to nature and her process of dentition. When the child begins to creep and walk, and in curiosity to put things in into his mouth; to pull at table covers and catch at tassels and laces, and to investigate his surroundings generally, like a young monkey, the usual course pursued is to thwart him at every move, to keep him out of mischief, says the Jeunes-Miller magazine.

Having by this means irritated him and injured his disposition, the nurse thrusts herself upon him as a substitute, and in the effort to soothe him makes herself a slave at his command. The child is taught in this way that the adults about him are merely puppets which he is to set in motion. For it requires no long time for him to perceive how agreeable it is to act through others, to speak and set the world in motion. Baby is thus taught to be tyrannical and truly mischievous.

The term "printer's devil," as applied to the boy who does the choring around a printing office, has a peculiar and romantic history. In early days printing was styled the "black art," and printers were supposed to be in league with Satan. But it was in the time of Aldus Minutius in Venice that the matter took a serious turn. This was the famous printer who first published the Greek and Roman classics. He took into his employ a negro boy, who was homeless on the streets of Venice. The people supposed this boy was an imp from Satan, and that he assisted Aldus in printing. Mobs collected around the office and were about to wreck it, when the boy was brought forward and exhibited to the crowd. A personal examination showed that the boy was flesh and blood, but he was still called "the printer's devil," and every boy in his position ever since has been so called.

There is a queer old fisherman down on the Jersey coast who has followed his calling for forty years, and yet he declares that, although he has in a sense subsisted upon the finny tribe, he has never in all his life tasted of a bit of fish. He has always had an unconquerable aversion to this article of diet, and his common bill of fare has been unadorned and simple. As he humorously puts it: "I kin live on rum an' pork. There hain't no bones in them."

The Tall Girl.

There are two theories for the sudden excess of tall women—one that some mechanical process has been discovered and is being secretly practiced, by which stout women are drawn out into long, slender females; the other, that these women have always existed, and are suddenly brought forth from their retirement by the inexorable decree of fashion. The latter would seem to be the most reasonable explanation. When it was the fashion for women to be enbounpoint, the tall and slender woman hid herself away from public gaze as much as possible. She shrunk into her boots and walked stoop-shouldered when she was to be seen in public places. Now that she is having her inning, she is making good use of it. She walketh erect at noonday—also in the evening. When she has a beau, she chooses one she can look down upon. It accentuates her giraffe style. Her clinging, drooping, Bernhardt draperies still further lean forward and upward. It is a comparatively easy thing for a woman five feet six to add four inches to her apparent height if she be not fat. Fat! That very word seems horrible to the sex just now. The fat woman suggests the 10-cent museum. Let her await her turn and grow fatter in anticipation of her coming triumph.

Of the late Bishop Ames the following anecdote is told: While presiding over a certain conference in the West, a member began a tirade against universities and education, thanking God that he had never been corrupted by contact with a college. After proceeding thus for a few minutes, the Bishop interrupted with the question: "Do I understand that the brother thanks God for his ignorance?" "Well, yes," was the answer, "you can put it that way if you want to." "Well, all I have to say," said the Bishop, in his sweetest musical tone, "all I have to say is that the brother has a good deal to thank God for."

"You may notch it on the palings—
It's a mighty risky plan
To form a hasty judgment
From the clothes that's on a man.
For you bet your bottom dollar
That you often come across
An eighty-dollar saddle
On a twenty-dollar 'hoss.'"

James W. Bradbury, of Augusta, Me., who was a United States Senator way back in the days of Webster and Calhoun, completed his 86th year this week. His mental powers are as strong and vigorous as when he sat in the Senate, and his physical powers are preserved in a remarkable degree.

ORDINANCE NO. 29.

An Ordinance Regulating Saloons, Dance-houses, Theaters, and Places where Intoxicating Liquors are Disposed of by Retail, and Providing for Licenses Therefor.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento do ordain as follows:

Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to hereafter open, establish, or conduct, or cause to be opened, established, or conducted, any barroom, public saloon, theater, variety show, dance-house, or other place where wines, spirituous or malt liquors are sold by the glass, bottle, or otherwise, in less quantities than one quart, within the limits of the County of Sacramento, without first obtaining permission from the Board of Supervisors. The application for such permission shall be made by petition in writing to the Board of Supervisors, which petition must contain the names and signatures of a majority of the resident taxpayers in the election precinct, as it at the time exists, in which such saloon or place in which such liquors are to be dispensed is proposed to be opened or conducted.

Sec. 2. If, after due consideration of the same by the Board of Supervisors, the petition be favorably acted upon, it shall be the duty of the person in whose favor the petition was presented, and the prayer of which was granted, before opening the said place to file with the Board of Supervisors a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Chairman of the Board, with two sureties in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that the applicant shall maintain said place in a quiet, orderly and decent manner.

Sec. 3. A written verified complaint filed with said Board of Supervisors setting forth that any saloon or place mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance is conducted in other than a quiet, orderly, lawful and decent manner shall be foundation for action by the Board of Supervisors concerning the place complained of in said complaint. If after a full investigation, of which both sides shall have due notice and the privilege of being represented in person and by counsel and producing and examining witnesses, the Board of Supervisors find the allegations of the complaint to be true it shall make an order revoking the license issued to the person owning or conducting the place complained of and shall declare the bond given in such case forfeited.

Sec. 4. On and after July 1st, 1891, persons conducting the business mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance and in compliance with the provisions hereof, must pay a license tax to the License Collector of said county in the sum of $30 quarterly in advance; provided, that all licenses in full force at the time of the passage of this Ordinance shall entitle their holders to continue business thereunder until the expiration of the same.

Sec. 5. All parts of Ordinances in so far as they conflict with the provisions of this Ordinance are hereby repealed.

Sec. 6. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after July 1, 1891.

E. GREER, Chairman.
Attest: W. W. RHODES, Clerk.
Adopted by the votes of Miller, Black, Bates, Jenkins and Greer.
Attest: W. W. RHODES, Clerk.

Felter, Son & Co.

OFFER TO THE TRADE, IN QUANTITIES TO suit, a full and complete line of choice

Wines, Liquors & Cigars,

Including the Celebrated

GOLD CROWN and DELMONICO

KENTUCKY WHISKIES.

At the Old Stand, 1006-1008 Second Street, SACRAMENTO.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second, SACRAMENTO, CAL.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

A CURE FOR LOVE.

Take 12 ounces of Dislike, 1 pound of Resolution, 2 grains of Common Sense, 2 ounces of Experience, a large sprig of time, and 3 quarts of cooling water of Consideration.

Set these over the gentle fire of Love, sweeten with the spoon of Forgetfulness, skim it with the spoon of Melancholy, put in the bottom of your heart, cork it with the cork of a clear Conscience, let it remain and you will quickly find ease and be restored to your senses again.

These things can be had of the Apothecary at the home of Understanding next door to Reason, on Prudent Street, in the village of Contentment.

Take when a spell comes on a drink from

THE VIDETTE,

228 J STREET, NEAR THIRD, C. A. VIEMEISTER.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

Always a FINE LUNCH on the Counter.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 Fourth St., bet. J and K, Sacramento.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET,

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO.

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. SCHACHT,

DEALER IN

FAMILY GROCERIES

Provisions, Flour,

Wines, Liquors, Cigars, Tobacco

Southeast Corner Second and M Sts.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

Orders Solicited.

C. T. MILLIKIN,

DENTIST,

1008 Eighth Street,

Between J and K,

Over Dr. W. A. Hughson's office.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON. ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER,
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,
630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Bound to Be Moral.

Out in the Kootenay country, in British Columbia, which is just being opened to settlement, the people are determined to be moral until the law-makers get around to that province, if they have to put every man in jail; and the following notice, that was removed from a tree a short time ago by a traveler in that district, indicates how they propose to do it. The original document is in possession of one of the Brooklyn bridge trustees: "Police Notice.—As persons are congregating at Illicillewaet and its neighborhood to follow lawful occupations, notice is hereby given to loiterers, users of bad language in the streets, professional or habitual gamblers, prostitutes, agents for houses of ill fame, drunkards and other such scum and refuse of mankind, that they must take the back track immediately, as such persons are not permitted to be in this district except in the chain-gang and prison. The fine and imprisonment of such persons will be increased, in each case, in proportion to the time the offender has remained after the date of this warning. Anyone who molests or hinders any officer of the law, though he do not strike him, will get two months' hard labor, and if he strike or attempt to strike the officer, six months' hard labor, whether the offender is drunk or sober at the time of the offense. Persons refusing to aid the police in making an arrest will be punished as aiders and abettors. Any liquor licenses granted will be canceled if professional gamblers are admitted into the premises or unlawful games played therein, or if liquor is served to other than sober persons, or if a woman serves at the bar, or women are habitually in the bar room. The full penalty of $450, and imprisonment in default, will be inflicted for illicit vending, etc., of liquors. These rules, lawful under the laws of Canada and the province, have been enforced during the two years past in this district in the interest of and for the comfort of well-doing persons, and all such are enjoined to assist the police in carrying them out effectively by giving information and, when necessary, active help. The law against the carrying and improper use of firearms and malicious injury to buildings will be rigorously enforced. G. M. Sproat, stipendiary justice for the province, Fifth Kootenay district."

The Planet Vulcan.

We were not unfamiliar with the fact that Vulcan was a planet of doubt, not of "romance." The story may be interesting to many of our readers. In September, 1859, Leverrier, director of the observatory of Paris, laid before the Academy of Science the proofs which had led him to the conclusion that there must be a planet within the orbit of Mercury. He showed, in his paper, that the existence of such a planet would fully explain the apparent anomalies in the motion, both of Mercury and the earth. He, at the same time, warned all observers to keep a sharp lookout upon the sun's disc, as the only hope of discovering it was by detecting its transit. Being always in the immediate vicinity of the sun, and quenched by its rays, it could manifest its existence only by appearing as a black spot on the bright background of the sun. In December, 1859, Leverrier received a letter, dated from the small town of Orgères, in the department of Eure et Loire. This was from M. Lescarbault, announcing that he had on March 26 preceding observed a small planet cross the disc of the sun. Leverrier visited Lescarbault and investigated his discovery and his processes. The interview closed by the director of the imperial observatory expressing his perfect satisfaction, and giving the Orgères astronomer his most cordial congratulations. Leverrier lost no time in publishing the discovery to the world, and representing the claims of Lescarbault to the emperor, and the village doctor was decorated with the order of the legion of honor.

THE PASTEUR GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

H. WACHHORST Leading Jeweler of Sacramento

SIGN OF THE TOWN CLOCK,
No. 315 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

J. R. HODSON, THE LEADING PHOTOGRAPHER IN AMERICA

Studio, 521 J Street.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co. FRED. SCHNEIDER

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST.

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND
HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

R. DAVIS,
NOTARY PUBLIC,
Real Estate and Insurance Agent.
Representing the following companies:
Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh,
Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J Street, Sacramento.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,
Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,
SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHREIER,
TWENTY-THIRD STREET, BET. Q AND R,
CEMENT SIDEWALKS,

Garden Walks, Carriage Drives, Etc., constructed at shortest notice, in the most workman-like manner and at lowest rates.

B. Ruhl Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.
Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.
No. 409 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS.

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,
WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS
AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.
Telephone No. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS, J. H. DOLAN.

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES,
Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,
SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

Telephone 248.

PACIFIC
HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

WINE ROOMS,
FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.
614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.
FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

RAILROAD TIME TABLE.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

June 7, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.15 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.40 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico.	4.20 A
4.30 P	Denning, El Paso and East.	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knight's Landing and Marysville.	7.25 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave.	9.35 A
12.05 P	Second Class, Ogden and East.	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express.	8.15 A
	Ogden and East.
3.00 P	Oroville.	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville.	10.30 A
10.40 A	Redding via Willows.	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia.	11.40 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia.	12.35 A
6.30 A	San Francisco via Benicia.	11.15 A
3.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia.	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia.	8.40 P
*10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer.	8.00 P
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore.	8.00 P
10.50 A	San Jose.	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara.	9.35 A
6.15 A	Santa Rosa.	11.40 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa.	8.40 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt.	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt.	9.35 A
12.05 P	Truckee and Reno.	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno.	8.15 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations.	2.30 P
6.15 A	Vallejo.	11.40 A
3.05 P	Vallejo.	11.40 P
*6.35 A	Folsom and Placerville.	*2.40 P
*3.10 P	Folsom and Placerville.	*11.35 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

Draws Exchange on all the Principal Cities
of the World.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout.
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox.
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

CAPITAL STOCK PAID UP - - - - $225,500 00
RESERVE AND SURPLUS, - - - - 54,253 26

Term and Ordinary Deposits Received.
Dividends Paid Semi-annually.

Money Loaned on Real Estate Only.
WM. BECKMAN, President.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier.

Edwin K. Alsip & Co.

ESTABLISHED 1860.

REAL ESTATE

AND INSURANCE AGENTS.

FARMING LANDS A SPECIALTY.

Catalogues issued monthly.

No. 1015 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.
Send for Catalogue.

R. A. OLMSTED.

S. P. OLMSTED.

Fourth Street Cash Grocery.

R. A. OLMSTED & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

Fruits and Vegetables, Provisions, Flour, Hay, Grain,
and all kinds of Mill Stuffs.
Wines, Liquors, Cigars and Tobaccos.

400 L Street, S. E. cor. Fourth, Sacramento.

Fresh Butter and Eggs a Specialty. Goods delivered free of charge to any part of the City, R. R.
depot or Steamboat landing. Highest price paid for Country Produce.

THE EMERSON

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1891.

No. 20.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. D. AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. ETT, Managing Editor.

The necessities of a new charter are daily becoming more manifest. The city has advanced to such an extent, since the adoption of the charter of 1863, that many of its provisions are obsolete. Our system of income depended on the general revenue law of the State of 1861, and as that law was repealed something like a quarter of a century ago, we are left with no other definite means of meeting running expenses. In many particulars there is a direct conflict between our system of local self-government and the organic law of the State, as well as the codes. We have several commissions and boards, in direct defiance of the Constitution of the State, but which are recognized because they were, with the charter, in existence prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879. There are many inconsistencies in our system of government; for instance, we have the District Attorney of the county, who has no relation to the municipal government, performing the functions of collecting delinquent city taxes. The question of City Justices is another matter that should be under city control. All the street laws of the charter are either obsolete or serve to confuse the action of the authorities under the general street laws of the State. Our school system is actually under an Act which anti dates the charter one year, and is only by suffrage utilized as part of the charter. The ordinances of the city are based on theories of the law, which have been changed by the present Constitution.

A reform is absolutely necessary in the conduct of our municipal affairs with regard to the officers and their salaries. All the municipal government laws now in force by legislative enactment since the Constitution of 1879, provide for a different class of officers, and a reform in matters of salaries. As we now exist—and it is simply an existence without any clear idea of just how it is done—when we desire any revenue for local improvement, we are compelled to levy more than twice as much necessary for that particular purpose, because of that antiquated thing called our bonded debt. In other words, if we want to improve our streets or build a new city hall, we must levy enough more taxes in order to give the cormorant bond holders 55 per cent. of the gross amount. The business men and property owners should take this matter in hand and see to it promptly that fifteen freeholders who are capable are elected to frame a new organic law before the convening of the next Legislature. Bear in mind that if we commence now, it will be none too soon. It will, of course, take a couple of months to get started with the work. Then the freeholders will probably occupy the ninety days' time allowed by the Constitution to frame the charter. Then the publication will be a month; so, taking it all in all, it is a safe idea to commence this work of necessary reform as early as possible. We shall, from time to time, point out some of the reforms that in our judgment should be adopted by the freeholders in preparing a new local organic law.

A writer in one of our leading journals has about the right idea of modern politics. There was a time when it was an honor to be an aspirant for a public trust. "The man who accepts an office abandons much that makes life valuable in the way of reputation. The character that he has spent a lifetime in establishing is at the mercy of his enemies. There is no persecution recorded in the dark ages more bitter and unrelenting and heartless than that which is waged by political parties. It does not confine itself to the man, but it spares neither his family nor any one connected with him by the ties of relationship. Truth in politics is a lost art, and justice to a political opponent is not written in the code. Our boasted freedom of speech and liberty of the press have degenerated into license, and our misuse of these privileges is the most reprehensible feature of our institutions. We look in vain for an awakened public conscience in this direction, and yet we feel that it will surely come. The old days, when all questions of dispute were settled by force of arms, are passing away, and the humane and enlightened plan of arbitration is being substituted. It is no less important that we abolish the present system of abuse and misrepresentation as the principal method of political warfare. The questions at issue are of sufficient importance to sink personalities out of sight. The slander and vilification heaped upon public officials are becoming of so great a magnitude as to cause independent, self-respecting men to hesitate as to the wisdom of permitting themselves to become a target. We are making history every day. Shall future generations read also our pages upon the record with surprise and condemnation for the spirit of persecution which distinguished the age?"

While the time for the nomination of presidential candidates and the national election is remote, there seems to be the usual scheming and counter scheming that has in advance been characteristic of every general contest. The Democrats seem more deep in intriguing than the Republicans, and it would seem the principal matter will have to be determined as between Cleveland and Hill, unless the convention will take it into their heads to astonish the nation by bringing forward some obscure man, of whom no one ever dreamed, to be an available candidate for President, as was done in 1844 in the case of James K. Polk. The unexpected selection of candidates by national conventions has, however, occurred frequently since 1844. Polk had been in Congress and had been Speaker of the House. His predecessors had, as a rule, had higher stepping stones. Washington was the principal figure head of the new nation, to whom the first place naturally would be tendered. Adams first, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Adams second, and Van Buren had filled distinguished diplomatic and cabinet positions; while Jackson and Harrison had won their honors as military chieftains. Since the day of President Polk, it has not been uncommon to select "dark horses." The nominations of Pierce, Lincoln, Hayes, Cleveland and Harrison second, were not generally anticipated. It is not at all unlikely a new man will carry away the Democratic pennant next year. Should the ex-President, after having been defeated by the people for re-election, fail to receive the endorsement of the convention of his own party, he may well console himself with the theory of Hudibras, —That honor's very squeamish,

That takes a basting for a blemish;
For what's more honorable than scars,
Or skin to tatters rent in wars?
Some have been beaten till they know
What wood a cudgel's of by the blow.
By laws of learned duelists,
They that are bruised with wood or fists,
And think one beating may for once
Suffice, are cowards and paltrons;
But if they dare engage t' a second,
They're stout and gallant fellows reckon'd—

And esteem himself a "stout and gallant fellow." The same condition of things is not likely to occur with the Republicans. It would seem Blaine will not again aspire; that Harrison will, is assured; that many other candidates will be presented before the convention will but be a repetition of past history, but it would appear the chances are in favor of Harrison.

In looking over a newspaper file of 1852, recently, we encountered a report of a case that had been tried in the United States Circuit Court for the New Jersey district, and argued in March of that year. The suit had relation to the title to the inventions in rubber that have since made Charles Goodyear's name historical. Daniel Webster appeared for Goodyear, and Rufus Choate for the opposing party, one Day. It can be imagined that attention was attracted at the time to the arguments of those distinguished lawyers. Particularly was that of Mr. Webster admired. Goodyear had become very poor while perfecting his discoveries, and had written a despondent letter to a friend, wherein he expressed great anxiety for his wife and family, and described his poor lodgings. The letter had been ridiculed upon the trial, and concerning it Mr. Webster paid this beautiful tribute to the fidelity of woman:

"He says it is as good a lodging as he may expect this side of the grave; he hopes his friends will come and see him on the subject of India rubber manufacture; and then he speaks of his family and his wife. He had but two objects, his family and his discovery. In all his distress, and in all his trials, she was willing to participate in his sufferings, and endure everything, and hope everything; she was willing to be poor; she was willing to go to prison; she was willing to share with him everything, and that was his only solace. There is nothing upon the earth that can compare with the faithful attachment of a wife—no creature who for the object of her love is so indomitable, so persevering, so ready to suffer and to die. Under the most depressing circumstances, woman's weakness becomes mighty power; her timidity becomes fearless courage; all her shrinking and sinking passes away, and her spirit acquires the firmness of marble—adamantine firmness—when circumstances drive her to put forth all her energies under the inspirations of her affections."

Murder is said to be the gravest of crimes that can be committed against the person. Murder, however, has its degrees and conditions, different under which it is committed. To shoot a man through the heart or brain kills him almost without pain. To strike a man upon the head with a hammer, subject him to months of painful suffering, followed by a deprivation of reason, and ending in death, is murder intensified. We speak of this that Robert Allen was so stricken on Seventh street, back of the court-house, in May, by one of a gang of thugs, and while lying unconscious, was robbed of $300 in money and his jewelry. Allen did afterward manage to crawl to his residence; since has been in a precarious condition; as we view it, his taking to the insane asylum is but premonitory of his death. No one can doubt the identity of the parties concerned in this assault and robbery. It is a question if they will receive the punishment the atrocity of their crime merits. True it is, Gordon, McKaig and Brady have made full statements, in which they implicate themselves in greater or lesser degree, and also implicate others. In the case of McKaig, he made his statement under a promise of immunity from punishment; the position of Brady is the same. Gordon confessed reluctantly when all hope had failed him save that of receiving a lighter sentence in the robbery case than he would receive did he stand trial. It was a prudential foresight that Judge Van Fleet withheld the sentence of Gordon, who pleaded guilty of the robbery of Allen, until the ultimate result of the injuries he received developed. If Allen dies within a year and one day from the direct result of the assault made upon him, it is manifest the question of robbery will fall into the second place. Our code provides that, "To make the killing either murder or manslaughter, it is requisite that the party die within a year and a day after the stroke received or the cause of death administered; in the computation of which the whole of the day on which the act was done shall be reckoned the first." From the present outlook in the Allen case, it is reasonable to conclude that within that period the crime of murder will be complete. The question then arises, Can the guilty be punished, under the laws of this State? Our laws in this respect are different from those of most of the other States. There is provided that "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless he is corroborated by other evidence which in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense, or the circumstances thereof." It can readily be seen that the prosecuting officers will labor against almost insurmountable obstacles in this case. The crime was one of secrecy, and its planning and commission were known to but the few concerned in it. The police have worked diligently to secure corroborating evidence; whether it will be sufficient to overcome the barrier and punish those acknowledgedly guilty, remains for the future to disclose.

Much has been said about the majesty of the law, and that through its instrumentality wrongs will be avenged. It does, however, happen in some cases that our established tribunals are futile, hampered as they are by the extraordinary protection the criminal element is given. It would almost seem in the trial of many cases that the prosecution and not the defendant was on trial. Jurors seem never to understand the reasonableness of a reasonable doubt, and imagine it throws about an assassin the protection of the city of refuge. There should be a radical change in our laws to make convictions easier and punishment more certain. The old rule that it is better ninety and nine guilty shall escape than that one innocent shall be punished, should not hold good, for the chances are very remote that a man who has led an upright and honest life will be caught in the meshes of the law.

There was an era in the history of this State—an era in which Robert Allen and his fellow pioneers were actors—when so brutal an assault as was made upon him would have been avenged summarily by a power second only to that of the Almighty—the people in their primary capacity. It is of course improper to suggest a resort to measures seemingly so violent, but one cannot help to think of them when cases peculiarly aggravating arise, and where it seems the established laws are insufficient to administer justice. Looking back in the history of Sacramento: In July, 1851, three men knocked down and robbed one Wilson in the daytime. At that time the punishment for robbery was death. Though the case was not nearly so aggravating as that of Allen, popular indignation was aroused, and within a week the parties were condemned. One of them was reprieved by the Governor. The other two were hanged at Sixth and O streets under judicial process. When they were disposed of, the people took the third man from the jail and hanged him also. A gentleman who witnessed the scene described the third man as of fine physique, and in the prime of young manhood. When on the scaffold he delivered a lengthy speech, premising it by saying: "This is the first time in my life I have had the pleasure of addressing an audience so large and attentive." He did not, however, command any sympathy, though he deserved it perhaps more than those concerned in the assault upon Mr. Allen. There is a certain degree to which sympathy should extend, but we cannot see that there is reason to commiserate an act so deliberate and brutal as the one we now consider.

Haley, one of the assailants, and the one whom it is said used the hammer, is at large. His picture and complete description have been procured from the penitentiary records. There is but one way possible whereby he can be apprehended: the offering of a reward. It cannot be expected that officers here and elsewhere will expend their time and money to secure him unless they are assured compensation. The chances are if a Sacramento officer would incur expense in that regard some crank would contest the payment of his bill from the public treasury; and an officer elsewhere doubtless feels it is none of his concern. The Governor is powerless to offer a reward, except in case of escaped convicts or murderers, and therefore it must be the voluntary act of the citizens of the community where the crime was committed. It strikes us there should be raised among our citizens a subscription of about $500, to be paid for the apprehension of Haley. Unless he has left the country, we feel quite certain he will be captured, and with the efforts that have been and will be made by the local police, there are reasonable hopes that in case Mr. Allen should die within the time the code fixes, the county will furnish some subjects for the Warden of the State prison to execute.

There was broad-mindedness in the selection of "Colonel William Forsythe" to be a National Commissioner from America to the World's Exposition! At the time of his selection Forsythe was a citizen of England, yet had given it to be inferred he was a naturalized American; he had lived in this country some forty years, and thought enough of it to accept our governmental commissions that resulted in profit to himself. At one time we were a major in the National Guard of California, and this same English colonel despatched at the encampment at Santa Cruz an important factor on the staff of the Major-General of California. We supposed, as doubtless did the Americans generally, that he was parading in a uniform that befitted him, and must confess surprise that he is one of the very few who will bear false allegiance to a government he would not sustain in time of peril, and yet seek its honors and its money. The American people have always respected the ill-fated John Andre, and to this day his grave is revered. Washington was right that he would spare Andre if the British would surrender the traitor Arnold—it was a magnanimous proposition. Andre had the redeeming trait that he came not among the Americans under false pretenses; he was a British officer, and it was so understood. We do not assume he would have accepted a commission as colonel on the staff of the Major-General of California, else he declared in advance he was a British subject. That for the mere bagatelle of $6,000 he would have renounced his national birth-right cannot be presumed. The nomination of "Colonel" Forsythe should not be confirmed; if Americans cannot find an American to represent them at the World's Exposition, the matter had better be dropped, so far as we are concerned, and let us permit the balance of the world to control the management of the exposition.

[Written for THEMIS.]

The history of America will descend to future generations stamped with a peculiar interest, not only on account of the paramount influence which she has wielded upon the destinies of mankind, but also on account of the antagonistic and exciting elements which have entered into her civil and political institutions. Let us glance for a moment at the influences which led to the foundation of that government whose sacred guarantee of rights is worshiped by the proud patriotism of every American heart; at the interests which were represented when the corner-stone was laid of that glorious temple of liberty, from whose shrine ascend the anthems of a free and happy nation. We behold on the sunny shores of England, amid her verdant dales and heather hills, a few sturdy men whose minds are beginning to be aroused by the advancing light of civilization, from the dark night of misrule and despotism in which the slumbering energies of humanity have been so long enveloped. Their bosoms are beginning to expand with warmer conceptions and nobler appreciations of the rights of mankind than the proud aristocracy of the government of England, or the legalized theology of the Church of England, is willing to accord to them. And as the first-born thoughts of liberty begin to struggle for utterance, their spirits yearn for an atmosphere in which freedom of thought, of speech, and of conscience may be exercised without subjecting them to the frowns of a despotic government, or the anathemas of a bigoted church.

But where are they to find this boon of freedom—this idea of primitive democracy? They turn in despair from the angry growl of the British lion, and all Europe is shrouded in a dark cloud of barbarism, through which gleams not even the starlight of hope. But lo! from the bosom of the broad Atlantic arises an angel of promise, and points them to the shores of the New World as a safe resting place for the ark of freedom. And as they gaze they behold, with prophetic vision, standing on the rugged cliffs of America, the genius of liberty, with the cornucopia in her hand, and by her side the white-robed angel of hope, bearing the olive branch of peace, and beckoning them on to the "land of promise." Then these heroic men, with that self-devotion and firm determination with which the spirit of liberty always inspires its votaries, gathered up their household goods, and with their wives and little ones bade adieu to hallowed associations of home and all the sweet scenes endeared by the recollections of childhood; to the refinements of civilization and the luxuries of wealth, and went forth voluntary exiles from their native land—pilgrims to a foreign shore, in search of that civil and religious freedom which was denied them by the institutions of their fatherland.

Such were the immediate influences which led to the foundation of the American colonies; and such the men whom these influences led forth to fight the battles of freedom, and prepare a way in the wilderness for the up-rearing of the temple of liberty. And at length, when the harvest of their labors was beginning to ripen beneath the sunlight of that prosperity which always crowns the efforts of freemen, and the smiles of success were beginning to gladden the hearts that had bravely suffered the rough waves of adversity, the huge paw of the British lion was stretched across the waters, and sought to drag into the coffers of despotism that wealth which had been won by the toil of freemen. Ah, little thought he that that spirit which had quailed beneath his frown on his own native shore, had grown amid the forests of America, to be a sturdy giant that would breathe defiance to his power! But so it was. When these patriotic men saw that the hand of tyranny had really found them in their retreat, and was seeking to bind again upon their necks its grievous yoke, they pledged their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors," upon the altar of freedom, and the voice of the United Colonies was, "give us liberty, or give us death." And at the close of the revolutionary struggle which followed—that fearful seven years' "agitation"—they had taught the world this great democratic principle—that the PEOPLE are capable of ascertaining and maintaining their own rights.

Having examined thus briefly, the liberal tendencies which induced our forefathers to seek a home on the shores of America, and having witnessed the fierce contest which they waged in defense of their new-born liberties, we are led to expect that they would form for themselves a social system, based upon the strictest regard for individual rights, and the most perfect equality; that their religious creed would be baptized with the spirit of the largest toleration, and the most liberal faith; and that they would give to the world a declaration of political rights embracing no principle and recognizing no interests which were not in harmony with the purest democracy. But we must not allow our hopes to expect too much, nor ancestral pride to claim too much, from these pioneers in the cause of human freedom. We must remember that the great truths which come to us, sanctioned by the experience of a century, and supported by the sympathies of the civilized world, were to them but new-born theories, evolved by the twilight of civilization, of the truth of which they could not be certain, and against which were arrayed the interests and the power of a world-wide despotism. We shall thus be better prepared to expect and to pardon many defects which we find in those institutions which were the immediate result of their labors. If we examine carefully the early history of our country, we shall find that the spirit of her political, religious and social institutions harmonizes with the great interests of humanity, and the principles of true democracy, in exact proportion as an active, energetic and discriminating intelligence was brought to bear in shaping and molding these several interests. Thus, in guiding our ship of state safely into the broad sea of national existence, in giving tone to our political character, the noblest minds, the clearest intellects, and the purest patriotism of the age were brought into requisition. And the political principles which they evolved come forth as shining lights to the world; and the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States, will long stand as monuments of human wisdom, and embodiments of democratic and republican sentiment.

There is no day in the round of the year in which men ought so fully to lay aside all personal and party differences, all gloomy forebodings and wrathful feelings as on the Fourth of July. Forgetting creeds and classes, parties, isms, and egotisms, we all should join in a generous rivalry of patriotic fervor to make the day what it was intended to be by the fathers. Surely the spirit of the day is one of the most lively hope and joyous expectation. The fathers proclaimed it a day of rejoicing, and their children would indeed be ingrates did they not add to their exultation a spirit of profound gratitude for the exalted courage, iron will and cheerful sacrifice made by them that we might enjoy the benefits of civil and religious liberty.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

On the stage, but no actors—Omnibus drivers.

The wedded life of Justinian was as unhappy as has since been that of many a man married but not mated with an actress. Theodora was not only an empress but a type.

Charles Kemble, when he was once playing Shylock, instead of asking, "Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?" overturned the text and audience by exclaiming: "Shall I lay surgery upon my poll?"

The "Shoo Shoo" dance will be one of the novelties offered by T. H. Winnett, in His Nibs the Baron. A season of forty-two weeks has been booked, embracing a tour of the Pacific Coast.

The chatelaine which Mrs. Kendal wore in the first act of The Squire recently was of pathetic interest. On it are five merry-sounding little silver bells, each one engraved with the name of one of her children.

"Are you superstitious?" asked a bystander of a slowly rising young tragedian. "A little," said the actor sadly. "I have learned from experience that to have just thirteen people in the audience inevitably means bad luck."

M. Sarcey, the French dramatic critic, has given up dining, in the hope of reducing his weight, which is enormous. But while he feels much better for this abstinence, it has not thus far produced the particular effect he so much desires.

A cantata entitled To Our Ancestors has been produced at Brussels by the Choral Union. It is very highly spoken of. The composer, M. Thiebant, "unites in this work both grace and grandeur." The soloists were Mlle. Vandamme and M. Hendrick.

A comedy man's trousers cost more time and as much money as several irreproachable suits. The cut must be so grotesquely horrible, and the patches so artistically variegated, that the construction of such a garment is a serious matter, and only a tailor with skill and patience is equal to the task.

"Did you ever hear how the Marquis de Caux lost Patti?" said a Russian gentleman who was in Chicago a short time ago. "He lost her through his passion for cards," he went on; "and baccarat was the game. No, he did not make a bet of her, but her running off with Nicolini was a result of the noble husband's gambling. It was at St. Petersburg, where Patti was singing, that the rupture occurred. The marquis was introduced at the Yacht Club, where high play at bacarrat was going on. Here, as at the Jockey Club at Paris, a visitor is given unlimited credit, the member who introduces him being responsible. The marquis lost many thousands of francs more than he could raise next day, so he took his wife's casket of jewels and placed it in the hands of his creditors. These were Russian officers. They at once returned the jewels to the diva, sending a note to the effect that they could not accept as the spoils of fortune the jewels which had been earned by a woman. This disgusted Patti with her noble marquis, and it was immediately afterwards that the world heard that she had eloped with the tenor."

Book Chat.

Cap and gown should be worn in every college, and then the rowdy could be punished by taking his uniform away from him for a period proportionate to his offense.

Kipling's famous "Plain Tales from the Hills" was rejected by a London publisher to whom the volume was offered for a mere song. Gunter's "Mr. Barnes of New York" and Jerome's "Three Men in a Boat" met with a similar fate, the publishers' "readers" denouncing them as "rubbish." Perhaps they are, but judging from their wonderful sales subsequently it is apparent that the reading public knows better what it wants than the publishers' readers do.

Perhaps the people who sneer at the novel, and the few who apologize for it, are ignorant of the depth it may attain in a master's hand. There are, of course, all sorts of novels, as there are all sorts of society. The great stories of the present time belong to the realistic school and deal with the facts of life. All that now interests men and women goes into romance. Love, science, art, ambition, aspiration, hatred, all find their place in fiction, and are often treated with such serious thought, that it seems hardly proper to call a novel light reading; in fact, some fiction is purely scientific. It is true that many readers are insensible to the deeper purpose and significance of the novels that they read, and find them only an amusement, but do readers of this intellectual calibre find anything else in other forms of literature? Is history anything more to them than an amusing record, or biography more than gossip? The thoughtful and appreciative reader finds more than amusement in a novel. It gives insight into character, knowledge of different modes of life that is often invaluable. One point may well be commented upon in the novel of the present time, that is the utter exclusion of every form of religious sentiment. Not that they are hostile to religion; they simply fail to recognize it. There is perhaps no great liking for a novel in which a parade of devotion and pious sentiment is made, still, in the portraying of characters who have been reared in the midst of Christian influences, it seems hardly in keeping with the realistic tendencies of the day to describe them as if there were no such thing as Christianity. This is a question in the interest of art. Possibly the novel might not be improved, but it is certain that the pictures of life are not true or sufficient that do not give the measure of the influences that make up our civilization and help to form the average man and woman. There is a great deal of importance given to the high character of imaginative work. Still, wretched sentiment, the product of mental haziness not of imaginative force, often usurps these honors. It is often easier to describe a bit of imaginative sentiment than to describe the beauty, the significance and the underlying meaning of the things about us. Imagination proves its worth by its force and quality. Realists cannot abandon it, because it has its place with the realities of life. The successful novel-writer understands its power, and his ideal scenes have an ineffable charm. The novel is the world which the author creates; every scene he pictures, if he understands his work, may be a possible fact. The people we read of are not only the creatures of his imagination, they are people of our own imagination. They possess the qualities or reality, only they are never stupid, unless it be with a stupidity that is amusing, and therefore welcome. It is safe to assert that no class of literature has the influence possessed by novels. A well written novel is the picture of the age it describes, or of the time when it was written. The scholar who wishes to become thoroughly familiar with any period of history must read the novels of that period. If he wishes to trace the progress of the world, to understand the growth of any school of art or literature, the novel will give him a more graphic view of it than will the history or biography of that period of which he is to learn. Dr. Johnson has said, "A man ought to read just as inclination leads him, for what he reads as a task will do him little good." One of the great values of fiction is the possibilities it suggests. It demonstrates what life can be. It impresses the full worth of possibilities.

Professional Chat.

Our punishment for murder still is for the assassin's attorney to talk the judge to death.

The royalty sharp, when beaten at dice,
May well deprecate action at law.
If he thinks the company not over nice
He should forever forswear baccarat.

The Chinese doctor who said he could cure a patient quicker for $10 a week than for $5 may not have been discreet in the admission, but he certainly was more frank than some of his brothers of the medical profession.

Dr. Talmage thinks that "the most damaging thing on earth is a religious controversy," and says that "no man can ever come out of it as good as when he went in." Talmage had a sensible streak when he voiced this language.

A Philadelphia surgeon says that by three strokes of the lancet he could paralyze the nerves acted on to make a man get mad, and thereafter any man could pull his nose, cuff his ears, and spit on his boots, and he would simply smile a soft, bland smile.

Spurgeon's first convert was a woman. Disraeli attributed his success in life to another woman. Still another ruled England when all this was going on, and others still set the Tranby Croft scandal going, uncrowned Parnell, and retired Sir Charles Dilke. This is evidently woman's inning in the tight little isle.

Mrs. Sutro, the first woman law graduate of New York, passed a brilliant examination at the university, and is now successfully teaching a large law class of women, and convincing the most unbelieving who know her prowess that there is no reason why women may not be called to the bar and practice successfully.

"Your boy is simply a depraved boy, Mrs. Bronson," said the physician. "You need a doctor of the soul, not one of my profession." "I don't know, doctor," said the tired little woman, "but what you might help me a little with advice." "No, madam, the only thing I can prescribe for him is a mixture of strychnine and prussic acid."

Chief Justice Fuller is said to dislike the sombre garb in which the Justices of the Supreme Bench array themselves. He prefers lighter hues in his garments, and his street attire this summer comprises a white high hat, a light-colored Prince Albert coat and light trousers. Inasmuch as his wavy hair and silky mustache are almost white Mr. Fuller presents a picturesque figure on the streets.

Here's the latest yarn about Secretary of the Treasury Foster. He sprung a little joke on his private secretary while the two were traveling from Washington to New York on the congressional limited one day last week. They dined on the train, and while at dinner Secretary Foster remarked: "You'll get dyspepsia, surely, if you are not careful." How's that? "Perhaps you don't know that you are eating at the rate of 50 miles an hour." The private secretary said that he would stop the train.

Judge Carpenter, the Senator from Los Angeles, during the session of the last Legislature was noted for his quaint though firm course on all public matters; he was also the right bower of the administration. The Judge in common with very many statesmen was not averse to indulging in an occasional toddy. One day he met Railroad Commissioner Wm. Beckman on the street, and was invited by the latter to go into "Capt." Siddons' saloon to sample his whisky. While en route for that place, they met Colonel Humbert and A. J. Johnston, who were also invited to join the party in liquid refreshments. Now, everybody knows the peculiarities of Capt. Siddons, and his original and arbitrary rules in dealing out his liquid viands. Beckman laid a big dollar on the counter to pay for the four drinks, whereupon Judge Carpenter, who has some fixed notions regarding his tastes for drinking, ordered "a little straight Bourbon, with appolonaris on the side." Capt. Siddons, in his usual gruff manner, announced that "I don't give appolonaris on the side with my goods." Beckman's face flushed up a little, fearing that Judge Carpenter would take offense, and in as pleasant a manner as possible suggested to Capt. Siddons that there was money enough on the counter to pay for any additional orders. The "old Captain" then said, "All right; but I always tell my customers when any extra is ordered, so that they may understand me." Meantime Col. Humbert, in order to pass the whole matter off in jest, said, "By the way, Judge Carpenter, I want to introduce you to Capt. Siddons, the greatest old crank in town." But before the introduction took place, Judge Carpenter, in his decided manner, said; "Excuse me, sir; I know enough of damned old cranks already, and I don't wish to form the acquaintance of any more." The party took their toddies in silence after that, and Beckman was mighty glad to get out.

Our National Ensign.

The stars and stripes, the eloquent emblem of our political liberty, and the sublime symbol of our national unity, was 114 years old June 14th. This splendid ensign of the republic is "now known and honored throughout the world, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as 'What is all this worth?' or those other words of delusion and folly, 'Liberty first and union afterwards,' but written all over its ample blue, in letters of living light, as it waves over the land and over the sea, and in every wind under the whole heavens, are those words dear to every true American heart: 'Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable.'"

Notwithstanding the fact that the national flag was officially adopted on June 14, 1777, it was not actually the original flag with thirteen stripes. Gen. Washington displayed, at Cambridge, Mass., on January 2, 1776, the original of the present United States ensign, with the exception that in the upper left hand corner, in place of the stars, there were the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George, representing Scotland and England. Then there was what was called the "rattle-snake flag," a flag with simply thirteen stripes and a rattlesnake running diagonally across it, with the significant words beneath, "Don't tread on me."

Capt. John Paul Jones is said to have been the designer of the latter.

The flag of 1777 was a combination of thirteen stars and thirteen stripes, signifying national unity and perpetuity.

Gen. Washington, co operating with a committee of the Continental Congress, designed the new form of the flag, and it was made in a little old upholstery shop in Philadelphia by a Mrs. Betsy Ross.

The first flag approved by the congressional committee in charge of the matter was 6 feet 6 inches long and 4 feet 4 inches wide, and the proportion of length to width has continued to this day.

The first public exhibition and recognition of the new flag was on August 3, 1777, when it was hoisted for the first time at Fort Schuylers.

The flags were hoisted on the public school buildings this morning, and the school children sang the national hymn.

There have been many changes of fortune during the past 114 years, administration succeeding administration, representing many and divergent public and party policies, but the glorious old flag has remained the one ensign of the republic, adding star to star in a growing glory of strength and splendor, refusing to pale the radiance of its starry constellation before the fitful glare of the meteor of war. And to-day it proudly waves, unstained and luminous, in the bracing air of freedom and in the sluggish air of tyranny, as the universally acknowledged emblem of liberty and patriotism.

NOTES.

Even a girl who realizes how thoroughly wicked it would be for her to flirt cannot help feeling a little flattered by admiring glances from the horrid young man across the way.

The richest colored man in Pennsylvania is John Clark, of Pittsburg, who began with a humble blacksmith shop twenty years ago, and has made a fortune of $200,000. He seems to have solved the problem of bettering the negro's condition by the simple remedy of hard work.

It is said there are only two words in the English language which contain all the vowels in their order. They are "abstemious" and "facetious." The following have them in irregular order: Authoritative, disadvantageous, encouraging, efficacious, instantaneous, importunate, mendacious, nefarious, precarious, pertinacious, sacrilegious, simultaneous, tenacious, unintentional, unequivocal, and vexatious.

Indian corn is the only great staple of the country which requires an intense heat to develop it. Wheat would grow quite as well if it were cooler. The best wheat belts of the future are hundreds of miles north of this latitude. Oats, barley and other cereals grow well close up to the Arctic circle. Peaches require heat, but grapes, pears, apples, cherries and most other fruits do well in a temperate climate.

The marble statue of Pope Leo XIII, executed in Italy by Luchetti and presented to the Catholic university in Washington by Count Joseph Loubat, will be shipped to this country within a few weeks. The statue represents the pope seated on his throne, wearing the tiara, or triple crown, and the rich robes of his office. The right hand is elevated as if the pope were about to pronounce a blessing. On the pedestal is a Latin inscription composed by the pope himself.

Mrs. Julia Dunn, an artist of renown, has her studio in East Twenty-third street, New York, where her works of art are a wonder to all visitors. Mrs. Dunn is a former Sacramentan and well known as accomplished in literature as well as art. Mrs. Jos. Glover, her sister, and William Paine, her brother, both reside in this city. All Sacramentans feel a just pride in the success of Mrs. Dunn. A couple of years ago she astonished the Parisians at the Art Exhibition.

The Bee is thirty-four years old. The seventieth volume has been commenced. Our neighbor has been a part of the State ever since its advent. The history of this State for thirty-four years is contained in its columns; indeed, therein can be found the history of this country from the earliest records. On all subjects of a public character the Bee has opinions; there is never any half-heartedness about our neighbor. Possibly, at times there may be severity, but it will give all sides an equal show. The Bee is a necessity in this part of the State.

Astronomers are watching with great interest the convulsions now visible upon the surface of the sun. The spots are more numerous than ever and form ragged groups, against which the surrounding surface shines with increased brilliancy. Great explosions are hourly occurring, in which enormous clouds of metal vaporized by the intense heat are being thrown out to a height of thousands of miles. It is a favorite theory that solar disturbances produce atmospheric outbursts on the earth. We shall have an opportunity to test this belief pretty thoroughly before the summer closes.

The great bereavement of Governor and Mrs. Markham in the loss, by death, of their daughter Genevieve, has tended to bring on the dangerous illness of the Governor. Governor Markham has for a quarter of a century suffered from the effects of a wound received in battle, and at times when subject to over exertion or strong emotions illness is produced. The long illness of his little daughter, and the painful anxiety attending, has overcome the body and brought on this sad illness. We trust that this affliction of illness may be but temporary and that we will soon see the Governor at his desk.

With tingling ears and frostbitten fingers the Esquimaux in his northern home is now chafing his stiffened hands as he cowers before the chilling wind. Towering pinnacles of ice, green and blue, stand motionless where the frigid waters of the open sea lap their crystal sides. On land the desolate waste gives way over enormous stretches of drifted snow, and bleak, biting winds rush over them, piercing the shivering natives to the marrow. The entire land lies locked in the embrace of the frost, and the thickly bundled walrus hunter hastens to shelter as the sharp blast whips across the open and benumbs him with its insufferable cold.

N. B.—The above paragraph will be found soothing if read three times a day during the present weather and the hot spells of July.

There may not be any royal road to wealth, but there is a royal road to learning. When a man gets rich the world is willing to regard everything he says as the utterances of a sage.

General John T. Carey has permanently located in the law practice in San Francisco, and has offices in the new building of the Clay-street bank, at the northwest corner of Sutter and Montgomery streets. He will practice in the Federal and State courts.

The most munificent restorer of Windsor Castle was George IV, whose architect was to him what William of Wykeham had been to Edward III; yet George the Magnificent rarely lived in the castle itself, his favorite residence, and the place where he died, being an uninteresting but most costly example of rusticity, called The Cottage. It is since the accession of her majesty that Windsor has resumed even more than the pristine state and magnificence, and within little more than a generation.

The inability of man to limit the possibilities of electricity is becoming daily more manifest. Passenger rapid transit at 150 to 200 miles an hour is close upon us, and may possibly be adopted before Mr. Edison perfects the instrument that will show us the actual image of an actor on a distant stage with every action and expression accompanying the voice which is heard at the same moment. Telegraphing without wires has been already practiced, and now Mr. Nikola Tesla convinces us by actual demonstration that not only can incandescence be maintained with one wire, but that for certain descriptions of electric lighting wires may ultimately be dispensed with altogether. Little less wonderful than these marvels, from another standpoint, is the gun, exhibited in New York during the last week, which fires with such astounding rapidity that by sufficiently elevating the muzzle the 600 cartridges which constitute one charge can all be discharged before the bullet from the first of them has fallen to the ground, and each cartridge is discharged singly.

THE FOURTH IN EARLY DAYS.

Celebration of the Fourth of July in San Francisco in 1852—Chinese in the Procession—They were Voters Then.

On Monday, July 5, 1852, Independence Day was celebrated in San Francisco in a hearty and enthusiastic manner. The local papers of that early period challenged the older eastern cities to equal the display. There was an elaborate procession and a display of fireworks. The following feature of the procession, however, would hardly find place in the displays of to day:

"By far the most beautiful and unique display was that of the Chinese, who brought up in the rear. Their numbers alone formed a procession worthy the great empire they represent. Several carriages were filled with the probable aristocracy of the Chinese residents of San Francisco—other carriages were filled with musicians playing upon wind and string instruments, and making some of the most indescribable music ever heard outside the Celestial empire. Although theirs may appear 'random fiddling' by some, we have no doubt that the music was a national march, sufficiently intelligible to Celestial ears. Another carriage was occupied by a severe drummer, and cymbal and gong men, who caused roars of laughter by his style of playing; the one who made the most noise was considered the best fellow. One wagon contained a most magnificent affair, which seemed to be the representative of an imperial junk, or some such thing, with tawdry ornaments, the whole of which was encased in glass. Their most splendid exhibition was their grand banner, exhibiting hobgoblins, griffins and sprites, with a dragon lifting up his vast length to swallow the moon, which shone above. This magnificent affair, which cost $700, was borne by a huge Chinaman, assisted by four pigmy brethren attired in a tasteful manner, waving their fans and swinging pigtails. Their whole show glittered with an endless variety of picturesque and showy displays. Firecrackers were let off by them during the march, and an amusing scramble occurred among the boys to obtain the unexploded. Notwithstanding all the national pride and patriotism exhibited, the day would have passed off rather dull without the aid of our Celestial friends."

In this connection, it will be of interest to know that at the Presidential election of 1852 votes were received from Chinese in San Francisco, as would be indicated by the following extract published in a journal of that city the day after the election:

"Chinese Voters.—The Celestials seemed to take but little interest in the grand operations of yesterday, preferring to give their attention to boiled rice and other luxuries rather than to the intricacies of political questions. A few qualified voters, however, gave in their suffrages for the old General (Scott), after ascertaining that he had done some service for his country—in which light his opponent did not stand."

NEW YORK LETTER.

Chauncey Depew—Jay Gould and the Elevated Railroad—State Camp of Instruction—Gen. Franz Sigel—Warm Weather.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, June 25th.

The trial of the directors of the New York and New Haven railroad for the accident of last February brought quite a number of semi-conspicuous gentlemen to the front again. Of course Chauncey Depew was the principal figure. He is probably the best known man in New York city to-day, and his goings-outs and comings-in have the same attention accorded them as though he were of royal blood. One day this week a certain paper took sufficient interest in his movements to publish a paragraph to the effect that he wore a nobly straw hat on the day of the trial, quite a departure for the staid gentleman who presides over the destinies of the Vanderbilt system; a departure quite excusable, however, as the acquittal, although somewhat of a "Scotch verdict," practically establishes the precedent that the directors of a railroad are not responsible for faults in the management.

There is no question as to who is the philanthropist who is enjoying the advantages of the "L" road system of New York. Everyone knows of the little man with the brownish-grey whiskers, who has his office in the Western Union Telegraph building. But now there is another story going the rounds, that Jay Gould was not the author of the stilted system of rapid transit that rules the city, but that Rufus Gilbert was the father of the great enterprise. That he had met with great difficulties is well known, and at last died in poverty. His sister is the authority for the statement that the original charter papers were never carried out by the present elevated railroad company.

The State Camp of Instruction at Peekskill has a fascination for certain classes of people, notably the pretty girl, who is caught by the bright uniforms and accoutrements, and the war veteran, who thinks he can see in a camp organized on the principles of a city in peace times something resembling his experiences in "Dixey" during more troubled times. Nearly every day veterans in their uniforms visit the camp. The man who was at Gettysburg finds something to remind him of a story; the man who was at Fair Oaks explains how the camp compares in size and equipment with the camp of his time. The river reminds some of Port Hudson, and now and then some brother from the other side will be reminded of "our position at Mobile, sir."

A little old man was seen walking slowly down Park Row the other day, bent with age and bearing evidence of a life of toil and struggle. In the crowd of hurrying men, each intent on his own business, the little man was unnoticed, or only noted as being out of place in such surroundings. A man wearing a G. A. R. button in his coat lapel stopped suddenly and cried, "How do you do, General?" and then whispered a word—the name of a place or the number of a regiment—in the old man's ear. It was General Franz Sigel, a mere wreck of the stalwart leader of thirty years ago. The general stopped for a moment with his comrade and then started on his way, murmuring, "We're both getting old—both getting old." A sad commentary on the loss of his former energy.

With the advent of the warm weather the itinerant vender of cooling beverages and fruits becomes ubiquitous. There is scarcely a corner in New York below Fourteenth street but what is occupied by a vender of lemonade, "milk-shake" or fruit. The Georgian watermelon is once more in market and is the delight of the street Arab, as it is of his southern fellow. It is astonishing how much cooling fluid—soda, lemonade, iced milk and the like, to say nothing of beverages not so harmless—the average man can stand during the heated term. According to all other rules of hygiene, one-half the liquid absorbed daily should ruin the digestion of the strongest; but, somehow or other, that the average business man can defy the said laws and yet retain his health, is proved by the facts; for after all, there is a good deal of nonsense talked about the debilitating effect of our rapid American life. Take it all in all, it would be difficult to find a finer or more healthy set of men than can be seen in any gathering of representative business men. There is no doubt but that an equal number of farmers or laborers of the same age would present a far more worried, dispirited, not to say unhealthy look. The average length of life among professional and business men and their assistants compares very favorably with any other class of men, patent medicine advertisements to the contrary notwithstanding.

The neighboring city of Brooklyn has been quite lively of late, as though to disprove the allegation that it is a sleepy town. Within the month two handsome statues to prominent citizens—J. S. T. Stranahan and Henry Ward Beecher—have been unveiled, the latter with considerable ceremony and with the aid of the National Guard. The statue stands facing the city hall and is in every way a fit memorial of the great citizen it represents. The Brooklynites have also been indulging in a School of Pharmacy. Heretofore Philadelphia has been the headquarters for the pharmacists of the United States, the school in that city being considered second to none in the world. But now some of the best chemists and dealers in Brooklyn have procured a charter and launched a new school, under a management that bids fair to make it the equal of any, with a strong tendency to the best. Money has not been spared, and the faculty, as named in the prospectus, represents some of the best talent in this section of the country.

Among the many summer schools of instruction none is more needed than one that shall teach our New York Aldermen and our municipal authorities in general something about the history of the town in which they live. Ignorance makes the average Alderman dangerous. Some years ago the board voted to blot out the name of Chatham street—a name gratefully given to a noted thoroughfare more than a century ago, when the Earl of Chatham was fighting the battle of the colonies in the British Parliament. About the same time they baptized a future fashionable locality Coogan avenue, in honor of a defeated labor candidate for Mayor. Now they want to knock out Astor place, though the Astor Library stands sponsor for the name, and they hesitate to give to that part of Seventh avenue which extends above Central Park the name of Knowlton avenue, not knowing that it will emphasize a brilliant skirmish of the Revolutionary war in which the Americans triumphed, and will mark the spot where the gallant Colonel Knowlton, the friend of Washington, fell in the moment of victory. But great names in history (or, at least, American history) have no significance to the pothouse politicians who have climbed up into the council chairs that were once occupied by De Witt Clinton and men of his class.

It is amazing to see to what proportions the business of gathering newspaper clippings has grown. It began in a single room on Macdougal street. It now employs fifty pairs of hands, occupies the entire floor of a great building, and is only about four years old. This marvel of growth is due to the genius and energy of Mr. Romeike, who is by birth a Russian, but who has had all the spirit and push of a New England Yankee, plus the knowledge of men and affairs which European residence has given him. It is a great thing for the politician to have the comments of the press on his personality placed in his hands from day to day without having to wade through a mass of papers, and this is equally true of the actor, the star preacher, the financier and the professional beauty, all of whom come to the man of the shears to know what the world is saying about them. To literary men the bureau is simply invaluable. I found there the other day a dozen newspaper articles that I must otherwise have had copied from the files, and had I wanted all the articles printed in the last five years on snakes, parrots, dogs or anything else on or under the earth, I could have been supplied. The world is rapidly learning the value of this labor-saving machinery of scissors and paste pot, and presently will wonder how it ever managed to do without it.

The cable conduit for the Broadway line is completed on Seventh avenue between Fifty-first and Fifty-ninth streets, and is well under way as far down as Broadway and Twenty-third street. There are to be two power stations to drive the cable. The uptown station will be at the present car stables, Seventh avenue and Fifty-first street, covering the entire block, and the estimated maximum power is to be 1,400 horses. The principal power station will be at Broadway and Houston streets, and will have a maximum horse power of 2,200. When a cable road was first spoken of for Broadway I was of the opinion that it would be dangerous and a nuisance, but a recent visit to Chicago, and observations of how the cable works there, has made me an enthusiast in its behalf, even in the most crowded streets. It will be a blessing, because it will drive off Broadway the lumbering trucks and drays that now obstruct it, and will make that thoroughfare tenable only for cable cars and carriages—the vehicles of the rich and poor. As for the danger part of it, Broadway cannot possibly be made more difficult to cross than now, and to fall beneath a loaded truck means death as surely as if it were a cable car. Besides, New York would cheerfully sacrifice 100,000 of her surplus population for anything that promises more rapid transit than we now enjoy.

FLASHES.

Our city needs brains, and fewer fools.
Our Police Judge has a fine disposition.
Something of "deep" interest—our gas well.
An honorable enemy would make a good friend.
It is rare that a man squanders hard-earned money.
The less some men know, the more they assume to know.
A rum blossom does not have to be watered to make it grow.
The fashionable woman is not always correct in her habits.
The devil often sits in the pulpit while the preacher discourses.
Dogs and men have summer pants—the dog has fits sometimes.
Telegraph operators always have their work at their fingers' ends.
It is very much easier for the average man to make a sacrifice for a friend than it is to resist telling him afterward that it was a sacrifice.
They say that a woman cannot reason, but as long as she has her faculty of intuition she seems to get along all right. Besides, she can usually get a man to reason for her.

The Day We Celebrate.

To day, wherever there is an American, he will find some manner of giving vent to his patriotism. Throughout the United States Old Glory will be flung to the breeze and our natal day celebrated. The snap of firecrackers and whizz of small fireworks will be heard and seen in the most remote corners of the country. Every hamlet, village, town and city will witness some form of patriotic celebration. This day may be classed as the anniversary of another great event: When the nation was in the throes of internal strife the two great armies of the North and South met on July 1, 1863, at Gettysburg, where the din of battle and the clash of arms continued for three days; but on the morning of July 4th the tidings of victory for the arms of the nation was heralded throughout a grateful country. To-day we are at peace with the world and in harmony at home. While there occasionally appears a few sparks of discord in some of the ultra sections of the South, there is a general sentiment of American patriotism. In Sacramento we will have an old-time patriotic celebration, with parade, oration, mimic and everything that tends to arouse the spirit of "76." Let young and old America have full sway to-day.

Home Again.

Judge Charles N. Post has returned from a trip through the Eastern States. He reports his visit to have been enjoyable, and complains only that it was too brief. Perhaps it is unfortunate that he happened to reach home at this particular time, when about all the business one can attend to is to try and keep cool and comfortable.

A Curious Chemical Anomaly.

An astonishing result was reached by Dr. Richardson, the English expert physiologist, in some experiments on the respiration of animals confined in pure oxygen. In most cases a steady flow of fresh oxygen rendered the animals confined in it excited and feverish, and none were quieted or made sleepy. When, however, the oxygen, after having been passed once through the chambers containing the animals, was collected, purified and again used, all the warm-blooded animals, such as dogs, cats, guinea pigs, rabbits, etc., became drowsy and fell quietly asleep; and when the gas was again used after another purification, the sleep became deeper, and some of the animals soon died. The oxygen appeared chemically pure at each time of using, and the cause of its remarkable change in effect is as yet a mystery. Whether some peculiar modification of oxygen takes place during respiration, or whether the toxic properties are due to some active product of respiration which has escaped detection in the inhaled gas, is a problem which will doubtless be studied with much interest.

He Made Lovely Suveener.

A stout and very red-faced woman of middle age, liberally besprinkled with diamonds, alighted from an oppressively new victoria the other day in front of a swell jewelry shop on Broadway. She stared a long time at a collection of odd spoons in the window and then sallied in and up to the nearest clerk.
"What kind of spoons are them?" she demanded, sticking a pudgy forefinger at the article in question.
"Those are souvenir spoons, madame," politely replied the clerk.
"Indade," said madame, drawing in her breath. "Well, you may just do me up a dozen of them. Our new Frinch cook makes lovely suveener."—N. Y. Tribune.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The splendid play of Men and Women, written by Belasco and De Mille, was presented last night by Frohman's talented company. With such sterling artists as De Belleville, Mordaunt, Kennedy, Morris, Allen and Buckstone as the men, and Misses Sydney Armstrong, Odette Tyler, Maude Adams, Annie Adams, Adela Measor, Etta Hawkins and Kate Massi as the women, a fine rendition must have been expected. The grand situations and sensations of this drama as portrayed by this company brings us to realize what can be done with a good play in the hands of artists. It would be unjust to individualize; the work was perfect; the audience delighted. This afternoon Men and Women will be repeated at the matinee. To night Sardou's famous Diplomacy will be given.

"There are only four eggs of the great auk now in this country," says an oölogist, "and they are valued at $500 each. It seems odd to think of a bird becoming extinct, but no one has seen a Labrador duck, either, since 1856. There are five mounted specimens in existence, but none of the eggs are extant. Kirtland's warbler is another bird that is rare. Until recently but seven had ever been captured, and these were all found in a region near Cleveland, Ohio, less than a mile square. Specimens were worth $160 apiece. But a little while ago a naturalist who chanced to visit the Bahama Islands, came upon a colony of the birds, and knowing what a mine he had struck, shot about twenty and took them to this country. When he began to unload, the story came out and the market sagged, so that now you can get a Kirtland for $5 or $6. The Connecticut warbler is another bird of interest to oölogists, because no one has yet seen its eggs. It passes up the Mississippi river in the early spring, and probably mates far in the interior of British North America, and goes south in the fall by the way of the Atlantic seaboard. If anyone can find the nest of this little fellow, with four eggs in it, it will be $200 in his pocket."

People's Savings Bank

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of George H. Appel, an insolvent debtor. George H. Appel, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said George H. Appel is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at one o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.
Dated, June 30th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. jy4-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of N. IRWIN, an insolvent debtor.—N. Irwin having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said N. Irwin is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said N. Irwin, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated June 29th, 1891.
JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. jy4-5t

1776.

1891.

The Fourth

GRAND PARADE

AND Literary Exercises.

GRAND MARSHAL,

MAJOR W. H. SHERBURN.

CHIEF OF STAFF,

MAJOR JOHN A. SHEEHAN.

Division Marshals:

FIRST DIVISION.....O. W. EARLEWINE

SECOND DIVISION.....J. J. MCKINNON

THIRD DIVISION.....PERRY CURTIS

ROUTE OF PROCESSION:

Procession moves at 10 o'clock sharp—from Sixth and M streets, to Tenth, to J, to Second, to K, to Tenth, to M, countermarch to Third, drawn up in line in review.

FIRST DIVISION.

Patrol of Police.
Hussars, Captain Schumacher commanding, acting as escort to first division.
Grand Marshal and Aids.
Brigadier-General T. W. Sheehan and Staff.
Signal Corps.
First Artillery Regiment Band.
Colonel J. W. Guthrie and Staff.
First Artillery Regiment, Mounted Battery on left.

SECOND DIVISION.

Mexican War Veterans.
Grand Army Posts.
"Goddess of Liberty," escorted by the Sons of Veterans.
President of the Day, Hon. J. W. Armstrong.
Orator, Frank L. Coombs.
Reader, S. Luke Howe.

Literary Committee.

State, County and City Officials and Citizens.

THIRD DIVISION.

Hussar Band.
Fire Department.
Trades' Display.

LITERARY EXERCISES.

(To be held in Assembly Chamber.)

1. Orchestra.
2. Introduction of the President of the Day, Hon. J. W. Armstrong, by Mayor Comstock.
3. Invocation, by Rev. Jos. Levy.
4. "Anvil Chorus"—Mesdames Bonnheim, Pinkham, Ross, Howard, Larkin and Carter, and Messrs. Beaumont, Cohn, Ashworth, Beardslee, Crocker and Phillips.
5. Reading of Declaration of Independence, by S. Luke Howe.
6. "Star Spangled Banner," by the Twelve; solo by Mrs. A. Bonnheim.
7. Oration, by Hon. Frank L. Coombs, of Napa.
8. "Red, White and Blue," by the Twelve; solo by Mrs. Addie Carter.
9. Prayer, by Rev. Winfield S. Hoskinson.

NATIONAL SALUTES

Will be fired by a detachment of Battery "B," First Artillery Regiment, N. G. C., at sunrise and sunset.

In the afternoon there will be an

Exhibition by the Athletic Club

At Clunie Opera House.

By order.

W. H. SHERBURN,

Grand Marshal.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. je27-9t

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Grand Humboldt & Co.
Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

Curiosity—Mythology.

There was a beautiful maiden named Semele, whose mother, Hermione, was a child of Venus. Semele was a favorite of Zeus, and a right lovely maiden she was. The god used secretly to visit this young girl, but after awhile he was discovered by his wife, the amiable Juno. She, however, was not willing that her husband should love anyone but herself, and contrived a stratagem for the destruction of her rival. One day as Semele was sitting at her spindle she was surprised by the appearance of an old woman whom she had never seen before.

"My dear," said the old crone, in a cracked voice, "I notice among the youths that come to see you from time to time one of very noble aspect, who seems to be rather superior to the rest. Would you mind telling me his name?"

"Why," replied Semele, "it is a secret, but if you're sure you'll never tell—well, it's Jupiter himself, the great king of the gods!"

"Pie, you silly creature," responded the old dame, with a leer, "do you suppose you can make me believe such stuff as that? Some people are just vain enough to imagine that the gods themselves would fall in love with them."

"Well," said poor Semele, "if you could only catch a sight of his face and hear his golden speech, you'd believe what I tell you."

"Now, for all that, you are either trying to impose upon me, or are yourself deceived. But you can very quickly prove to us both whether this smart young fellow is indeed King Jove."

"How?" eagerly asked Semele, who, by the way, had some doubts herself on the subject, though she would not have confessed them.

"The next time he comes to see you just ask him to visit you as he is in the habit of showing himself to Juno, clothed in all the splendors of the godhead. But, all the same, I don't believe it is he," croaked the old dame as she hobbled away.

The young girl agreed, and awaited with impatience the arrival of her visitor, who was to call upon her that evening. When he came she could hardly wait for a good opportunity to prefer her request; but presently she asked him if he would do something for her. He, delighted to have an opportunity of showing his love, quickly assented, and asked what it was.

"Ah," said Semele, "that you shall not know until you have sworn to me that you will surely do it."

"But how can I swear until I know what it is?" asked the god.

"Well, you don't love me if you won't promise me just this one little favor," pouted the girl.

She seemed so distressed that at length Jove reluctantly consented, and pledged himself with the irrevocable oath, calling upon the dreadful Styx to witness. Semele then made known her request, and no sooner had she spoken the words than Jupiter at once saw that it was a fatal one. But it was too late to help matters, for, god as he was, he could neither undo his promise nor declare unsaid that which he had spoken; for, you know, "three things come not back: a spent arrow, a spoken word and a lost opportunity." He therefore hurried away to Olympus and there clothed himself in splendor, putting on his terrible glory and mounting his chariot of fire, with the thunder in one hand and the lightning in the other. Thus panoplied he entered the bower of Semele. The sight was too much for the poor mortal and she was immediately consumed to ashes. Thus was Juno revenged, for it was she who, in the guise of the old woman, had suggested this course to the hapless maiden.

This story teaches us how foolish it is to ask for things unconditionally, without finding out first whether or not they are for our good, or trusting to the wisdom of those who know better than we. It also shows how absurd were the ideas of the ancients concerning their deities, for if Jupiter had been a real god he would not only have known what mischief his wife was planning, but would also have known, before she had made it, what the request of Semele would be, for we are taught that "the Lord knoweth the thoughts of men;" and again, our God declares, "before they call I will answer, and while they are speaking I will hear."

Following Legal Advice.

One of the cleverest lawyers in Paris was M. Henri de Mersac. He was about 30, and handsomer than his fellow-countrymen usually are. He was unmarried, and no fair citizeness had gained the citadel of his affections.

"An incorrigible old bachelor," the Parisians said, shaking their heads.

Lawyer de Mersac was well read in his profession, and there was scarcely a law in the statute books that he did not have at his tongue's end. One night as well have expected the Arc de Triomphe to tip over and fall to the pavement with a crash as to expect to see such a clever sprig of the law as Henri de Mersac tricked at his own game by another.

One day a very handsome young girl called to see the famous lawyer and stated her business as follows:

"Monsieur, I am greatly in love with a young man, but he is cold and does not apparently care for me as much as I could wish. So I wish to know if I can marry him against his will in some way? Can I do this?"

De Mersac looked with some interest at this extraordinary client. He saw that she was about 19, a brunette like most of his countrywomen, but far prettier than the average, with a form as lovely as her face. Her beauty was heightened now by a charming blush which suffused her face as she stated her business to the lawyer, who thought that the young man in question was rather hard to suit in sweethearts.

"Yes, mademoiselle, he said you can easily accomplish the object you wish to. All that is necessary is for you to remain on two separate occasions alone with the young man you desire to marry, then go before a magistrate and swear that he is your lover, with witnesses to back you up, and the individual will then either have to become your husband or go to prison."

"That is all, monsieur."

"That is all. By the way, what is the name of this young man whom you wish to render happy in spite of himself?"

"I will tell you at my next visit, monsieur!" answered the maiden, who quitted his presence, promising to call again a week later.

When she called again the lawyer was alone in his office as before, his errand boy and clerk happening to be out on business. De Mersac was much interested in his strange client, and eagerly awaited further developments from her.

The damsel, however, was in no hurry to enlighten him. It was in the summer and the weather was oppressively warm, and the fair girl seemed exhausted by it. She threw herself on a lounge and fanned herself vigorously, but this evidently not sufficing she loosened her dress at the bust a trifle.

"Well, mademoiselle," said De Mersac at last, "how is our affair progressing?"

"Oh, swimmingly, monsieur, thank you! I availed myself of your excellent advice, and have been alone with my intended on several occasions, and I have witnesses to prove it."

"Bravo! mademoiselle," said the lawyer, approvingly. "That's the way to do it. Now tell me the name of this obstinate fellow who seems to be insensible to your charms. Zounds! where is the fellow's taste?"

"Do you really want to know his name, monsieur?" asked the damsel, ignoring the lawyer's compliments.

"Why, yes; tell it at once."

"Well, then, monsieur," said his companion, as she laughed bewitchingly in the lawyer's face, "the young man I wish to marry in spite of himself is named Henri de Mersac—yourself. I followed your excellent advice, and have been on two separate occasions alone with you, which my witnesses below will testify to in any law court. You see, I have played my cards well, monsieur," and the clever damsel blushed and laughed as she surveyed the dumbfounded lawyer.

De Mersac realized that she had indeed played her cards well—too well, in fact, for him.

He had no recourse but to marry her, which he did, and, strange to say, he found his wife to be a perfect treasure, and they adore each other.

A Monster Vessel of Olden Times.
Ptolemaeus Philopater, one of the ancient kings of Egypt, is said to have built a vessel 420 feet long, 56 feet broad, 72 feet high from the keel to the top of the prow, and 80 feet to the top of the poop. She had four helms of 60 feet; her largest oars were 56 feet long, with leaden handles, so as to be more easily worked; she had two prows, two sterns and seven rostra, or beaks. On both poop and prow she had figures of men and animals that were fully 18 feet high. She had 4,000 rowers, 400 cabin boys or servants, 2,820 marines to do duty on deck, besides being provided with immense stores of arms and provisions.

Not long since an eyeless babe was born in New York. Now Arkansas reports a midget with neither arms, legs, nor under jaw. It is time for science to advance beyond such trite processes as transfusion of blood and transplantation of brain, and seriously consider the subject of fragmentary citizenship. Under the constitution the partial remittances above noted, having been born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are American citizens, and an American citizen in a piecemeal state is incompatible with our national dignity. Out of the immense number of persons who ought to be abolished for their country's good the requisite eyes, legs, and jaw to fit out our fragmentary infants should be readily obtainable; if not, the art of grafting is so ample that there is no excuse for not budding the sans legs of Arkansas on the sans eyes of New York, and thus making one more perfect citizen.

A good man once into politics went,
By a singular freak of fate,
And he looked the whole field of politics o'er,
But he never could find his mate.

UNION ICE COMPANY

ARE NOW PREPARED TO FURNISH

Pure Mountain Ice

NEW QUARTERS:

521 AND 523 I STREET.

CHARLES SELLINGER, Agent.

PANTS TO ORDER
$3.50 to $13.50
SUITS TO ORDER
$15.00 to $50.00
1000 Patterns to Select from.
GABEL the TAILOR
426 J STREET.

D. J. MANNIX,

Contractor of Plastering

Kalsomining and Repairing

In all its branches.

Insulation of Steam Pipes and Boilers a Specialty.

Center Pieces, Brackets, and all kinds of Plaster Ornaments for sale.

Residence, 2215 O St.

Shop, 1220 J St.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K.

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a thorough education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of Iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening, Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than

J. SLAUGHTER, Sixth and M streets.

Telephone 318.

E. JAY SWANSON.

Southeast Corner Tenth and I Streets.

The most wonderful cures performed.

OPERA HOUSE

CANDY, ICE CREAM AND SODA PARLORS, 813 K street.

R. P. PEDLAR, Proprietor.

THE

Bell Conservatory Co.

SACRAMENTO.

Floral Work and Plant Decoration

A SPECIALTY.

Telephone No. 155.

W. R. STRONG CO.

Founded 1852.

Fruit Packers

and Shippers.

PROPRIETORS OF

CAPITAL NURSERIES,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Headquarters for ALFALFA SEED and OREGON POTATOES, in lots to suit.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

M. DUFFY,

Manufacturer of Carriages, Wagons, Carts, Etc.

REPAIRING

Done at Short Notice. All Work Warranted.

1111-1113 J Street, bet. Eleventh and Twelfth,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

A-Friendly Hand.

When a man ain't got a cent, and he's feelin' kind of blue,
An' the clouds hang dark an' heavy, an' won't let the sunshine through,
It's a great thing, oh, my brethren, for a feller just to lay
His hand upon your shoulder in a friendly sort o' way!

It makes a man feel curious; it makes the tear drops start,
And you sort o' feel a flutter in the region of the heart.

You can't look up an' meet his eyes; you don't know what to say,
When his hand is on your shoulder in a friendly sort o' way!

Oh, the world's a curious compound, with its honey and its gall,
With its cares and bitter crosses; but a good world after all.

And a good God must have made it—least-ways, that's what I say
When a hand rests on my shoulder in a friendly sort o' way!

An Aunt's Warning.

"Auntie! oh, Auntie! I am going to have a coming-out party, and so everything must be splendid, you know; and I am going to wear the loveliest white silk dress, and have smilax and white roses in my hair and to trim my dress. Oh, won't it be elegant?"

These were the words with which pretty Bessie Lovell greeted her invalid aunt as she danced into that lady's room and threw herself into an easy chair.

Bessie was a very handsome girl. Her curly hair was of a golden color and peeped from beneath her hat in picturesque confusion. Rather tall and very slender, every movement seemed the embodiment of grace.

As her gentle, white-haired aunt looked at her, something in Bessie's face and manner reminded her of her own happy girlhood and its tragic end. While Bessie was chatting away merrily of the coming party and all the expected delights of the winter, her aunt was revolving in her mind as to whether or not she should relate to the gay young girl her own sad experience, as a warning to her now that she was about to enter the social world. Finally she decided to do so, and she said, in her kind, gentle way: "Well, Bessie, I am going to tell you something about my girlhood. As you already know, I was the only daughter of a wealthy banker, who granted my every wish. My mother allowed me to dress as I chose, and I always wore the richest materials, made in the most fashionable and becoming ways. I was really a very pretty girl. My coal-black hair I usually caught up with a single gold dart, and my red cheeks formed a pretty contrast to my black hair and eyes. I was animated and gay and inclined to be rather coquettish; consequently I received a great deal of attention from my gentlemen friends, and I was the acknowledged leader among the girls.

"Of all the young men I knew there was one that I was very fond of, and he was perfectly devoted to me. His name was Arthur. We were engaged, but my parents objected to my marrying anyone while so young—I was only 18—so they made us promise to wait two years. In the meantime we were together as much as possible and spent the time much as other young and happy lovers do, in boating, rowing, riding, driving and dancing. The summer following our engagement a young lady cousin of Arthur's came to make him and his people a visit. She was a handsome brunette, essentially a man's beauty, and attractive in every way. Although Arthur treated me just the same as ever, still I fancied that he was too attentive to his cousin.

"He used to take her out a great deal, and they always appeared to be enjoying themselves very much. Well, one week Arthur did not come near me for four whole days, and I jealously imagined that he was so occupied with his cousin that he could not spare the time to come and see me, and I became very angry and resolved to have absolutely nothing more to do with him.

"Accordingly, the next day, when he came in, happy and light-hearted, bringing with him a very large bouquet of smilax and white roses, and saying, 'My darling, it seems like ages since I saw you last,' at the same time dropping the flowers in my lap, I simply said, coldly, 'I would like to know whose fault it was but your own.' Then in my anger I flung the flowers from me and forbade him ever to speak to me again or to recognize me in any way.

"In vain the poor fellow tried to explain. I would not hear a word, but insisted on breaking our engagement, and, pulling off my ring, I threw it at him.

"He took no notice of it, but looking right at me, said: 'Bessie, do you really mean what you say?'

"I told him 'Yes,' and he went away, saying that I would be sorry some time.

"It was a terrible day; the wind was blowing very hard and the lake was extremely rough. After awhile I went to the window and looked out. To my horror I saw a little boat, with a single person in it, tossing on the waves. I felt sure that it was Arthur, and I called and waved to him wildly, but he did not answer. By this time others had observed the boat, but they could do absolutely nothing to save him.

"The strongest boat could live but a few minutes in those angry waters. The terrible grief—the thought that I had killed my best friend, was too much for me. For days and days I was very ill; my life just hung in the balance between life and death; the loss of my reason was feared. At last I began to slowly recover.

"I then learned that Arthur's body had been found.

"He was buried in the prettiest spot in the cemetery, under a beautiful elm tree.

"I afterwards found out that he had been too ill to leave the house those four days, and that his cousin was engaged to a city man all the time, and so my jealous doubts were utterly groundless.

"This is the reason, Bessie, that your aunt is to-day a lonely, sad old woman. I have told you this, my dear, that you may profit by my experience and not run the risk of ever doing the same yourself."

A Study in Philology.

"How do you suppose the slang term 'he's got his skates on,' meaning a man has taken too much liquor, originated?" asked the inquisitive man.

"It was born in my town," said the solemn young Philadelphian, "a year or two ago. There was a fellow in our set at that time—fact he's still keeping up his record—who answered to the nick-name of William the Third. It is not because he is taciturn, phlegmatic, or in other ways resembles the Prince of Orange that he wears that name, you can bet, for a livelier or lighter chaser of rainbow pleasures never broke a bottle with the boys. One night, I remember, he engaged with several congenial spirits in the merry sport of emptying champagne bottles to the tune of six quarts an hour. This naturally produced a plethora of exhilaration in the party before very long, and William the Third, I regret to say, became so manifestly incapable of steering a straight course that his companions charitably conducted him to a secluded corner of a convenient club and left him there to make repairs with sleep.

"When William awoke some time later the first thing he did was to procure from the steward of the club a block of ice. Then he hired a porter to carry it around to his rooms in a neighboring apartment house. The porter carried it to the foot of the stairs and left it there, much to William's disgust, who proceeded to have a terrible time taking the 50-pound block of ice to his rooms. Finally he succeeded after three attempts, in one of which the ice fell down three flights of stairs and collided with a married sister of William, who was on her way to call upon him. She retired in disgust.

"His idea originally in getting the ice was to produce a large quantity of some cooling beverage. As he entered the room with the ice, however, he knocked down a pair of skates that hung on the wall, and an idea and the steel blades struck him simultaneously. The former was that he could cool off better if he put on skates and rested his feet on the ice. It was a red-hot day in July. He buckled on the skates, seated himself in an easy chair, and with the rapidly melting ice as a footstool, went to sleep. An hour later his cronies found him still asleep with the skates resting on the wet carpet. Since then many a follower in William's footsteps has been charitably covered with the euphemistic phrase 'he's got his skates on,' and it may be said to be a monument in words to the hilarious Philadelphian."

Food for Reflection.

Don't keep the alabaster boxes of your love and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead.

Fill their lives with sweetness. Speak approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them, and while their hearts can be thrilled and made happy by them.

The kind things you mean to say when they are gone, say before they go. The flowers you mean to send for their coffins, send to brighten and sweeten their homes before they leave them. If my friends have alabaster boxes laid away, full of fragrant perfumes of sympathy and affection, which they intend to break over my dead body, I would rather they would bring them out in my weary and troubled hours and open them, that I may be refreshed and cheered by them while I need them.

I would rather have a plain coffin without a flower—a funeral without an eulogy—than a life without the sweetness of love and sympathy.

Let us learn to anoint our friends beforehand for their burial.

Post-mortem kindness does not cheer the burdened spirit.

Flowers on the coffin cast no fragrance backward on the weary way.

Minerva (looking up from her reading)—Aunt Fidelia, the Æsculapian attributes rheumatism to a pathogenic micro-organism which under certain favorable conditions is received and propagated. Aunt Fidelia—I don't believe a word of it. I have had the rheumatism twenty years and I never saw a sign of the creature yet.

Felter, Son & Co.

OFFER TO THE TRADE, IN QUANTITIES TO suit, a full and complete line of choice

Wines, Liquors & Cigars,

Including the Celebrated

GOLD CROWN and DELMONICO

KENTUCKY WHISKIES.

At the Old Stand, 1006-1008 Second Street, SACRAMENTO.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second, SACRAMENTO, CAL.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

A CURE FOR LOVE.

Take 12 ounces of Dislike, 1 pound of Resolution, 2 grains of Common Sense, 2 ounces of Experience, a large sprig of time, and 3 quarts of cooling water of Consideration.

Set these over the gentle fire of Love, sweeten with the spoon of Forgetfulness, skim it with the spoon of Melancholy, put in the bottom of your heart, cork it with the cork of a clear Conscience, let it remain and you will quickly find ease and be restored to your senses again.

These things can be had of the Apothecary at the home of Understanding next door to Reason, on Prudent Street, in the village of Contentment.

Take when a spell comes on a drink from

THE VIDETTE,

228 J STREET, NEAR THIRD, C. A. VIEMEISTER.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

Always a FINE LUNCH on the Counter.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

Grahler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS

LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 Fourth St., bet. J and K, Sacramento.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET,

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO.

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. SCHACHT,

DEALER IN

FAMILY GROCERIES

Provisions, Flour,

Wines, Liquors, Cigars, Tobacco

Southeast Corner Second and M Sts.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

Orders Solicited.

C. T. MILLIKIN,

DENTIST,

1008 Eighth Street,

Between J and K,

Over Dr. W. A. Hughson's office.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON.

ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLOMON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER,
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,
630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney).

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Platonic Friendship.

Platonic friendship between a man and a woman can exist. It exists many times until the man is foolish enough to tell her a love story of his own—and some other woman. It is hard to tell why it is so, but a woman does so hate to hear that their "platonic" friend could love someone else and never has thought of falling in love with her. I overheard a woman telling another woman all about it the other day. They were at a table back of me in a restaurant. She said:

"We have been the best of friends for years. I had never thought of being in love with him nor he with me. If I wanted to go anywhere and had no one to escort me I would always send for him, and he seemed so pleased to come. I never thought that he had no other lady friends; still he never seemed to be tied down to anyone. Then to have him come and tell me all about his having been engaged to that woman all that time! I will never forgive him for it. And, indeed, I'll not call upon her. He is at liberty to marry and marry her or anyone else, but he need not think I am willing to take up any woman simply because he is in love with her. He might have told me of it sooner, then I would not have presumed in the way I have. Men are so conceited. Without doubt he has been thinking I've been on the verge of loving him, if I haven't already. He is the only platonic friend I ever had, and I don't want another."—Teresa Dean, in Chicago Herald.

The History of Kissing.

The mutual kiss of affection or passion by the lips between persons of opposite sex is generally considered to be instinctive. Reichenbach sought to explain it on the theory that the mouth was the focus of his "odde force," and that these two foci of opposite sexes possessed natural attraction to each other. The fact that the mutual kiss between opposite sexes is not general among the tribes of men is abundantly shown by the observation of travelers in the lands where savagery and barbarism still exist. Where it is now practiced it is not probably of great antiquity. In some languages, notably the Japanese, there is no word for kiss. When, however, the kiss was introduced to include women, its vogue, like that of other new inventions, was carried to excess. According to the chronicle of Winsensius it was unknown in England until the Princess Rowena, the daughter of King Hengist of Friesland, instructed the insular Vortigern in the imported salute. Though the Saxon statistics are not probably exact, it is historical that in England, not many years ago, it would have been the imperative duty of a visitor to kiss all the ladies of the household, even without previous acquaintance. Such was the experience of many surprised literary foreigners, notably Erasmus. The contemporary drama shows the usage to have lasted into the Georgian era, and it is to be noticed that the performance was generally called a "salute," sometimes "the salute."

"What was the most unequal conquest mentioned in the Bible?" asked the athlete at the table. The boarders all suspended operations with the knife and fork, racked their brains, but could not guess. "Tell us," they cried in unison. "'The mustard seed sprang up and waxed a great tree.' Don't you remember reading it?" he asked in great surprise.

THE PASTEUR GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JUST RECEIVED.

A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES AND CARD CASES, OF THE LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

H. WACHHORST

Leading Jeweler of Sacramento

SIGN OF THE TOWN CLOCK,

No. 315 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

J. R. HODSON, THE LEADING PHOTOGRAPHER IN AMERICA

Studio, 521 J Street.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co. FRED. SCHNEIDER

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST.

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

R. DAVIS, NOTARY PUBLIC, Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh,
Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J Street, Sacramento.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,
Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,
SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHREIER,

TWENTY-THIRD STREET, BET. Q AND R,

CEMENT SIDEWALKS,

Garden Walks, Carriage Drives, Etc., constructed at shortest notice, in the most workman-like manner and at lowest rates.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.
Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,
WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS
AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

Telephone No. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS.

J. H. DOLAN

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES, Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,
SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

Telephone 248.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

RAILROAD TIME TABLE.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

June 25, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6-30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11-15 A
3-05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8-10 P
12-50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4-20 A
4-30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7-00 P
7-00 P	Knight's Landing and Marysville	7-25 A
10-50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9-35 A
12-05 P	Second Class, Ogden and East	2-25 A
11-00 I	Central Atlantic Express	8-15 A
3-00 P	Ogden and East	10-30 A
3-00 P	Oroville	10-30 A
3-00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10-30 A
10-40 A	Redding via Willows	4-00 P
2-50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11-40 A
4-35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12-30 A
6-30 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11-15 A
8-40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10-40 P
3-05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8-10 P
10-00 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2-00 P
10-50 A	San Jose	2-50 P
4-30 P	Santa Barbara	9-35 A
6-30 A	Santa Rosa	11-15 A
3-05 P	Santa Rosa	8-10 P
8-50 A	Stockton and Galt	7-00 P
4-30 P	Stockton and Galt	9-35 A
12-05 P	Truckee and Reno	2-25 A
11-00 P	Truckee and Reno	8-15 A
6-30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2-30 P
6-30 A	Vallejo	11-15 A
3-05 P	Vallejo	11-15 A
6-35 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2-40 P
*3-10 P	Folsom and Placerville	*11-35 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

Draws Exchange on all the Principal Cities
of the World.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

CAPITAL STOCK PAID UP - - - $225,500 00
RESERVE AND SURPLUS, - - - 54,253 26

Term and Ordinary Deposits Received.
Dividends Paid Semi-annually.

Money Loaned on Real Estate Only.

WM. BECKMAN, President.

GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier.

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

R. A. OLMSTED.

S. P. OLMSTED.

Fourth Street Cash Grocery

R. A. OLMSTED & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

Fruits and Vegetables, Provisions, Flour, Hay, Grain,
and all kinds of Mill Stuffs.

Wines, Liquors, Cigars and Tobaccos.

400 L Street, S. E. cor. Fourth, Sacramento.

Fresh Butter and Eggs a Specialty. Goods delivered free of charge to any part of the City, R. R.
depot or Steamboat landing. Highest price paid for Country Produce.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND

JEWELRY.

UNCLE ICK'S, 302 K Street, Sacramento.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1891.

No. 21.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

There was a time in the history of THEMIS when we felt extremely lonesome—the time when of the journals of this city we stood alone in advocating the granting of franchises to the "Electric Street Railway" and to the "Electric Lighting Company." Our readers will recollect that both franchises were granted against determined opposition; particularly was this the case with the "Lighting franchise." Our contemporaries have come to see that the position of this paper was correct, and that the granting of these franchises has resulted in the modernization of the city and in substantial benefit to the people. The patronage the Central Street Railroad is receiving practically demonstrates the feeling of appreciation the public has for the magnificent system the company has put in operation; it will not be contended that much good resulted from the introduction of the new lighting system and of electric moters. As an example of the utility and economy of the application of electric power, we instance that the printing presses in this office are driven by an electric engine, steam has been dispensed with; beside the job printing done, three journals are published from our presses. It is gratifying to us we are not now lonesome, for our contemporaries have of late been vying with each other in demanding the granting of additional franchises for street railway lines, by the Trustees. We can but repeat that for which we have always contended: That the Trustees should make these grants under reasonable and just limitations. It is manifest that Mr. Carey will, if proper encouragement is given him, extend his street railway lines and equip them with new rolling stock propelled by mechanical power. It is also apparent that the Central Railroad people contemplate extensions and improvements.

We cannot see why the Trustees should decline to act in matters so manifestly beneficial to the people. It is not at all unusual to hear favorable comment by strangers of the "J" street road. The operation of those lines has disproved the doleful predictions made at the time they were proposed. We remember some of the more sympathetic were fearful that the projectors of the enterprise would lose money; others opposed it that the poles would be unsightly, while others were alarmed that persons might catch hold of the wires and be killed. The result has been the road has paid, and no one has been killed; there has been furnished most excellent accommodation to the large population who have made their homes in the eastern and southern portions of the city, and it is but reasonable to suppose that the population in those sections will constantly increase. People must be educated to use street railroads, and they are apt pupils. In San Francisco few think of walking any considerable distance. The history of this city is showing an approach to the same custom. The first street railway was built in early days for a short distance up "I" street. We are told the rails were of strap iron spiked down to timber stringers. It was a primitive affair, and of short life. Later on the line now owned by Mr. Carey was partially constructed, and under several different managements; it was perhaps not self-sustaining. The energy of its present owner has much increased its trackage and its general accommodation, and it is now a good piece of property. It is but natural since the establishment of the electric road that the old line must be improved, and of course it will be if its owner is not hampered by impolitic action or non-action of the Trustees. We congratulate the people that upon these matters the press has at last become united, and for ourselves feel we will not again be compelled to make a lone fight against our more pretentious contemporaries.

Hannibal Hamlin, the fifteenth Vice-President of the United States, died at Bangor, Maine, on the night of July 4th, at the age of 82 years. Twenty-two men have filled the second executive place since the establishment of the American government; all are dead except the present incumbent, Mr. Morton. John Adams reached the greatest age of those who filled the office—ninety. William A. Wheeler was the youngest, dying at the age of 41. There is something of coincidence in the dates of death of our executive heads. Jefferson and John Adams died on the same day—July 4, 1826; Monroe died July 4, 1831; and now Mr. Hamlin dies on the anniversary of Independence Day in 1891. Many of the Vice-Presidents aspired to the presidency, yet in but three instances did the people make the promotion—the cases of John Adams, Jefferson, and Van Buren. Fillmore and Breckenridge did secure Presidential nominations, but suffered defeat. Mr. Hamlin was the last to survive of those who ran before the people for national office in 1860. In that year four tickets were presented: The Republican, with Abraham Lincoln for President and Hamlin for the second place; the Northern Democrats named Stephen A. Douglas and Herschell V. Johnson; the Southern Democrats John C. Breckenridge and Joseph Lane; and the Union Constitutional party John Bell and Edward Everett. Thirty-one years seems short; however, few who were prominent actors then now live. Every member of President Lincoln's cabinet is dead; the two selected to be Vice-Presidents under him have passed away. There are now living but two ex-Presidents—Hayes and Cleveland. As a stepping stone to the presidency the office of Secretary of State ranks higher than that of Vice-President. It had been filled by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Adams second, Van Buren, and Buchanan. Mr. Hamlin lived to a ripe age; his life was useful; he filled distinguished place modestly and satisfactorily.

There is an indefinite idea among the masses of the powers and duties of the new Circuit Court of Appeals. Congress at its last session passed an Act to relieve the over-burdened Supreme Court, and provided for the facilitating of judicial business. The judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of treaties, and all cases arising under the Constitution; to all cases affecting ambassadors, public ministers and consuls; to controversies between States, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, or between the State or a citizen thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. Up to the passage of the Act creating the new court, the Federal Supreme Court had exclusive final appellate jurisdiction in all cases excepting cases affecting ambassadors, public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State is a party. In these cases the Constitution confers original jurisdiction. The late Act of Congress takes away all appellate jurisdiction from the former Circuit Courts, and transfers it to the Supreme Court, or the Circuit Court of Appeals. Appeals must now be taken from the District and Circuit Courts to the Supreme Court in all cases where the jurisdiction of the court is in issue, in appeals from final decrees, in prize cases, in convictions of capital or infamous crimes, in cases involving constitutional questions or treaties, and in cases where the Constitution or law of any State is claimed to contravene the Federal Constitution. Subject to this exclusive jurisdiction, the decrees of the Circuit Court of Appeals are final in all cases where the jurisdiction is dependent upon the opposite parties to the litigation being aliens and citizens of the United States, or citizens of different States. These decrees are final in all cases arising under the patent laws, under the revenue laws, criminal laws, and in admiralty cases. This jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of Appeals is great in its extent. When the Supreme Court has cleared its present calendar, the jurisdiction will be confined to international and constitutional questions and high crimes. Hereafter there will be nine Circuit Courts attending to the business which has heretofore clogged the administration of justice. The result will be a prompt hearing of that class of cases which have heretofore been delayed by the great volume of judicial business. Nine of the great powers of the Federal Supreme Court have been taken away. Only final appellate jurisdiction has been given the new courts; certiorari and writs of review lie from the Circuit Court of Appeals to the Supreme Court in proper cases. The clear and lucid provisions of the Act of Congress creating these new courts will relieve the court and the bar from much labor, and hasten litigation to an end. The President will not appoint the nine Circuit Judges until next December. It will probably be two years before the full benefit of the law will be felt.

Some little has been said that there should be erected in this county a new court-house. It is certainly much needed. The present building was not constructed for court-house purposes, but for a State Capitol, and in a very early day. Years later, when the present Capitol was occupied, there was a remodeling of the court-house building; it was raised, a jail built beneath it, and the partitions in the upper stories changed, to in a measure adjust the building for the purposes for which it has since been used. As it has since been, the prison is beneath the two court-rooms and some of the offices, and as the condition now is, there are over seventy prisoners confined in the jail at night. The atmosphere in the rooms above, particularly in the morning, is certainly not conducive to healthfulness. The jail is kept as cleanly as possible, but there can be no such a thing as preventing the prison smells from permeating the court-rooms above, in which, at times, large numbers of citizens assemble. If the county authorities should determine to erect modernized public buildings, the jail should be made separate from the general building. It is a rule in sanitary science that where large numbers of people are domiciled as in prisons and asylums the very earth becomes contaminated, let the precautions be the very best. It should not be, however, that such results as may flow from this contamination should affect citizens who may be called to serve as jurors and witnesses, or whose public offices are required to be held in the rooms immediately above. Much would be added to the regard in which Sacramento county will be held, if there would be erected here a court-house that would compare with the new one recently built by our plucky neighbor, San Joaquin. It is perhaps useless to further suggest that the city needs accommodations for the municipal court and officers. Perhaps the people will awaken to the pressing need when the mass of bricks and the tank of water we have used for City Hall and jail purposes will redeem their promise and tumble to the ground. Ambition is perhaps laudable in cities so modern as ours. In ancient days cities cultivated ruins that today are regarded as wonders. People spend their money to travel and visit them, and look upon them with reverential awe that they are antique. Will time come Sacramento will rival the extinct cities of former ages, and that tourists will come here to gather mementoes of its glory when it did exist? Possibly the world will endure to an age when a new and progressive people will excavate for bricks that tradition will say formed part of the stately building in which our triumvirate made the laws and in which they were administered by the Praetor.

The New York penitentiary authorities seem to have reduced executions by electricity to almost a perfect science. It was evidenced in the cases of the infliction of the death penalty on four murderers this week. It is a pronounced improvement on the barbarous system of hanging. As human experience has demonstrated that public executions are not deterrent of crime; rather, it seems they have the effect to stimulate it. In early days criminals were hanged publicly in this city near Sutter's Fort, and people gathered from all the surrounding country to witness them. Later on there was more privacy, and several met their doom in the old water-works building, a trap being cut in the second floor through which the condemned were dropped. Of recent years executions have taken place in the county jail yard. The step taken by the last Legislature, that all executions take place in a specially prepared room in the State penitentiary, and in the presence of but few witnesses, is one of advance, and we look for the passage of the New York law at the next session of our Legislature.

The report of the President of the Sacramento Natural Gas and Water Company, submitted to the meeting of the stockholders Tuesday evening, is a document of interest, and has relation to an enterprise we hope and believe will be successful. There has been demonstrated that gas was found at 540 feet; that at 750 feet there was a marked increase, and that as the well was driven further the discharge was augmented. There is no question but that an abundant supply of artesian water can be obtained from borings in this locality. That fact had, however, been established before elsewhere in this neighborhood. Aside from the possibility that gas will be found in quantities that will justify its utilization, the experiment is of gratification to farmers on lands away from the rivers that an abundance of water can be procured from the ground, and the question of irrigation can be solved by the sinking of wells.

We observe that at Oakland there is a probability trouble will arise that the women and girls employed in the canneries are insufficiently paid. From the published reports we do believe there is justification in their course if they should pursue it. At best, a woman who labors for her living has a hard road to travel, unless she is backed by friends of influence. It seems an unfortunate feature in the adjustment of human affairs that one willing to earn an honest living is in many instances not permitted the opportunity, or if permitted is insufficiently paid. Admiration is due to the women and girls who seek to do for themselves, and who are willing to work early and late to earn to support themselves, and in many instances aid those near to them. It would seem more avenues should be opened for their employment, and their remuneration should be commensurate for the labor they perform. Cold business competition should relax, and add sufficient to the selling price of commodities to enable employers to pay living wages to those who do the work.

It is reported that General Booth proposes to buy land in the western part of the United States upon which to found a social colony for the Salvation Army. We hope he will accomplish his object, if his land purchase will be a far distance from here, provided, however, he will induce those now among us, who make the evenings hideous, and who use the streets to mock religion, to permanently locate there.

That the old spirit of the South is not dead is proven by the proposition of the Florida Legislature to make the birth-day of Jefferson Davis a legal holiday. Thus to honor this arch-traitor would be an insult to the loyal North. Fortunately the suggestion has not aroused great enthusiasm even in the South, which is a hopeful sign.

The State Printer of California, Mr. A. J. Johnston, of 410 J street, Sacramento, is one of those men whom friendships cluster around and skill and ability endorse. A better selection would have been a difficult undertaking for anyone, and the wise Governor of California knew a good man when Mr. Johnston's name was presented for the office. An old employee of his, in writing on the subject from Chicago, has these words to say: "We know it, for O'Connell told us so."—American Art Printer.

THE GHOST'S WILL.

"The first will I ever made," said the lawyer, "was for a ghost," pouring himself out a glass of water. "I had just received news that Mr. Busch, a wealthy old gentleman, was dead when in he walked."

"Can you make me a short will that will stand?" he asked in a husky voice.

"I can," I said.

"Well, I want to leave everything I possess to Allan Busch, my sister Ada's only child. Go to work, for I must return to the house," sinking into the chair. "I don't want my other nephew, Potter, to have a cent."

I hurried through the will, and then called in my neighbor, the barber, and his apprentice to witness it. They signed with trembling fingers, for they had heard the news, too, of the old man's death. I watched him go across the fields to his house, not far beyond. The porch lay white in the moonlight, and as the old man was about to open the door some one pulled it from the inside and out walked Potter, with a grin upon his weazen face. It changed as he saw the old man to a look of abject terror. He shrunk aside, clasped both hands over his eyes, uttered a terrible cry, and flew down the path, stumbling in his confusion, and falling flat upon his face among the petunias. I looked back again toward old Mr. Busch. He was gone. The next morning we all heard the news. Old Mr. Busch had breathed his last at 7 o'clock. I confess I was startled, but that was no ghostly arm that leant on mine when I walked up the path with Mr. Busch the night before, and I could not agree with my neighbor, the hairdresser, who declared that it might have been an "appearance."

Lawyer Thursby had a will in his keeping that left everything to Potter, but the date of mine was its safeguard. They tried to prove the old gentleman of unsound mind, but were merely laughed at. My neighbor confessing that he was not sure but that Mr. Busch's ghost made the will that he signed, but swearing to the nightcap and dressing-gown as facts in silk and linen caused much laughter, but the property went to the nephew. He was generous and made a present to Potter, which prevented him from suffering anything, and he was a better heir to the old property than Potter would have been. He made me legal manager of his estate, and we became great friends.

My friend, the hairdresser, however, had a certain trouble on his mind which he confided to me. "It did not come up in court," said he; "but did you notice Mr. Busch's face when he signed that will that night? Close-shaved, not a spot on it, not even blue."

"Yes," said I, "I did."

"I shaved him after he was dead, Mr. Van Buskirk," said the hairdresser, in a hollow voice. "I was called in to do it about midnight, and he had a beard about an inch long. It had been growing ever since he was taken down."

"If I were you, Mr. Farren," I said, "I would not mention that to any one, or permit Samuel to do so. I know it to be a fact, but it is not fashionable to believe in ghosts."

"A year ago," continued Mr. Van Buskirk, taking some more port, "a year ago Allen Busch died. He lived too high—a gay, wild life—though he was a good fellow to the last. He never married. The day before he passed away he sent for me."

"I sha'n't be alive to-morrow," he said, "and I want you to know the truth."

"My Uncle Busch died at 6:30. I came down to see him on the 5 o'clock train, and went up to his room without being seen. No one was there. He was awake and going fast."

"Allan," said he, "you have come to see me."

"Yes, uncle," said I, "I only heard you were ill yesterday."

"If you had only come sooner, Allan," said he. "I've been a fool. I want to change my will. Potter is a sneak. He's anxious to have me die. I—I want you to have my money now. Ada's only son."

"No matter about the will," said I. "No matter about the money, I can live by my profession."

"I've been a prisoner," said the old man. "I have not been allowed to see my friends. The doctor is a tool of Potter's. I—I am neglected, Allan. I've been alone two hours, and I want some water dreadfully."

"I gave him the water, and he put his head on my arm and kissed me. He died that way. Nobody came near us, and I kissed him again and crept downstairs; but as I passed the dining-room I saw Potter and the doctor stuffing themselves, and laughing; and then and there, what, with contempt of them, and a wish to see my uncle's last wish carried out, as well as the natural longing for money that seemed mine by right, I hit upon a plan. I was an actor, as you know, and my line was 'old men.' Moreover, I'm very like my uncle. I went back to his room, gave him one more kiss—he was already cold—took his gown and cap and slippers from the wardrobe, made myself up, and came to you. You know the rest. I've nobody to leave my money to. Potter is dead. You are a rich man yourself. I'd have been the heir in course of time, probably, at any rate. Suppose we give this money to the orphans at the asylum. Nobody has a legal right to it."

"I'll make a will for you to that effect," said I; and so I did.

"Van Buskirk," said he, after the will was executed, "you don't owe me a grudge for having been fooled, do you?"

"Allan Busch," I answered, "I was fooled; I don't deny it, but I guessed it in a week, and I've felt sure of it for a good many years. I'll keep the secret. Get well, boy—get well, old friend."

But he died, and the orphans have the property, and Mr. Farren still believes that he and his apprentice witnessed the will of Mr. Busch's ghost.

Paper Collars.

No one ever inquires in a furnishing store any more for paper collars or paper cuffs, and yet less than ten years ago a big trade was done in these articles. They have, it would seem, gone quietly out of vogue, their retirement curiously contrasting with the hard fight which accompanied their introduction, about the year 1851-2. 'Who was the inventor of them? Necessity in the form of a starveling poet, of whose productions, excellent though they were, the only one remembered to-day is a passage quoted by Fielding in the introduction to the seventh book of "Tom Jones":

"From Thee all human actions take their springs,
The rise of empires and the fall of kings.
See the vast theater of time displayed,
While o'er the scene succeeding heroes tread.
With pomp the shining images succeed,
What leaders triumph and what monarchs bleed,
Perform the parts Thy providence designed,
Their pride, their passions to Thy ends inclined.
Awhile they glitter in the face of day,
Then at Thy nod the phantoms pass away;
No traces left of all the busy scene
But that remembrance says—the things have been."

The last line seems peculiarly appropriate to the subject in hand. But to return. The author was Samuel Boyse, born in Dublin, 1698, son of a minister, brilliant, poor and improvident, as most men of his class were at the time. Cibber, in his "Lives of the Poets," says of him: "Whenever his distresses so pressed on him as to induce him to dispose of his shirt he fell upon an artificial method of supplying one. He cut some white paper in slips, which he tied round his wrists, and in the same manner supplied his neck. In this plight he frequently appeared abroad."

Poets in those days could not set the fashion, else poor Boyse might have anticipated the Count D'Orsay by wearing no collar at all.

Another article not now inquired for is the dickey. This consisted of a shirt bosom and collar combined. They were much called for by the dandies of the Tittlebat Titmouse genus, so finely hit off in Warren's "Ten Thousand a Year."

Some Queer Actions at Law.

The following are some of the alleged nuisances for which injunctions and damages have been asked from sympathetic courts and juries:

In a recent English case an enthusiastic amateur played daily eight hours on a violoncello, and on Sundays a little longer sometimes. To add to the misery caused, the player lived in a flat. The judge before whom the case came decided that three hours was long enough for any human being to play on a violoncello, and the injunction issued.

In a case before the Court of Common Pleas, some time ago, in New York, a person was brought up for trundling in a carriage overhead his teething baby, both by night and day. The judge, who must have been a married man, held that the noise was not unreasonable, and refused to interfere.

In another English case a chime of bells at Deptford was not allowed to ring because the noise was offensive to the majority of the property owners in the vicinity.

The newspapers recently mentioned the sad case of a discharged chorister who took a horrible revenge on the congregation by sitting in a pew and purposely singing out of tune. Whether he was indicted or not for disturbing the public worship does not appear.

There are few annoying sounds which have not, sooner or later, been alleged as nuisances, but the courts hold that many of them must be endured.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

If an American girl cannot be an actress, she can take one step lower, and become a countess.

That new Indian opera with music "of a light, melodious character" rather implies that heavy saw-filing has been the accompaniment heretofore.

Miss Louise Moelson, of Washington, better known as "Nikita," has lately finished her third tour in Russia, which has lasted over a year and a half. "Nikita" is now in Germany, and will take a well-earned rest at Eins previous to resuming her vocation. Her seven years' contract with M. Strakosch terminates August, 1894.

Janauscheck will drop her old repertoire next season and will appear in an entirely new romantic drama entitled The Harvest Moon, written by James M. Martin, an old actor and journalist. At the trial performance in Pittsburg, Janauscheck made a wonderful hit as Mrs. Oakley, and it was pronounced by long odds her best part. She was a revelation of pathetic and intense tragic power.

The clannishness of actors has often been commented on. The daily life of actors is so different from that of people of other occupations, and their associations are necessarily so intimate with other members of their profession, that they naturally come to look upon themselves as a class peculiarly distinct from the rest of the world. This feeling leads actors to seek companionship among the members of their own profession. The late Harry Edwards was, perhaps, the most notable exception to this rule. But he was a scientist as well.

Joseph Warren Jefferson was married to Miss Maud Bender, of Brooklyn, June 13th, and sailed for Liverpool with his bride two hours after the ceremony. The groom, whose stage name is Joseph Warren, is a son of the great comedian, "Joe" Jefferson. The bride was formerly connected with the profession, having been a member of the Annie Ward Tiffany Company. The couple received letters of congratulation and presents from several noted people, among them ex-President Cleveland, William J. Florence and Mrs. John Drew.

Three authors have been at work on the book of the High Roller, but the work of revision seems to be about as important as the original composition of the comedy. W. H. Day has charge of the spectacular part of the production. The first scene represents a magnificent steam yacht at sea, with a panoramic effect in the distance. The costumes have been designed by De Gimm, and Mullaly is to compose a number of songs. There will be the inevitable male quartet, and something which has the tinge of novelty in the form of a feminine quartet. It is the most ambitious effort which has yet been made to place farce-comedy on a spectacular footing.

An embarrassing and yet irresistibly funny incident occurred to me when I was playing Our Jennie at the Windsor Theater several years ago. My old father sits on a stump whittling a stick, and I, in a half-torn dress and ragged hat, am standing beside him talking. This particular evening, just at the above point, I felt the fastenings on my dress give way and the skirt slowly dropping to the floor. Still talking, I endeavored to get across the stage into the wings to fix things up, but he, not being used to see me move away in that part of the scene, suddenly looked up and said aloud, "What's the matter, Jennie?" Finding that the attention of the audience was by this time drawn to me, I resolved to put a bold front on the matter, so walking back, at the same time pulling my dress into place and pinning it, I answered, soberly, "My dress is coming off." The applause and laughter, which you can imagine, was instantaneous. JENNIE YEAMANS.

People who keep a close watch upon things theatrical have manifested considerable interest in the forthcoming production by Charles Frohman of Miss Helyett, a piece which has had a remarkably successful career in Paris. The right of production in America was secured by Manager Frohman through Charles Wyndham, who intends to present the piece at his theater in London. David Belasco is engaged upon the work of revision for the presentation here, and he is well qualified for it, as he saw nearly every performance for a month in Paris, and was in close consultation much of the time with Maxine Bowcheron, who wrote the French dialogue; Audran, who has composed some of his best music for the piece, and the stage director of the Bouffes Parisienne. But Miss Helyett, although spoken of in Paris as an "operette," is by no means a comic opera. It is a comedy, a pure comedy, suitable for presentation, if necessary, without music, but so constructed that the music is an exceedingly attractive element. It is in three acts, with the location and coloring of the Spanish slope of the Pyrenees, and thus susceptible of treatment in a romantic and picturesque way in the matter of stage setting and costuming.

Book Chat.

An American revised edition of Lady Magnus' "History of the Jews" has been published.

Oliver Wendell Holmes occupies a conspicuous place in two periodicals for the current month—Arena and Harper's Magazine.

Twenty thousand words have been added to the English language, in the department of biology, since Darwin's discoveries.

John Felton, the originator of the idea of selling newspapers and books on railroad trains, died at his residence in Buffalo, June 25th.

M. Zola hopes that his forthcoming novel, "La Guerre," will get him a seat among the Immortals. He assures the public of its propriety by saying that there are no women in it.

A posthumous story by John Elliott Curran, who died last year (the author of "Jeanne" and "Miss Frances Merley"), appears in Scribner for July. It is entitled "My Uncle Dick," and is one of the last writings finished by Mr. Curran.

This is the day of the short story. A few years ago the man or woman who offered a volume of short stories to a publisher received the same reply: "Short stories do not pay." But this did not crush the spirit of the short-story writer, and to-day he (or she) triumphs.

A lecturer once prefaced his discourse upon the rhinoceros with: "I must beg you to give me your undivided attention. Indeed, it is absolutely impossible that you can form a true idea of the hideous animal of which we are about to speak unless you keep your eyes fixed on me."

It is well, in this season of college commencements, when so many are receiving school honors and literary degrees for scholarly attainments and studious habits, to remember that true education consists not so much of what is put in as of what is brought out of the student. True education is the educing—the bringing out of all that is best in the scholar and of most value to society.

Gladstone is comparatively a poor man, and the occasional literary work he does for magazines and periodicals is not the result of any desire to add to his established fame as a writer. He takes a very matter-of-fact view of such productions, reckoning them simply as valuable help to the liquidation of his heavy household expenses. For every article he writes he receives $1,000.

There is not now living a single descendant in the male line of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Spenser, Milton, Cowley, Butler, Dryden, Pope, Cowper, Goldsmith, Byron or Moore; not one of Sir Philip Sidney or of Sir Walter Raleigh; not one of Drake, Cromwell, Hampden, Monk, Marlborough, Peterborough or Nelson; not one of Bolingbroke, Walpole, Chatham, Pitt, Fox, Burke, Grattan or Canning; not one of Bacon, Locke, Newton or Davy; not one of Hume, Gibbon or Macaulay; not one of Hogarth, Sir Joshua Reynolds or Sir Thomas Lawrence; not one of David Garrick, John Kemble or Edward Kean.

Poetry is the result of psychical inspiration and semi-unconscious symbolism and expression. Prose, as a rule, is the product of thought or ideality consciously evolved. No poet is "known" by any great number of his compositions. The names of many of the most illustrious ones are familiarly associated with less than half a dozen pieces. These distinguishing productions are their best. They were intuitive inspirations. They were the outcome of themes that pursued the author, not of themes that were chased by him. A good poem will write itself; and as a psychic exaltation is necessarily brief, a good poem has its verbal limit.

Professional Chat.

The late Archbishop Tait, of Canterbury, once made an effective use of a sermon. Driving down Halloway Hill, he was confronted by a runaway horse with a heavy dray, making straight for his carriage. He threw a sermon in its face. The horse was so bewildered by the fluttering of the leaves that it swerved and paused, the driver regaining control. The sermon was picked up and the bishop proceeded on his way. "I don't know," he said to his companion, the present Archbishop of York, "whether my sermon did any good to the congregation, but it was of considerable service to myself."

Judge Glenni W. Scofield was a personal friend of Abraham Lincoln, says the Harrisburg, Pa., Patriot. A Warren county private, having knocked down his captain, was tried, convicted, and sentenced to the Dry Tortugas. His friends urged Schofield to have him released, so he went to see the President and told his story. Listening attentively, Lincoln replied: "I tell you, Judge, you go right down to the Capitol and get Congress to pass an act authorizing a private soldier to knock down his captain; then come back here and I will pardon your man." The Judge says that there was such an air of quizzical earnestness and desire to serve him about the President's manner that they both broke out in an outburst of laughter. The Judge did not press the case further.

The following singular will case comes from Hamburg: Some years ago there died in Schleswig, Germany, a government official named Nielsen. Some little time before he died Nielsen bequeathed to his man-servant 20,000 crowns, and to his cook a like sum, on the condition that if either of them married, the fortune should revert to the other. As soon as the old gentleman died, however, the happy possessors of this fortune went to the altar and were married. The couple then took up their residence in Hamburg, where they have resided for the past six years. Recently there arrived from Copenhagen a relative of Herr Nielsen, who, by their marriage, considered the spirit of his relation's last will and testament had been departed from, and demanded the restitution of the 40,000 crowns. The matter is now before a court of law.

Wendell Phillips, on being asked what was the most effective sentence he ever uttered, replied: "I attended a meeting at Faneuil Hall called for the purpose of creating a public sentiment in favor of enforcing the law which meant the return of Burns to slavery. I attempted to speak and the mob tried to howl me down. I held my position and refused to yield the floor. Finally I pointed to the inscription on the wall, 'God save the commonwealth of Massachusetts,' and stood still for a few moments, steadily pointing. When the mob became curious as to my meaning, the noise ceased, and I said in as loud a voice as I could command: 'If you return Burns to slavery, I, for one, will vote to change that sentence to 'God damn the commonwealth of Massachusetts.' It electrified the audience, and I was not only permitted to finish my speech, but was cheered to the echo by many persons who were in favor of slavery."

Ex-Governor Hoard is one of the best story-tellers in the country, says the Chicago Tribune. On the recent trip to Galena when the Grant monument was unveiled, his fund of stories seemed inexhaustible. One of them was this: "I was down at a little clam-bake in New Jersey last summer, and after dinner was called on to make a speech. I started off by saying that I had eaten so many of their low-neck clams that I wasn't in the best sort of condition to make a speech. When I used the expression 'low-neck' clams an old chap sitting directly across the table from me, whose face was long enough to enable him to eat oats out of a churn, scowled at me, and then said, in a stage-whisper: 'Little-neck clams—little-necks; not low-necks.' I paid no attention to the interruption and finished my speech. When dinner was over he trailed me out into the hall and said: 'You are from Wisconsin, ain't you?' 'Yes,' I replied. 'You don't have many clams up there, I reckon.' 'Well,' I said, 'we have some, but it's a good ways to water, and in driving them across the country their feet get sore and they don't thrive very well.' He gave me a look that was worth a dollar and a half, and in a tone of the utmost disgust said: 'Lord! clams ain't got no feet!' He turned away, and approaching one of my friends, inquired: 'Is that fellow Governor of Wisconsin?' 'Yes,' said my friend. 'W-a-l-l, I'drawled the old man with a good deal of feeling, 'he may be a — smart man in Wisconsin, but he is a — fool on the seashore.'"

Secretary Blaine is fond of anecdote. On being told that it was reported that certain articles written by Gail Hamilton, who was a connection of the family and an inmate of his house, had been inspired by him, he said: "That reminds me of an incident that occurred in Western Pennsylvania. A married woman came with her husband to a justice of the peace to acknowledge a deed, and was asked the usual question, whether she had executed it of her own free will and accord, and without any coercion or compulsion by her husband. Placing her hands on her hips and looking the magistrate in the eye, she replied: 'Why, Judge, I guess you don't know the family.'"

Here is another story the Secretary tells with a relish, relating to President Lincoln and Senator Foot: Blaine had been appointed a member of the joint committee of the two Houses to wait upon the President and inform him that they had assembled, etc. The chairman of the committee was Senator Foot, of Vermont, a very courtly gentleman. On being admitted, Mr. Foot struck an attitude and said: "Mr. President, we have been appointed a committee on the part of the two Houses of Congress to wait upon you and advise you that they have met and organized and are ready to receive any communication which you may be pleased to make to them." Mr. Lincoln walked up to him, and slapping him on the shoulder, said: "Now look here, Foot; if it is a matter of life or death to you, I can send in my message to-day; but if it isn't, I would like to keep it till to-morrow to slick it up a little."

NOTES.

A church in Connecticut has set the example of utilizing its pretty girls as ushers.

The Monroe doctrine has doubtless more than once prevented Hayti from being gobbled by some of the larger European powers, and in return for this, Hayti owes it to herself not to commit hari-kari.

Our local dives, recently licensed by the city authorities, find little trouble to keep up their old-time reputation. Nightly rows, followed by Police Court cases, are about the rule. What in the world is the reason these disgraceful dens are not summarily closed?

President Balmaceda, of Chile, seems to be doing most of his fighting just now in the European press. If the stories of Balmaceda's gross tyranny and cruelty are correct, there will be many secret sympathizers with the Chilean insurgents, whose stubborn fight has already half convinced the world of the justice of their cause.

The Sutter Fort Trustees appointed by the Governor have at last manifested symptoms of activity. It would seem it is about time, for unless something will be soon done towards the preservation of the old building there will be nothing left to preserve. The people and the State have responded with liberality, and practical work should be commenced immediately.

A New York artist sought legal satisfaction of a ruthless man who had accused her of "thumping" the piano, but the judge, on hearing the circumstances, dismissed the case. It is said to be a fact that more deaths occur among nervous people in the summer time, when windows are thrown open and piano strains assault the outward air, than at any other time of the year.

The tragedy that transpired in this city Wednesday, wherein a public woman shot a police officer and then committed suicide, it would seem would serve as a warning to men to pursue a straight life course. It will not, however, so result. So many of these cases have happened here in the last few years as to demonstrate that foolish men will seek alluring snares, notwithstanding the dangerous surroundings.

It is the curse of women that in our social arrangements they are in so great a degree excluded from systematic work. The very tenderness of our care for them has been and is an affliction to them. Their lives are arranged upon the assumption that they are to be idlers, or, at least, that their work is to be of an irregular and inconsequent sort, and a great sum of human suffering, immensurable but omnipresent, is the consequence.

Pioneer memories and the stirring events of Indian times are recalled by the announcement that the old Fort Laramie reservation is being surveyed and divided up into farms. Fort Laramie was the oldest fort on the plains, having been established by the Hudson Bay Company in 1832. It was located formally by the Government in 1847. The reservation will soon be the home of a thriving farming community.

During the last eleven months the immigration to this country amounted to 487,179, against 401,609 in the same period of last year. The largest relative increases are from Italy, Austria-Hungary and Russian Poland. Formerly the largest accessions of foreign population were from the best governments of Europe; now, precisely the reverse is the case. Government oppression and persecution are the chief agents of European immigration to the United States.

While in some respects there was disappointment in the celebration of Independence Day here, there was one feature gratifying to our people: none but American colors were displayed. It is indeed surprising that in this day of enlightenment and progress men do exist who will insist on disregarding their oaths of allegiance to this country, and upon a day peculiarly American desire it shall be given a foreign taint. No one objects that due observance is had of set days commemorative of established customs in the older world, but on the Fourth of July we esteem it essentially American.

An interview with the spirit of the late George Hutchins, of Hamilton, N. J., would be interesting. He left an estate worth $17,000, of which he bequeathed $5,000 to his widow, and $12,000 to Henry George for the dissemination of his single-tax views. The widow disputed the will, and the lawyers settled round the quarry. After six years of litigation, Mrs. Hutchins receives $614 as her share, and Mr. George $318 as his. New Jersey is a slow-coach State, but her lawyers know a good thing when they see it. It will be more comfortable for the maker of that will if Bob Ingersoll's theory is true.

A lawyer tells a story showing how easy it is, with slight changes of sound, for the whole meaning of language to be altered.

He dictated to his stenographer the phrase, "And deponent verily believes." She took it down in shorthand, omitting the vowels. When it was printed the phrase appeared, "And it would not verily place." If you are familiar with phonographic signs and know how nearly alike they are for similar sounds, you will not wonder how the correct notes should be translated so far away from their original meaning. "Grimm's Law" is still at work on language.

The largest gold coin now in circulation is said to be the gold ingot, or "loof," of Anam, a French colony in Eastern Asia. It is a flat, round gold piece, and on it is written in India ink its value, which is about $220. The next-sized coin to this valuable but extremely awkward one is the "obang" of Japan, which is worth about $55; and next comes the "benda" of Ashantee, which represents a value of about $49. The California $50 gold piece is worth about the same as the "benda." The heaviest silver coin in the world also belongs to Anam, where the silver ingot is worth about $15; then comes the Chinese "tael," and then the Austrian double thaler.

The most precious wine in the world is that contained in a cask named the "Rose," in the Bremen Town Hall cellars. It is Rudesheim Rhine wine from the year 1653, and the cask is replenished by degrees whenever wine is drawn, with carefully washed and dried gravel. The wine has at present the color of dark beer, and a very hard taste, but an indescribable aroma. It is never sold, but destined exclusively for the sick of Bremen, who receive a very small quantity on the production of a doctor's certificate. In the year 1653 a stuck had the value of 300 gold dollars (a gold dollar equals 98 marks). At present, the supposed value of this unique wine has so increased, that a bottle (containing eight glasses) would cost 18,000,000 marks, a glassful 2,000,000, and a drop 2,346 marks.

Rice is believed to be the most generally used article of food all over the world. Hundreds of millions of people subsist chiefly on it, and its consumption is rapidly increasing. It may be regarded as the principal article of diet of a third of the human race. It forms the chief food of the native populations of India, China, Japan, Madagascar, many parts of Africa, and, in fact, of most if not all the Eastern nations. The Burmese and Siamese are the greatest consumers of this grain. A Malay laborer consumes fifty-six pounds monthly, a Burmese or Siamese sixty-four pounds in the same period. The Eastern nations obtain their beverages also to a great extent from rice, which, in Siam, China and Japan, is the principal grain used for distilling. The production of saki, or rice beer, in Japan is now about 150,000,000 gallons annually.

Loose thinking leads to loose writing and loose talking. The superficial thinker is apt to indulge in vague expressions which appear to mean a great deal, but, when analyzed, are found to be barren of any significance that can be supported by facts. Not that vague expressions are always due to a want of understanding of the subject in hand. They are often deliberately chosen to conceal the poverty of the speaker's cause. Thousands of years ago this practice was so common that it was embalmed in the Latin proverb, Frans versatur in generalibus—fraud lurks in generalities. Vague and general expressions are employed to convey a false impression because precise and specific terms would reveal the truth. In legal proceedings this practice may often be headed off by a motion to make a pleading more specific, or by a demand for a bill of particulars.

In an action for divorce pending at New Haven, Conn., the defendant received some flattering testimonies to his courtesy and kindness. Several women summoned as witnesses swore that he had kissed them, as well as the correspondent, and one of them testified that "he kissed about everybody with whom he came in contact." When called to the stand the defendant was unable to deny the soft impeachment. Osculation may be resorted to to express either affection, sympathy or esteem. It is for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances, whether the osculator was warranted in such an expression of his feelings, and what was the particular character of the feeling expressed. Moreover, custom has a great deal to do with the question. In Germany it is a common thing for men to kiss each other, and in France the osculatory salute is more generally permitted than it is here. But in this country, since the landing of the Pilgrims, unmarried men much addicted to kissing are confined by wise usage to the members of their own domestic circle.

Could we but read your steadfast lives aright,
And hear your message, as true hearts may hear,
In your life might find its meaning clear,
"Rooted in a day, we lift our heads toward light."

NEW YORK LETTER.

Summer Amusements — Ex-Senator Ingalls — Minister Phelps and Secretary Blaine — Prince George of Greece — Temple of the Revolution.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, July 3, 1891.

Just before the "glorious Fourth" is usually considered a dull season in the city. All who are in a position to leave town have done so with the advent of the warmer weather, while those poor individuals who are confined by business or indissoluble bonds to the city bewail their fate, wish themselves in the country, and solace themselves with the fruits of the season. Amusements are "off" this summer. The usual crop of warm weather opera companies sprang up in the spring, but within the last few weeks the majority have gone to the wall. As a result the courts have a goodly number of actors' complaints to listen to, and the theatrical journals are filled with fevered articles portraying the injustice done to the poor actor. Evidently the theaters are not popular. On the other hand, the summer garden, Kiralfy's El Dorado, Paine's Paris Under the Commune, and the seaside entertainments are crowded nightly, not to speak of the crowds of ladies and children that visit the beaches during the warm afternoons. The pleasure of a dip in the surf and a comfortable hour with a fresh sea breeze before bedtime is fully appreciated by the average New Yorker. A good deal might be said about the accommodations—or rather want of accommodations—furnished by the Coney Island Rockaway and Long Branch Railroads. But that is another story.

It is reported on good authority that ex-Senator Ingalls is to lecture in this town in a few days. Major Pond, of world-wide fame as an impressario, has charge of the venture, and it will probably be a success. Mr. Ingalls made himself exceedingly conspicuous by his congressional epigrams, and there are any amount of people who will go to hear him out of curiosity, if not out of friendship. Ingalls' sharp sayings made him very few friends in the political world, and it is doubtful if there were many tears shed over his retirement. Still, he has been a picturesque figure in American politics, and as such has some public interest. A year ago he was regarded as a necessary evil, but his present status is more that of a picturesque ruin.

Minister Phelps is spending a few days at the Clarendon Hotel before returning to London. He is very willing to talk about the Anglo-American diplomatic difficulty, and is full of admiration for Secretary Blaine. In his opinion a firm stand is all that is necessary to obtain from England all fair concessions, while a vacillating policy is worse than useless. Secretary Blaine's little game of "bluff" has worked admirably, and obtained for the United States a respect and good feeling that has been absent in our diplomatic relations of late years. Mr. Blaine, it is said on good authority, is not nearly so sick a man as he imagines himself to be. He is troubled greatly by indigestion, but is otherwise in good health. Nevertheless, he is possessed with the idea that he is the victim of a disease that will disable him sooner or later. His rapid recovery of strength at Bar Harbor has been due in a great measure to a release from the extra labor incident to the diplomatic complications of the past winter, and to the regular hours of exercising and rest that he has observed. In the fall he will be in such condition as will enable him to handle the work of his portfolio skilfully and firmly, to say nothing of "attending to fences," and doing other work necessary to becoming a presidential candidate.

A fine, muscular woman of 30, who is out every night to a dance or theatre, was running over her programme for a certain day to a friend who wished her to make an appointment. Among her engagements that were fixed she mentioned one with her doctor at 11 in the morning. "Why, my dear Mrs. K.," said the friend, "what is it that you have a doctor for?" "Oh, I am suffering," replied Mrs. K., "from—er—well, it's partly nervous trouble and partly dyspepsia. I don't sleep very well at night."

Mrs. K. was a member of that large sisterhood in the fashionable world without which the doctor's profession in New York would prove far less alluring than it does to students casting about for profitable employment. She was such a wonderfully healthy woman that she remained lusty and robust in spite of the severe life of elegant dissipation that she habitually led. Yet she must have a doctor regularly, and, moreover, was perfectly sincere in believing that she needed one. A physician who comes in for a big share of the fashionable hypochondriacal trade of the city, was speaking on the subject recently.

"I never saw," said he, "such voluptuaries as certain New York women have become within the last few years, and I have traveled in the Orient where occasionally the females do nothing but inhale perfumes and listen to sensuous music. With us, however, the women outdo their Eastern sisters in luxurious self-indulgence. They not only surround themselves with such delicate comforts as are only suitable for infants, but they persist in being nursed as though they were something incestuously rare. I asked a patient of mine the other day if she really fancied herself an invalid, and she replied that she did not, but she considered herself a flower that might wither if not shielded from every searching breeze. Her conceit, intense as it was, only equaled that of a score of other women who must have me call on them every day. They really feel themselves sufficiently important to warrant professional contemplation constantly, and I am compelled to listen to their small accounts of dyspeptic qualms or restless half hours with as much interest as I would to a clinical lecture. I tolerate the fashion in the thoroughly matured women, but I am very severe with it when I find it cropping out in the young girls, as it quite frequently does. The other day I was called to see a rather famous young beauty, who complained peevishly of not being able to stand owing to an unaccountable weakness of the limbs. She had tried repeatedly, she said, to walk about, but her legs would not support her. I studied the lazy and lovely creature as she lay amid her eider down cushions, sniffing at a vinaigrette and calculating that she was making a tremendous hit with me in her soft pink lounging gown, and after an apparent cogitation of her rather mysterious case, I gently assured her that her symptoms indicated a rather serious indiscretion on her part. I was no less than brutal in my insinuation that she was an opium eater, and when the beauty finally understood what I meant to infer, she bounded to her feet and flounced across the room like a queen in tragedy. Her limbs were all right, you see. I at once reminded her of this, and she sat down a little bewildered and changed the subject."

It would seem that it is lucky for Prince George of Greece that he is not a Russian, or his ideas of majesty would have received a very cold douche from the free and easy way he has been received in New York. Of course, he was shown the navy yard, torpedo station and such modern appliances as are furnished to our forts. But socially he was treated as anything but the heir apparent to a throne. He seemed to be hail-fellow-well-met with, and to have enjoyed himself thoroughly in an informal sort of way. It is sad to think, though, how some of our aristocracy worshipers have been shocked.

There is a movement on foot to erect a "Temple of the Revolution" at Newberg on the Hudson. No situation could be more appropriate, as this is said to be the scene of the first seditious meeting leading to the war of 1776. It is said that something extraordinary is on foot and that our "early heroes" are to be greatly honored in speeches and the like.

The Pace of Insects.

There are many insects which one would little suspect to be furnished with apparatus suited to swift and more or less continuous flights. House flies frequent the inside of our windows, buzzing sluggishly in and out of the room. But what different creatures are they when they accompany your horse on a hot summer's day. A swarm of these little pests keep pertinaciously on wing about the horse's ears; quicken the pace up to ten or twelve miles an hour, still they are there; let a gust of wind arise, and carry them backward and behind; the breeze having drooped, their speed is redoubled, and they return to their post of annoyance to the poor horse even when urged to its fastest pace. But this example gives only a partial proof of the fly's power of flight as the following will show: The writer was traveling one day in autumn by rail at about twenty-five miles an hour, when a company of flies put in an appearance at the carriage window. They never settled, but easily kept pace with the train; so much so, indeed, that their flight seemed to be almost mechanical, and a thought struck the writer that they had probably been drawn into a kind of vortex whereby they were carried onward with little exertion on the part of themselves. But this notion was soon disproved. They sallied forth at right angles from the carriage, flew to a distance of thirty or forty feet, still keeping pace, and then returned with increased speed and buoyancy to the window. To account for this, look at the wings of a fly. Each is composed of an upper and lower membrane, between which the blood vessels and respiratory organs ramify so as to form a delicate network for the extended wings. These are used with great quickness, and probably 600 strokes are made per second. This would carry the fly about 25 feet, but a sevenfold velocity can easily be attained, making 175 feet per second, so that under circumstances it can outstrip a racehorse. If a small insect like a fly can outstrip a racehorse, an insect as large as a horse would travel very much faster than a cannon ball.—Cornhill.

FLASHES.

Electric men live shocking lives.

The fast girl is always loose in her habits.

Some people will keep everything but their distance.

Laugh in the face of trouble and trouble will fall back.

When some men get ahead rapidly they get the big-head.

These hot nights we are satisfied to wrap ourselves only in slumber.

Some small-minded men have an idea that the community is moved by them.

A girl may be a bud before marriage, but she "blows up" after—that is, some do.

There is no law against idiots obtaining places on public committees—but there should be.

Tell a girl her mouth is pretty and she will always smiler thereafter, thus spoiling the natural effect.

Can We Gain the Premium?

It is unfortunate the period for the holding of the fairs in the various districts is so remote, else we could gain the first prize, so far as the premium lists relate to a particular line of live stock. It is unfortunate, however, the Oakland Times has secured the premium ass, and has him evidently in fair training in the editorial room. Commenting on an article in the Record-Union concerning the matter of the refusal of our Trustees to grant a street-railway franchise, the Oakland ass brays that Sacramento is as dead as any mackerel that ever was put in a kit, and that people will keep out of it as long as they can anyway, just as they keep out of hell.

Coming from the bedroom of San Francisco, from a wayside place supported, it might be said, by charity—for verily such is Oakland—this is indeed refreshing. Some years ago we were a delegate to a Republican State Convention that had been improvidently called to meet in Oakland, and the town had not facilities to feed the delegates. At what we were told was the leading restaurant we did, for seventy-five cents, dine on crackers and a glass of alleged wine. It is of remark the editor of the Times has had legislative experience. We happen to know he was well taken care of here, and if we had occasion to call witnesses as to the hospitality of Sacramentans we would subpoena him. It is manifest the copy of the wild Assyrian ass passed not under the eye of the principal editor, for he has successively succeeded in locating himself in the Legislature at Sacramento, and to get there expended more energy than we esteem he would to get into hell.

The Italian Minister.

Marquis Antonio di Starraba Rudini, the Italian statesman, was born in Sicily about 1839. When 27 years old he was elected mayor of Palermo. During his term of office an insurrection broke out in the town, 1866; bands of insurgents from the neighboring country flocked to Palermo and began to pillage and destroy, and Rudini had to seek refuge in the city hall. There, with the aid of a few soldiers, he withstood the mob, holding the insurgents at bay till reinforcements arrived. The rising was suppressed after a week of hard fighting, and the ring-leaders of the insurrection were summarily put to death. Rudini was then appointed royal prefect of Palermo. He became minister of the interior in the government of General Menabrea, in 1869, but was compelled to resign under the attacks of the opposition on account of his rigor in putting down the Palermo revolt. He then was elected to the chamber of deputies, and was continuously re-elected till 1891. There he has acted with the party of the right (conservative), and for years was its leader. On the overthrow of the Crispi cabinet, last February, Rudini was appointed prime minister, his present office.

The Paris Figaro thus describes the young King of Spain: "He is small, very small, but sinewy, restless, full of fun, and precocious. He dreams of uniforms, flags and battles. He will not have toy horses, but for two years has desired a live horse, in order to run races. He says 'thou' to all people. He likes to nickname the old generals; for instance: Marshal Martinez Campos, chief of the military cabinet, is called 'Camptos' by the child. When he does not get what he wishes at once, he grows exceedingly angry and can be quieted only by the soft words of the Queen Regent. He is stubborn. He speaks excellent English already. What offends him especially is the knowledge that he is still a child. He would like to grow large at once, be a man with a great mustache without delay. He cannot understand how the King of Spain can be so small."

Never hold anybody by the button or the hand in order to be heard out; for if people are unwilling to hear you you had better hold your tongue than them.—Chesterfield.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On July 16th the Lilliputians will hold the boards of the Metropolitan. Those who have witnessed the entertainment pronounce it excellent.

W. A. Brady's company's rendition of The Bottom of the Sea was given last night at the Metropolitan to a full house. It is scenic and sensational to a degree that would satisfy the most exacting in that line. To-night The Bottom of the Sea will be repeated.

An Old Newspaper.

Last month the Baltimore American celebrated its 118th anniversary by the publication of a big trade edition. As a souvenir, a fac-simile of the first number of 1773 was issued. The most interesting feature of this is the long real estate advertisement of Colonel George Washington, of Mount Vernon, Va. The past ten years of the paper under the management of General Felix Agnus have been the most prosperous in its history. Letters and telegrams were received from all parts of the country giving congratulations and reminiscences in connection with the anniversary. One is from Samuel Sands, now 92 years old, who, as a printer's devil in the office of the American in 1814, when all the men connected with the paper had gone to defend Baltimore against the British, set up in type "The Star Spangled Banner" from the copy which Francis Scott Key brought to the office. Joseph B. McCullough, the editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, writes that in 1864 he reported the Republican convention in shorthand for the American, being his first convention work; and Colonel Alexander McClure, editor of the Philadelphia Times, says that years ago he was one of the American's rural correspondents. Some of the most eminent men in the State of Maryland have been connected with it.

Invention of the Telescope.

As in many other cases of discovery, that of the telescope appears to have been the result of a playful accident. Several stories are told about it, but they are all similar. The one most generally accepted tells how, about the year 1590, just 300 years ago, the children of Zachariah Jansen, a spectacle maker, residing at Middleburgh, in Holland, were playing one day in their father's workshop and observed that when they held between their fingers two spectacle glasses, one some distance before the other, and looked through them at the weathercock of the church it seemed inverted, but very much nearer to them and greatly increased in size. Their father, when his attention was called, saw that one of the glasses was convex and the other concave. He made experiments and ended by fixing such glasses in wooden tubes a few inches long and selling them for curiosities. Another account tells us how one Lippersheim discovered the telescope in a similar manner. Descartes, however, a contemporary, gives the credit to James Metius, a glass cutter in Holland, whose brother, a professor of mathematics and a maker of burning glasses and mirrors, hit upon the discovery in the same way that Jansen's children are said to have done.

Too Much for Him.

One of the best story-tellers it has been my good fortune to meet is Lionel Brough, the English comedian. He will tell stories and yarns by the day, the supply being seemingly inexhaustible. His hearty laugh and jolly face strongly emphasize his stories. One of his "regulars" is the tale about the triplets. It was at a well-known bar. Jones and three friends were liquidating, when a messenger rushed in and, taking Jones by the hand, exclaimed: "My congratulations. Your wife has presented you with a bouncing boy." "Let's drink to the health of the little stranger!" shouted the delighted Jones. They drank. Half an hour later the messenger returned, but with less exuberance than on his previous appearance. "Well?" exclaimed the anxious Jones. "It's another boy!" "Let's drink to the twins!" shouted Jones, a sickly smile illuminating his features. Again they imbibed. Another thirty minutes, and for a third time the messenger made his appearance, but he knew enough to stick only his head in the door and exclaim, "It is a girl!" An ashy pallor overspreading Jones' face, he gasped: "Boys, no drink this time; it's getting too serious. I'm going home to stop this business." And he bolted.—N. Y. Telegram.

The famous "Holy Coat of Treves," which thousands of good Catholics believe once belonged to Christ, will be exhibited in Treves this fall. Since 1844 it has been kept in the treasure-house of the cathedral, and has been visible only to the priests and to visitors of distinction. In that year more than 1,000,000 people made pilgrimages to Treves to view the relic. In these days of railroads and excursions it is believed that the pilgrims will exceed that number.

Scratch the green rind of a sapling, or wantonly twist it in the soil, and a scarred or crooked oak will tell of the act for centuries to come. So it is with the teachings of youth, which make impressions on the mind and heart that are to last forever.—South.

Consanguineous Marriages.

All primeval laws on marriage and the conditions related thereto, owe their origin to the objective aim of race-improvement. As varying as the type of one race from another were also those laws varying in time and locality. In ancient Egypt marriages between children of the same parents were acquiesced in and approved. The wives of nearly all the Pharaohs were their own sisters. The Persian kings since the time of Cambyses married their own sisters. They even married their own daughters. Among the West Asiatic and various Greek nations, marriages between relatives were permitted—with the exception of marriages between children of the same parents, and between parents and their offspring. The earliest Roman laws prohibited marriages between cousins; they were only tolerated later. The Mosaic law commands even the marriage of daughters to men of the tribe to which they belonged. The law-giver of the Jewish State religion forbade, though, marriages between near blood relations, but not between cousins, nor between uncle and niece. Since the rise of Christianity and its ruling power, as far as I could learn, marriage between blood relations was prohibited. Why? The faithful will simply answer: Because these laws were given by God. The student will answer that these laws were enacted as a safeguard against immorality and licentiousness. The true explanation appears to me to be that the propagators of Christianity recognized that consanguineous marriages, although occasionally productive of great perfection, have also a degenerative effect, therefore prohibited them. First—To keep down the production of geniuses, who are often genial lunatics, and of rebels against the law, and to train a controllable community; or, second—To guard against the degeneracy of the race, which in localities where consanguineous marriages were of common occurrence, became plainly visible. The degeneration of the race exhibits itself in various ways, but race degeneration is to be assumed only where the normal man is dwarfed mentally and bodily. Dr. Arthur Mitchell in his remarkable work on the influence of consanguinity upon the offspring, cites instances of fishing villages on the north coast of Scotland, concerning which he says: "There is a general lowering of physical and mental strength in these communities, which is popularly attributed to in-and-in breeding." But he remarks that, as far as his own observation goes, there is no exceptional liability to insanity in such communities. Another way in which general race degeneration asserts itself as the result of consanguineous marriages is the relative infecundity. In other cases the marriages are prolific, but the mortality rate of the children unduly large. Again the decay of a race may show itself by the shorter term of life. Cretinism has also been attributed by various scholars to consanguineous marriages. It is unquestionable that the Jews in the Middle Ages frequently contracted marriages between blood relations, and in European countries, although they suffer little from tuberculosis, they furnish a disproportionately large percentage of insane and deaf mutes.—Dr. Heinrich Stern.

A novel method of catching rats and mice which takes into account the social characteristics of the pestiferous rodents has been instituted by a New York housewife. She explained the plan recently. "I do not think that it is generally known that rats and mice will go into a trap much more readily if a piece of looking glass is put in any part of the trap where they can see themselves. They are social little creatures, and where they see any of their tribe there they will go. I am quite sure of the effect the looking glass has, as I properly 'baited' my trap for a whole week without being able to coax one of the depredators within; but the first night after putting in the looking glass I caught two rats—one very large and one very small; and every night since this device has made one or more prisoners."

A Parson's cat not only sored on the household in which it was raised, but after it ran away actually went back and stole the mouse trap which the family had substituted for the ungrateful tabby.

Fine Table Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

Ancient and Modern Women.

If you had examined into the facts of the case you would have discovered that the women of heathen Rome, for instance, took better care of their systems than the Christian ladies of this knowing era take of theirs. They wore loose garments that gave their lungs and limbs full play. Their muscles were systematically developed and educated, and they were inhibited by law from all usages and practices likely to impair their health or their constitutions. Hence their sons were the hardiest race of men that the world had ever seen—hence for 700 years Rome triumphed over all her enemies. We talk of the Roman fathers, but it was to the habits of the Roman mothers, and the vigor engendered by those habits, that the republic and the empire largely owed their greatness. Even yet the figures of the Italian women show the inherited effect of the old training. American ladies are very lovely, but in the majority of cases are too delicate, too fragile. They are as lovely as flowers, but not as hardy as oaks. We have plenty of strong-minded women, but comparatively few that are physically vigorous. The same thing may be said of the men. And, inasmuch as the best head may be rendered of no avail by reason of incompetent bodily support, we think it would be better for us all if we would pay more attention to health, no matter what else might have to be neglected.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND
HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PANTS to ORDER

$3.50 to $13.50

SUITS to ORDER

$15.00 to $50.00

1000 Patterns to Select from.

GABEL the TAILOR

426 J STREET.

THE PASTEUR

GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

THE TOO GOOD MAN.

I've figured it up with slate and pencil, and I've chalked it down and added it up, and subtracted it and multiplied it on the barn-door, but it always comes out the same way—the too good man has no place in this world. He is a sort of cross between a burdock and a sunflower—not ornamental enough for wear, nor good enough eating for cows, and whenever I hear of a suicide without apparent reason I know that some too good man has got tired out and made up his mind to go back home.

Coming up from Red Bank the other day I followed an old man into the passenger coach. I had noticed him on the platform and I recognized him as belonging to the species I have named. Indeed, he gave himself away right there when he said to a young man with a diamond pin in his scarf:

"Boy, it's mighty risky wearin' sich things around in public in these cold times. If you want to drop it down my boot-leg I'll take keer of it for you till we get up to Hokoken."

"I think I'm able to take care of it," was the cold reply.

"Do you? All right, then. No offense, you know, but I should hate to see you robbed. I lost $7 in the road once, and it didn't get over hurting for fifteen years. I'll kinder watch over you as fur as I go, anyhow. It'll make your mother feel easier, mebbe."

Parlor car—blue upholstery—one porter—one conductor—three men—two women—sixteen silver-plated cuspidors—one solemn-looking old chap who has engaged lower No. 8 and will try to freeze out upper No. 8 in case he shows up—that's all.

Passenger coach—bags, bundles, band-boxes—twenty men—eighteen women—ten children—hope—fear—anxiety—human nature to be read as from an open book. See?

The train had scarcely begun to move when my too good man, who had a rear seat, rose up and announced:

"Don't nobody be skeered, now! This hain't no collision; it's just like they always move off. I've rid on 'em more'n a dozen times, and I'll tell you when to jump off."

Everybody looked at him, while some deduced him with smiles meant to be encouraging. He stowed away his satchel, removed a yarn comforter he had been wearing for fear of a change in the weather, and then took off his hat and rubbed his hands and said:

"Old woman said she'd bet I'd git on a train goin' the wrong way, but I didn't. Jest happened to think, though, that I didn't shet the door of the corn-crib and them pesky heus 'll stuff themselves to death."

There was a woman sitting alone a few seats down the aisle. She had an umbrella, a bundle secured with a shawl strap and two or three parcels on the seat, and as Uncle Jerry passed down the aisle he stopped before her and cheerfully observed:

"Face kinder familar to me, but I can't remember your name. Never been much of a hand on names, anyhow. Husband flew around and helped you to git ready, I suppose? Leave the children all right? Bin lots o' measles round this year. Didn't leave the outside cellar-door open, did ye?"

"I don't know ye!" she said, as she looked up.

"What! hain't ye Hanner Jones, of Jones' Cross roads?"

"No, sir."

"Waal, I swow! I'd a bet a two-year-old steer agin' a cider bar'l that ye was! Didn't ye climb an apple tree last summer and tumble and break a leg?"

"No, sir."

"Wasn't it you that burnt her heel most off while making soft soap?"

"No, sir! You go on and lemme be!"

"Gosh all hemlock! But I thought I knowed ye as well as I do my own barn door, and I beg your pardon! Curus how folks will get deceived sometimes. Don't be skeert, madam. If anything happens I'll save ye jest as quick as if you really was that Hanner Jones who clumb up twenty-nine feet and fell kerchunk to the ground."

The next one he accosted was a man fully as old as himself, whose crown was bald, and who wore spectacles. He was reading a letter, which he had taken from a corn-colored envelope, when Uncle Jerry gave him a playful poke in the ribs and called out:

"Lands! but you look jest like my brother Bill across the back and head! Goin' some whar, I s'pose?"

"Who did that?" testily exclaimed the old man, as he looked up.

"I kinder poked ye, but it hain't nothin' to get mad at," replied Uncle Jerry. "Usin' anything on yer scalp fur baldness?"

"No, I hain't usin' anything on my scalp, and I don't mean to, either. I won't buy, so don't ask me."

"Jest the same with me. Tried about forty different things, but it's no go. Bin told that crushed catnip would stimulate the roots, but I hain't no faith. Who's a-goin' to feed the hogs while ye are gone?"

"Haint got no hogs, and don't want any, neither!" shouted the old man in a squeaky voice.

"I'm kinder going out o' hogs myself. What's calves bringing in your neighborhood this spring?"

"I don't know nothin' 'bout calves, and I don't want to talk!"

"Don't ye? Why, I thought ye was dyin' to talk! Folks all well at home, I hope? How'd yer 'taters keep last winter? Hear any demand for turnips lately?"

"I want ye to stop, I say!" shouted the old man, as he waved his arms around.

"Then I will. If you are so techy as all that comes to I don't want nothin' to do with you. Lucky fur you that you hain't goin' to run fur Supervisor in our town. You wouldn't get a blamed vote! Howdy do, nabur?"

This last remark was addressed to a rather savage-looking man with a weed on his hat, who was reading a magazine.

No reply.

"Howdy do? Git the cellar cleaned out and whitewashed yet?"

No reply.

"Makes me remember that I forgot to change my collar afore I come away, but I guess nothin' won't happen. S'pose there ain't no great demand for dried apples down your way?"

"Old man," said the weedy passenger, as he turned on him, "go hence! Don't bother me!"

"Mercy on me, but you hain't lost your wallet or bin bit by a mad dog, hev ye? I took ye fur a good-natured man who was feelin' cast down over the loss of the partner of his joys, and I was goin' to sympathize. Never lost my own wife, but I've bin one of the watchers, and helped borrow cheers and driv the head team in the funeral procession fur them who has."

"I warn you to go on," said the other. "I'm wicked! I'm tuff! I'll hurt ye!"

"By squash! but what a feller you be! Haul right off and plunk me, 'cause I want to be friendly, eh? Oh, waal, ther's folks as is born that way. Got a man in our town so pizen 'fraid that somebody will speak to him that he keeps wool in his ears and purtends to be deaf."

He seemed a bit discouraged for a moment, but presently his eye caught the figures of two females at the far end of the car, and he edged along down to see if anything was wanted in his line. The two were mother and daughter, and the latter didn't look well.

"Did she fall down the cellar stairs or pitch off the hay-mow?" kindly inquired Uncle Jerry, as he sat down on the rail of the seat.

"Are ye speakin' of me darter?" demanded the mother.

"Zactly. Doesn't look just right for this time o' year. If I'd only thought I'd brought along a bunch o' mayweed and told ye how to make tea of it. Beats all creation how mayweed takes the kinks out of the system. She ain't in luv, is she?"

"Sir!"

"Naybur o' mine had a gal about her aige who began to ravel out and fade away. They put horsereddish drafts to her feet, mustard plasters to her neck, and dosed her with catnip, mayweed and sage tea, but she continued to flake off and fade in the wash, and finally died. When too late they disskivered she had all along bin in luv with Bill Haines, my hired man, who was so gaul durued bashful that he dass't say a word about it. Better begin to hunt around in the grass an' see if something of that sort isn't the trouble here."

"You old crittur, go away from here wid yer blarney, or I'll be the death o' ye!" shouted the mother; and as he jumped back she pulled the girl out into the aisle beside her and waved her umbrella in a threatening manner.

"W-what's the rumpus now?" gasped Uncle Jerry, in great astonishment.

"If ye don't go I'll call the police!"

"Waal, by gum! If I was to tell this to Lucy when I git home she'd say I fell asleep and had the nightmare. Don't none of you seem to want to be the least bit friendly or to hev anybody sympathize with you! I'll go. I'll git right away, and if I had a hull sack of dried catnip and two dozen red peppers here I'd let the capoodle of you suffer all the way to Hoboken before I'd offer you a pinch!"

He went back to his seat and fell into it, and I felt inclined to pity him. This feeling was so strong that I went down to him by and by and remarked:

"This ought to be good weather for gettin' in crops?"

"Eh' eh?" he queried, as he looked up.

"Oh, I s'cel! Want to get me to say that it is, and then tell me to shet up and go to ballyhack. Waal, I jest won't say another word, I'm snummied if I do?"—M. Quad in N. Y. World.

Writing on the Cars.

There are two ways of writing on a train. The first requires that the paper be laid upon a light board, perhaps eighteen inches square; one end of this will rest in your lap, and the end furthest from you will be raised a few inches by a cord which passes around the neck. The whole affords a sloping desk which moves with the body and is fairly satisfactory. The simpler, and perhaps the better plan, is to place your tablet upon a feather pillow in your lap, when you will find that the elasticity of the feathers reduces the motion to a minimum and makes writing easy.

UNION ICE COMPANY

ARE NOW PREPARED TO FURNISH

Pure Mountain Ice

NEW QUARTERS:

521 AND 523 I STREET.

CHARLES SELLINGER, Agent.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gntenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHREIER,

TWENTY-THIRD STREET, BET. Q AND R,

CEMENT SIDEWALKS,

Garden Walks, Carriage Drives, Etc., constructed at shortest notice, in the most workmanlike manner and at lowest rates.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.
M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

W. R. STRONG CO.

Founded 1852.

Fruit Packers and Shippers.

PROPRIETORS OF

CAPITAL NURSERIES,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Headquarters for ALFALFA SEED and OREGON POTATOES, in lots to suit.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 DAVIS ST. SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

M. DUFFY,

Manufacturer of Carriages, Wagons, Carts, Etc.

REPAIRING

Done at Short Notice. All Work Warranted.

1111-1113 J Street, bet. Eleventh and Twelfth,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS, J. H. DOLAN.

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES, Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,
SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

TELEPHONE 248.

A Miner's Politeness.

"Mr. Webster didn't know it all," remarked a Florida "cracker" when reproached by his educated daughter for saying "wrack" when he meant "wreck." It is certainly true that the eminent lexicographer had no idea of a hundred and one meanings which are attached to words by people who scorn the authority of colleges and purists.

"Politeness," said old Jack Heverin, an aged storekeeper in a small Pennsylvania town, "always pays, no matter where you be. It don't do to be polite off and on, so to speak, but you must have it with you at all times."

The small crowd of loungers he was entertaining nodded assent, and Jack continued: "When I was in California in '52 there was a young man in our camp who was so polite that it passed into a byword. No one ever saw him lose his temper, and his face always wore a smile, rain or shine. He had a placid claim that didn't pan out as well as it might have done, but he worked away cheerfully, and by dint of saving what he made, and sticking at it like a good fellow, young Champney managed to roll up quite a respectable pile.

"Well, one day, when the young fellow was cleaning up the week's dirt, a big, ruffianly chap appeared on the bank, with a cocked revolver as long as your arm, and leveling it at Champney's head, said:

"Git!"

"Joke?" said Champney, with an inquiring smile.

"No," said the man, gruffly. "Git!"

"Can I take my tools?"

"No. Git!"

"All right," said Champney, just as polite as ever; and climbing up on the bank, he went off, whistling cheerfully, and never once looked back until he entered a clump of trees a hundred yards away.

"All the time, mind you, he knew that the rascal was going to pillage his tent and take every grain of his hard-earned dust, if he could find it in the tent, under the hearthstone. But Champney never lost his politeness. He kept right on, whistling softly to himself, and pretty soon he made a circuit of about half a mile, until he came unawares upon the robber, who was on his knees rummaging through a bundle of blankets.

"Then Champney whipped out his revolver, and taking very careful aim, shot the robber plumb in the back of the head, just as polite as you please—which shows, as I said before, that it always pays."—Harper's Magazine.

"Comin' Thro' the Rye."

A New York pictorial publishes an illustration of "Comin' Thro' the Rye," and blunders into what we presume is the popular misconception of the ditty, giving a laddie and lassie meeting and kissing in a field of grain. The lines:

"If a laddie meet a lassie Comin' thro' the rye—"

and especially the other couplet:

"A' the lads they smile on me,
When comin' thro' the rye—" seem to imply that traversing the rye was an habitual or common thing; but what in the name of the Royal Agricultural Society could be the object of tramping down a crop of grain in that style? The song perhaps suggests a harvest scene, where both sexes, as is the custom in Great Britain, are at work reaping, and where they would come and go through the field indeed, but not through the rye itself, so as to meet and kiss in it.

The truth is, the rye in this case is no more grain than Rye Beach is, it being the name of a small, shallow stream near Ayer, Scotland, which, having neither bridge nor ferry, was forded by people going to and from market, custom allowing a lad to steal a kiss from any lass of his acquaintance whom he met mid-stream. Our contemporary will see that this is the true explanation if he will refer to Burn's original ballad, in which the first verse refers to the lass wetting her clothes in the stream:

"Jennie is a' wat, puir body;
Jennie's seldom dry;
She drag'it a' her petticoat
Comin' thro', the rye."

Why Fat Men Suffer in Hot Weather.

In suggesting a new theory of the sun's light and heat to the members of the Boston Scientific Society, George Smith showed scientific reasons why a fat man should suffer more than a lean one in summer.

The new theory, briefly put, is this: Gravity is an ethereal force continually streaming from space through every solar or celestial body. If the body is not movable with relation to some larger body, this force of gravity becomes that form of molecular motion which we call heat.

As gravity depends upon the mass of a body, and as heat is, according to Mr. Smith's theory, in one sense gravity, it follows that the larger a body is, the hotter. Hence the fat man's discomfort.

A Norborne (Kas.) mother sternly rebuked her son for making arrangements preparatory to go fishing last Sunday morning, and threatened to make the fact known to his father. Imagine her surprise when she was informed by the youth that his father was down south of the barn digging the bait. But both went to church.

The Oldest Christian Church.

There is an old church building in Cairo, Egypt, called Babylon, in which, tradition says, Peter preached. Dr. Lansing, a missionary in Egypt, believes that there is some truth in the tradition. In the absence, however, of particular more definite than traditionary, attention may be called in the consideration of this question to the mosque of St. Sophia, or Aya Sofia Jamisi, in Constantinople. The first stone of this building of St. Sophia, which is also known as the Church of Divine Wisdom, was laid in 532 on the site of several successive churches of the same name, the first of which was erected by Constantine the Great. The enterprise was commenced at the order of the Emperor Justinian. About 10,000 workmen are said to have been engaged in it under the direction of 100 master builders, and when the work was completed it cost the imperial treasury a sum equal to $5,000,000 of our money. The principal material of the walls was brick, but the whole interior was lined with costly marbles, and to add to its splendor the temples of the ancient gods at Heliopolis and Ephesus, Selos and Baalbec, Athens and Cyzicus, were plundered of their columns. To render the dome as light as possible it was constructed of pumice stone and Rhodian bricks, and to secure the buildings from the ravages of fire no wood was used except for the doors. Not long after its completion the dome was shaken by an earthquake, but it was repaired by Isidore, the grandson of the original architect. In 1453 Mahomet converted the church into a mosque, and since that date numerous minor alterations have been made in the less essential parts of the building. A pretty complete restoration was effected in 1847-49 by Forsati, who foresaw that the weight of the dome was too great for the supporting walls, threatening the whole with destruction. Thus the church is not only still in existence, but it is in good order yet, and the inference may be justly drawn that it is the oldest Christian church in existence. Others may have been erected before it, and doubtless were, but the records fail to show that any such is still in existence.

Curiosities About Beans.

Of all edible pods, it is believed that the bean has been the longest known and most widely cultivated. It was used as food by the ancient Jews, and considered sacred by the Greeks and Romans. A temple dedicated to Kyanetes, the God of Beans, formerly stood on the sacred road near Eleusis. Kyanetes was called the God of Beans because he was the first to cultivate them for food. The Bean Feast, which the Athenians celebrated in honor of Apollo, was characterized by the excessive use of beans. The Egyptians, contrary to the nations above mentioned, considered beans unclean and would not venture to touch them. Pythagoras admonished his scholars, "Abstain from beans." The natives of Egypt and most all Oriental nations look upon the black speck on the wings of the bean flower as the written characters of death.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

Felter, Son & Co.

OFFER TO THE TRADE, IN QUANTITIES TO suit, a full and complete line of choice

Wines, Liquors & Cigars,

Including the Celebrated

GOLD CROWN and DELMONICO

KENTUCKY WHISKIES.

At the Old Stand, 1006-1008 Second Street, SACRAMENTO.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second, SACRAMENTO, CAL.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bcmus, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. j27-9t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of George H. Appel, an insolvent debtor. George H. Appel, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said George H. Appel is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at one o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, June 30th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. j34-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of N. IRWIN, an insolvent debtor. N. Irwin having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said N. Irwin is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said N. Irwin, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated June 29th, 1891.
JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. j34-5t

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. SCHACHT,

DEALER IN

FAMILY GROCERIES

Provisions, Flour,

Wines, Liquors, Cigars, Tobacco

Southeast Corner Second and M Sts.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

C. T. MILLIKIN,

DENTIST,

1008 Eighth Street,

Between J and K,

Over Dr. W. A. Hughson's office.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON.

ALBERT M. JOHNSON,
HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,
LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street,

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER,
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,
630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Fireflies.

Lady Blake, the wife of the Governor of Jamaica, writes in Timehri, the quarterly of British Guiana, a paper on fireflies, which gives a very extraordinary account of the brilliance of the fireflies in the tropics. She certainly succeeds in leaving the impression of the most unspeakable beauty of the moonless nights in the West Indies, when mountain, forest and plain are throbbing with lights of various sizes and intensities, from the minute firefly of about three eighths of an inch in length to the splendid "cucuyo," or fire-beetle, over an inch long, with two large eyes like lights in the thorax and in the abdomen, glowing like a living emerald. Creole beauties at balls, in Cuba, wear fireflies in their hair and dresses instead of diamonds, and the first French settler who landed at Montreal caught multitudes of fireflies and tied them in shining festoons before the altar where the blessed sacrament was being celebrated. She quotes extensively from Peter Martyr's account of the utilization of the cucuyo, or fire-beetle, as an exterminator of mosquitoes. In addition to his services in this respect he is employed as a lamp in the darkness. He says: "As many eyes as every cucuius openeth, the host enjoyeth the light of so many candles; so that the inhabitants spin, sew, weave and dance by the light of the flying cucuius." Lady Blake maintains that this story is not so incredible as it appears to us at a distance. She says: "Anyone who visits the West Indies can easily verify this statement for themselves, and it is easy to understand that the native Indians, who possess neither candles nor lamps, and who only knew torches made either of some light wood or of the fibrous interior of the Dildo cactus, often availed themselves of the brilliant beetles when busy after nightfall in their very simple domestic avocations. Even with all the complicated comforts of the present day, it was the common practice of members of our family, when entering a room at night, to catch a firefly, in order by its light to find the match box. Gosse, who, during his residence in Jamaica, made valuable observations on fireflies, states that he met with about fourteen species during his eighteen months' stay on the island." "Lest anyone should be disposed," says the Review of Reviews (from which I get this information at second hand) "to hasten to the tropics in order to enjoy the charm of existence illuminated by fireflies, there are three papers in Timehri which will moderate the ardor of his desire to go to the West Indies. One describes parasites, another scale and other parasitic insects, and another deals with a similar subject in the occasional notes." The acknowledged high character of the periodical Timehri adds special value to the above clipping. Some of the facts here asserted about the fireflies of the tropics have been again and again denied or called in question in recent books of science.—Notes and Queries.

Accuracy in Time Pieces.

It has been said that no man ever yet made an exactly true circle or straight line, and it may be added that an absolutely accurate clock is another thing that has never been made, and indeed never will be unless an unchangeable material, of which the works may be constructed, is discovered. But although it is impossible to make a clock that will keep precisely accurate time, some of the marine chronometers come very near this, as they are now made with such precision that they do not vary more than a few seconds in a year. It is only within the present century that the workmanship of chronometers has been so far perfected that the sailor, to whom accurate time is most important, can in any way rely on them. A ship bound on a long voyage usually carries several chronometers which are compared one with another every day. A register is kept of their performances, and from it it is seen which are going most accurate and can be most relied on. These clocks are specially made to allow for changes of temperature. They are hung in swinging cradles that they may not be affected by the rolling of the ship, and the cradle is supported on a foundation of tow or wool that they may not suffer from shock or jar. The chronometer-room is placed in the middle of the ship and kept as much as possible at a uniform temperature. Changes of temperature, which cause the springs, etc., to expand or contract, are the great stumbling blocks to a perfectly accurate time piece.

A canvass of Frenchmen has been made on Tolstoi's denunciation of tobacco and alcohol, as agents that destroy the moral conscience. Gonod thinks they produce sluggishness, and therefore affect the will but not the conscience, which is a divine decree. Richepin condones the use of stimulants which, producing a dream of forgetfulness, result in renewed strength. He himself, however, has abandoned smoking. Zola says he does not drink wine for the reason that it does not agree with him. He disagrees with Tolstoi's opinion, and regards the use of stimulants as a mere matter of bonhomie. Dr. Charcot thinks Tolstoi's tenets exaggerated and false. He says stimulants are injurious, but may be used in moderation. Daudet said he had found that smoking assisted and that intoxication prevented work.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

J.B. GILBERT.

JED. M. SCOTT.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

JUST RECEIVED.

A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES
AND CARD CASES, OF THE
LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

E. JAY SWANSON,

Southeast Corner Tenth and I Streets.

The most wonderful cures performed.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET.

SACRAMENTO.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

July 9, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11 15 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8 10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.20 A
4.30 P	Denning, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knights Landing and Marysville	7 25 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
12.05 P	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	8 15 A
3.00 P	Ogden and East	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.40 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.40 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.30 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.15 A
8.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
4.30 P	San Jose	9.35 A
6.30 A	Santa Barbara	11.15 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
12.05 P	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	8.15 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.30 A	Vallejo	11 15 A
3.05 P	Vallejo	11.15 A
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

R. A. OLMSTED.

S. P. OLMSTED.

Fourth Street Cash Grocery

R. A. OLMSTED & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

Fruits and Vegetables, Provisions, Flour, Hay, Grain,
and all kinds of Mill Stuffs.

Wines, Liquors, Cigars and Tobaccos.

400 L Street, S. E. cor. Fourth, Sacramento.

Fresh Butter and Eggs a Specialty. Goods delivered free of charge to any part of the City, R. R.
depot or Steamboat landing. Highest price paid for Country Produce.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND

JEWELRY.

UNCLE IKE'S, 302 K STREET, SACRAMENTO.

THE EMERSON

CALIFORNIA
STATE LIBRARY

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1891.

No. 22.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

To say that the past mismanagement of our municipal affairs has brought this city into a deplorable financial situation, is putting the subject mildly. It is truly wonderful what power is exercised by the money influence which surrounds the bonded debt of this city. For years, no matter who may constitute the Board of Trustees, the domination of the bond creditors has been complete, if not absolute. The siren power is exercised, perhaps indirectly, but none the less most effectually. It seems that there are none able to grapple with the monster, which has the power to appear in such alluring guise that his fatal work is not detected until the treasury is within his grasp. For four years he has sapped the vitality from the water-works; and the constituted authorities supinely permit this without the least effort at resistance. Trustee McLaughlin has, to his credit be it said, made some vigorous efforts to cast off the spell and resist the extortion of 55 per cent of the gross revenue from our water rents. At the last session of the Legislature he secured counsel and procured the introduction of an act which would enable the city to purge itself of any possible contempt in resisting the ruinous—we might truthfully say infamous—decision in the case of Bates vs. Porter; known as the case where the court decided by a bare majority that 55 per cent of the gross revenue from water rents must go into the interest and sinking fund for the benefit of the bondholders.

We contended at the time, and now say, that no such ruling of any court can be declared stare decisis. We are at liberty at any time to renew the contest which has resulted so disastrously to this city. Judge Paterson, in an able dissenting opinion, held that the claim for 55 per cent of the gross water rents cannot be sustained. Judge McFarland, in a clear yet unique dissenting opinion, held to the same views, in which he said: "It must be remembered that the water-works in question are conducted by the city of Sacramento as a business—just like the business of any other water company, or of any mining, manufacturing, railroad or mercantile company. In such a case the 'revenue' is, of course, the excess of receipts over expenditures. If other financial miracles could be wrought as easily as the turning of the gross proceeds of a business into revenue, 'these chapels had been churches, and poor men's cottages princes' palaces.'" The rule laid down by the majority of the bench—all of whom have been retired to the quiet realms of private life, while the learned jurists, Paterson and McFarland, are still on the bench—cannot obtain as the law if the question is again properly presented to that august body as at present constituted. The result of absorbing the revenue from the water-works has been to prevent needed repairs, and to bring the system to almost destruction. The overtaxed machinery is fast giving out, and we will soon be without either a system of water-works or the means of securing new works to take their place. The submission to this extortion is servile and can be only attributed to weak or designing persons. The controlling influence is "design" by those who rest in the background, while the weakness is in the trustees for submitting to the exactions and idly permitting the water-works to go to absolute destruction.

We know that the money influence is all-powerful, and the threats from capital have a great effect on officials. The fear of some of the trustees, that resistance will "cost too much," is childish. What is the expenditure of a few hundred dollars to the destruction of our water-works, which is sure to result; indeed, has almost resulted? The worn and cracked machinery should appeal to the trustees, and admonish them of their duty. If we are to be forever compelled to pay all the running expenses of water-works, and give the bond creditors the proceeds, there must be some other plan adopted. But we do not find any cessation of hostilities by the exultant bondholders, who seem to have the city and the people, metaphorically speaking, by the throat. The alleged reform in matters pertaining to liquor licenses, is only another evidence of this arbitrary power exercised in the name of moral reform. This scheme is unmasked at once, because "revenue" is the sole cry, and this revenue means aid and comfort to the holders of a certain class of bonds that would otherwise be worthless. We know that a majority of these bonds have been retired in the hands of the Funded Debt Commission, but the remainder must per force be under the control of some person or persons who have a faculty of deluding the trustees into the position of posing as moral reformers, while by the true inwardness it is designed to put $25,000 annually into the interest and sinking fund for the bondholders. To illustrate: within a year all the bonds which fell due in 1888 will become barred by the statute of limitations, and unless some plan is devised to replenish the interest and sinking fund, those bonds will be valueless. Now, this increased liquor license is part of that plan.

Let us prophesy. At the next tax levy for municipal purposes, the valuation of city property will be increased 50, perhaps 100, per cent, and the pretext will be that this will lower the rate of taxation, and thus delude strangers into the belief that we are a rich people. The ultimate fact will be, that the amount of revenue for the benefit of the bondholders will be greatly augmented. Now, whenever any genuine reform is attempted, such as that proposed by Trustee McLaughlin regarding the protection of the water-works, we find the power of the bondholders, exercised through their agents, who are the pretended friends of the city, to prevent any favorable action. But any scheme to augment the interest of the creditors is always hailed with delight. We have always observed that there is a close affinity between all monied institutions; this fact accounts for the warm support our creditors obtain from some of the money dealers in this city, and which perhaps influences our authorities in their supine indifference to the welfare of the tax-ridden people. In place of fixing greater burdens upon the business interests of the city, the authorities should turn their attention to an amelioration of our condition, and throw off some of the binding shackles.

In the past we have had too much of the peoples' money in politics, and it is time there should be a new regime with regard to the management of local affairs. We thought, and still think, there are men in the Board of Trustees capable of grasping the financial problems, if they will not allow enemies in disguise to control them. We are inclined to think the members of the Board of Trustees are sincere in their actions, but it is unfortunate that they cannot see the hidden motive at work upon their credulity. When this Board was shown that there was nothing to be lost in contesting the right to seize the revenue from our water-works, which meant absolute destruction thereto, they should have had the nerve to have met the issue in the proper spirit. Again, in the chimerical name of reform they are distressing legitimate business men, losing sight of the great necessities of the people.

The time for the annual election of public school teachers is near at hand, and as is usual many of the teachers are on the anxious seat, least they may be dropped or will fail in promotions they are conscious they deserve. We are confident, however, that the Board of Education will act judiciously and fairly, and that no teacher of merit need fear. There was a time when political influence had much to do with these matters, but happily that time has passed. A few days ago one of the lady teachers manifested to us the nervousness that is but natural, that she would be at a disadvantage, that she had no friends who possessed political "pulls." Without mentioning the lady's name, we spoke of the matter to one of the members of the Board, and his views concerning it accorded with those we had entertained. He assured us that in the matter of the selection of teachers political influence would count for naught, and he laid down his platform briefly but significantly: "With me the question of qualification will count paramount, but with equal qualification I will favor the poor above the wealthy."

Speaking of matters educational, we repeat what we before said, that the course of studies in the public schools is unnecessarily severe, and that more judgment should be exercised with regard to the mental and physical capacities of the pupils. To lay down a rigid rule to which all must conform would hardly be thought of to be applied to adults. It is there recognized that a difference exists among lawyers and among doctors and among mechanics, and, in fact, distinctions are made in every pursuit in life. The jolly pedagogue of old made due allowance for the natural disadvantages under which some of his pupils labored, and he was not incited to bring all of his pupils to an impossible standard in order to score high per cents on the examination papers of his class. We have before us a very sensible article upon this subject from the Brooklyn Eagle, relating to the examination of the grammar school pupils in that city. The examination lasted for several days and was of something like 2,000 children. The questions were prepared by the superintendent, and were given to the teachers each morning. The Eagle prints the questions on civil government, and among them are the following:

What offices of the Brooklyn city government are elected by the people?

Name four administrative officers that are appointed by the mayor as heads of departments.

What boards are appointed by the mayor?

What are the duties of the comptroller and the auditor?

How are the amounts to be raised by taxation each year in Brooklyn determined?

How is the principle of "responsibility to the people" illustrated in the Brooklyn city government?

Classify and define the forms of colonial government in existence at the beginning of the revolution.

In what respect did these forms of government agree? In what respect did they differ?

In the colonial governments what body controlled the expenditure of the public money?

Mention four functions of the governor of New York.

In case of war entered upon by the federal government what is the duty of a state governor?

In case of a riot which the local authorities are unable to suppress what is the duty of the governor?

Whence is his power to act in the two last mentioned cases derived?

Describe the judiciary system of New York state.
What classes of cases are tried in federal courts?
What rights does the national constitution guarantee to an accused person?

If a man were arrested for an alleged offense and kept in jail for a year without being brought to trial, what provision of the national constitution would be violated?

Give the authority for the establishment of the following:
(a) Of a military academy at West Point. (b) The erection of a post office building in Brooklyn. (c) The payment of pensions to soldiers injured in the civil war. (d) The establishment of a national banking system. (e) The granting of a patent on a new incandescent electric light.

In the examination on critical reading the subjects were Longfellow's "The Building of the Ship," "The Hanging of the Crane," "Morituri Salutamus," Irving's "The Widow and Her Son," "Christmas Eve." The following are samples of the absurd conundrums that were propounded:

In "Christmas Eve" Irving makes two quotations from Shakespeare. Give the quotations and tell the connection in which each of them is introduced.

Quote from "The Widow and Her Son" the paragraph in which the sorrows of the rich and the young are compared with the sorrows of the poor and the aged; or that in which the love of a mother for her son is described; or quote not less than 100 words from "Christmas Eve."

Deduct one credit for every mistake made in giving the quotation.

In the following from "The Hanging of the Crane" what is it that is compared to "the reflection of a light," etc.?

As the reflection of a light
Between two burnished mirrors gleams,
Or lamps upon a bridge at night
Stretch on and on before the sight
Till the long vista endless seems.

Explain the allusions in the following:

- (a) Ah! if our souls but poise and swing
Like the compass on its brazen ring.
- (b) I see the table wider grown;
I see it garlanded with guests,
As if fair Ariadne's crown
Out of the sky had fallen down.
- (c) One is a wanderer now afar
In Ceylon or in Zanzibar
Or sunny regions of Cathay.
- (d) The great Italian poet, when he made
His dreadful journey to the realm of shade.
- (e) Aladdin's lamp and Fortunatus' purse
That holds the treasure of the universe.

In "Morituri Salutamus" Longfellow quotes from Dante. What application does he make of the words quoted?

Mark the accented syllables in the following lines and state the meter:

A quiet smile played round his lips,
As the eddies and dimples of the tide.

Give the derivation of each of the following words:

1. Immemorial. 6. Hereditary.
2. Precedent. 7. Emanation.
3. Pedantry. 8. Predilection.
4. Obsolete. 9. Factotum.
5. Superannuated. 10. Ponderous.

The average age of the pupils to whom these questions were addressed was 15 years, and when the questions were received the principals of the schools were indignant. The members of the Board of Education to whom they were shown regarded them as catch questions, and one of them, Gen. Horatio C. King, very sensibly remarked:

I declare, it certainly does seem as though these questions in civil government were a little abstruse for 12 and 14 year old children to answer. What is this about the several forms of colonial government?—why, it would puzzle many a grown up person to answer that. Certainly, from this 'critical reading' list of questions it would seem as if a great deal in the way of verbal memory was expected from the pupils. Here is a request for the quotation of a passage containing at least 100 words. Well now, everybody has not the faculty of remembering words in the order in which they occur that way; they may remember the idea well enough. Why, do you know that Mr. Beecher, great as his intellect was, had not the faculty of verbal memory? He told me once that, though he often wanted to do it, he did not dare to quote even the Lord's Prayer for fear he would go wrong; and when he wanted to quote a passage in the Scriptures he invariably turned to it and read it. Dr. Talmage, of course, is just the reverse. His power to commit to memory is something marvelous.

In less degree, the same system is pursued here, and we believe it works much harm. We have heretofore criticised, with what we esteem merited severity, the compilation of some of our text-books, particularly the grammar and the arithmetic. We hope there will soon come a time when our school-children will be treated with humanity, and a system will be evolved that will relieve the unnecessary mental strain to which they are now subjected. The results would be manifestly better, and it is not at all unlikely that the lives of very many of our children would be spared.

WOULD LIVE HIS LIFE OVER.

Tompkins dismissed his valet, and he and Dobbins were alone. They had spent a gay evening. It had commenced with a "spread" at the club—a dinner at which all the good things of earth were served, and voices were drowned in the depths of sparkling wine. Then they had dropped behind the scenes at the opera and carried on a flirtation with the nymphs and sirens of the stage; had taken part in a glorious supper at midnight, and now, at 2 A. M., were sitting in Tompkins' room trying to quiet their nerves. A box of cigars and a long-necked bottle stood between them, and Dobbins was hid behind a cloud of smoke.

Tompkins was talkative. His tongue traveled with lightning rapidity through every subject. Dobbins was a good listener—at least he kept still and let Tompkins do the greater part of the talking. If he stopped for an expression of opinion, Dobbins gave a sort of grunt, which answered for approval, and then Tompkins went on.

"I saw something to-day that s'prised me, Dobbie," said Tompkins, filling his glass for the —th time. "It was a piece in a book. The fellow that wrote it wanted to know if people would live their lives over again. Now, do you know, Dobbie, I think this world about as good as any place; I never did like the idea of being a ghost and floating around everywhere and not saying anything; I'd like to live the whole thing over again. Oh, of course, not everything. I wouldn't want to get caught again in the Bluster syndicate and lose my pile, nor I wouldn't break my ribs again for anything. But if a fellow could commence all over again with the same knowledge and experience he's got now it would be great, old boy, eh? Now, if I could go back and begin my life again, knowing what I do now, don't you see how much better I'd get along? I wouldn't get caught in any schemes then, and I wouldn't lend money to Peters. That's the way it ought to be. We ought to live once to get our bearings, as it were, and then we ought to live our lives over with the knowledge we have got, eh, Dobbie?"

But Dobbie's cigar had fallen from his hand, and he was snoring. "Impolite cuss!" thought Tompkins; "what's the use of a fellow having company if they act that way?" He felt disconcerted. He was prepared to talk on this interesting subject for at least an hour longer, and now he was without a listener. He glanced plaintively at the picture over the mantel. It was a knight in armor, and Tompkins blinked at it in disgust. "Never did like that thing," said he; "sell it as soon as I can. Hello; old Ironsides, come down and have a jag." He blew a whole volley of cigar smoke into the air, which completely hid Sir Knight from view. Tompkins dispensed with the glass, and took a long pull from the bottle. When he raised his eyes again he opened them wide in amazement. The gilt frame above the mantel was empty, and the knight in armor stood before him on the rug.

"I heard your invitation, Mr. Tompkins," said the knight, "and I will take pleasure in bearing you company."

To say that Tompkins stared would be using too mild an expression. His eyes opened until he was all eyes. He feared he had become a victim of delirium tremens. Sir Knight sat down rather ungracefully, and said: "You were talking about living your life over again, Mr. Tompkins; surely, you were not in earnest?"

Tompkins felt relieved. The occurrence was very queer—quite out of the ordinary; but if the old fellow was willing to sit down and talk it wasn't so bad. "I was in dead earnest," he said. "Of course I didn't mean to live just exactly the same old life right over again; but to have the same knowledge and experience that I have now, and take a fresh start."

"Well, why don't you do it, then?" asked his companion.

"Do it? It can't be done."

"Oh, yes it can. If I was sure you wouldn't back out I'd tell you the secret. But you'd back out."

Tompkins' curiosity was aroused. "You don't know me," he said stoutly. "All the fellows at the club say I'm a regular dare devil. I am 'pon honor."

The knight shook his head and sat silent. Tompkins still stared at him; in fact, he didn't dare take his eyes away for fear of his doing some terrible deed. At last the knight broke the silence. "Are you married?" he asked.

"No," said Tompkins, impatiently; "what the deuce has that to do with it?"

"Is there anyone that would miss you if you should disappear—die, say?"

"Not a soul," said Tompkins, brave outwardly, but with his heart knocking against his ribs.

"Well, then, listen," said the knight, "If you are in earnest you can live your life over again easy enough. I will take your place here, and all you have to do is to follow directions. You see the ring upon my finger? It looks like a skull. Well, it is a powerful stone, which, if dissolved, is the cordial of perpetual life. If I drop it into the glass, and you pour the whisky over it, you will find yourself living over again—only you will have the sense, will-power and all the brain faculties of a man."

Tompkins hesitated but a minute. "I'd swallow the soldiers' monument if it was dissolved in whisky," he said. "Give it here."

The knight removed his ring and dropped the stone into the glass. Tompkins poured out the whisky and eagerly began to drink. Once he paused to put the glass down again; but the knight was regarding him sternly, and he finished the dose. He admitted that his hand shook terribly, and that things seemed to be topsy-turvy. Ere he reached the bottom of the glass he became terror stricken. "The old fiend has hooded, hypnotized or murdered me," he thought. "I am choking; I won't drink his cursed potion." With a superhuman effort he raised his empty glass and tried to hurl it at the grinning knight. It fell with a crash against the bars of the grate, and Tompkins, who had arisen, reeled and fell helpless upon the rug.

* * * * *

A long period of darkness, a ringing in his ears, finally the sound of hushed voices and Tompkins awoke. He awoke in a strange room. Not a single familiar thing greeted him. It was rather dark in the room, and a fleshy woman with a white cap and apron was bending over him. Tompkins blushed and tried to pull the covers up and around him, but he had lost all strength in his hands; and when he tried to ask the meaning of it all his voice was but a tiny squawk.

"Bless the baby," said the woman; "he is hungry. Well, never mind, tootsie-wootsey. There, little lamb, Bettie will get him his bottle."

"She said 'bottle,'" thought Tompkins. "Seems to be a crazy old lady, but if she brings a bottle I'll get some strength back. I'm afraid I drank too much last night."

The woman soon returned with a bottle; but not Tompkins' usual style of a bottle. This was a small, flat bottle filled with a sickening mixture of milk, water and sugar.

She tried to poke it into his mouth, but he gave a feeble yell. This seemed to worry the woman, who put the bottle down and actually began to take him up in her arms. Tompkins urged a vigorous resistance, but his hands and feet seemed to have lost their strength, and his manly voice was but a squall. He caught sight of his hands. Oh, heavens! They were but tiny, red fists. Then it came upon him like a flash. He remembered the knight. He was living his life over again.

The situation so puzzled him that he ceased crying and began to think. The nurse (Tompkins thought she must be a nurse) took a low rocker and sat close to the fire. She turned Tompkins over on his stomach, and began to jolt him and pat him on the back. But he was too dumbfounded to utter a sound, so he kept very still and stared at the floor. "This is ridiculous," he said; "I don't want to be a baby. I've been cheated." "How could you live your life over otherwise?" whispered his reason. "People are not born men, they are born babies." This was a complication Tompkins had not bargained for. What he underwent as the day went on was terrible. He was dressed in tight bands and long, lace-trimmed skirts that prevented his even kicking. He was carried down stairs, where first a woman kissed him and called him a whole string of ridiculous names, with a lot of gibberish attached, which he did not understand and disgusted him. Then a black-whiskered man kissed him and chucked him under the chin. Next four or five children filed into the room and kissed him, and called him "little bruvver."

He was decidedly dazed. Here was a contingency which had not entered into his calculations. To live life over again was one thing, but to be obliged to go through the milk and swaddling-clothes period was another. Of what use were his knowledge and experience? He could do nothing but lie in a cradle, with all his manly, active brain and weak, infant body. Yet, in order to live his life over again, he was obliged to commence as a child and grow to become a man. Poor Tompkins! He never knew how time passed; but it did jog along some way. He heard the story of his advent into the family. One dark, cold morning, about three o'clock, there had been a tremendous rap at the door, and the man of the house, Mr. Burly, went hurriedly to the door and fell over a dark, little bundle. It was "Tomnie." They had kept the little wail, and were justly proud of his bright eyes.

What a time of horror it was. Waiting to grow—waiting until his body fitted his mind; given the strong, active brain of a man, with strong emotions of his own, and the weak, helpless body of an infant. Of what use were his former experiences and his knowledge of the ways of the world, since he could not take his place among men until his body attained manly strength? What a horrible swindle had been perpetrated upon him. He doubled up his fists and grew red in the face trying to express his wrath at being victimized by the knight. What was to become of him? That was a puzzler. How long would it be ere he could take his place among men? Day after day he watched Burly start out to work, and followed him mentally to his place of business and tried to picture what was going on in the world. He eagerly listened for his footstep at night, and caught every sentence which fell from his lips. He would have given worlds for the morning paper; and he strained his little red eyes trying to catch a glimpse at it as it lay on the table beside him. He wondered what the boys were doing, and if they missed him. How he longed for a good old talk with Dobbins. The "kids," as he styled them, were no companions for him. When they built a glorious house of blocks in front of him to amuse him he impatiently raised his tiny foot and kicked it over; whereat Mrs. Burly shook her head and feared the "child had a temper." He would have sworn, only his organs of speech had not yet learned to articulate. Of one thing he was certain: he had had enough of living his life over again. There was a hitch somewhere. It ought not to be so, but it was. This incongruity of mind and body was a fearful thing. He would always be beyond the generation in which he lived, and yet always be a part of the past. Where was his exact status? The immaturity of his body blocked the growth of his mind. All that made life a pleasure had passed out of his reach. His friends were no longer his friends; and he could not fit himself into the new condition of things. He had long since made up his mind that the crafty knight was the Old Nick himself, and this was the punishment he had imposed on Tompkins for some fearful crime. Tompkins had never taken much interest in the conversation of women. He felt rather a contempt for their inability to discuss lofty topics, and he always felt decidedly bored when obliged to talk to a woman for any length of time. The nursery talk disgusted him beyond description, and when the nurse and Mrs. Burly sat before the nursery fire for a confidential chat he writhed. He tried to shut his ears, and vowed he wouldn't listen to their "cackle," which sometimes made him grow very pink in the face. They were talking now, and Tompkins was trying hard not to listen, when all at once a sentence caught his ear. Mrs. Burly was talking. "Tommie is such a bright baby," she said; "as soon as he is three years old I am going to send him to the kindergarten." Tompkins gave a jump. Send him to kindergarten, where he would throw colored balls and hop around and sing—never! It was time this outrageous imposition was stopped; and he would make a desperate effort to stop it, even if he lost his life in the attempt.

He gave a rather hoarse cry and threw his whole strength into an effort to rise. So great was the effort that he gave a sudden spring and fell off the nurse's lap. He did not seem to be headed for the floor, but went on falling down—down—down, until he wondered where he would land. Would nothing stop him? The cold perspiration started on his brow and his eyes grew fixed in horror. Something had caught hold of him and was beginning to shake him as a terrier shakes a rat. He dizzily closed his eyes for a brief moment; there was a harder shake, a voice said "Tompkins," and he opened his eyes again. Opened them to see the gray light of morning stealing through the window, the haggard face of Dobbins bending over him as he lay on the hearth rug with a broken glass dish by his side. "Better get up and go to bed, old fellow," said Dobbins; "it's four o'clock, and we've both been asleep."

Tompkins raised slowly up and looked around. The room was the same. The empty bottle stood on the table, and he raised his eyes toward the mantel-piece. There in his accustomed place was the knight in the picture, staring as blankly as if he had never left his frame. Tompkins rose slowly to his feet and staggered to the window. He opened it wide and drew a deep breath of morning air. Then he turned around. "Dobbins," he said solemnly, "I hope I'll never have to live my life but once."

Dobbins laughed. "Try a brandy and soda," he said.

But Tompkins glanced with a shudder at the knight and shook his head.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Emmet's son is to undertake his father's "Fritz."

Ben Stern will do the advance work for the California tour of Fanny Davenport.

The noble youth who married a girl from a minstrel hall evidently believes variety's the spice of life.

Harry Croueste, a famous English clown who died recently, was the last of his profession to claim the title "Jester to the Queen."

The veteran actress, Mme. Janauschek, has announced that she will never play again. Long ago her powers showed signs of diminution of youthful vigor, and the public, proverbially fickle, has deserted her to such an extent that her last tours were unremunerative. The Mirror has asked the general public to unite in a grand testimonial benefit that shall rank with the farewell accorded to Charlotte Cushman.

Joseph Haworth is to play this season in a drama called The Ensign, under Manager Shedden's direction. The play was written by the brother of the star, who has already won a good deal of success as a dramatist. Mr. Haworth has been a persistent and steady worker on the stage for some years, and he has missed a pronounced success very narrowly on several occasions. Like many other actors of energetic natures, he has gone from one play to another and performed such a variety of parts that he cannot be said to have won any distinct place upon the stage. His most successful performance, from a popular standpoint, was "Paul Kauvar." The new play in which he is to appear will be slightly melodramatic in character.

At least one very good melodrama, The Merchant, is the unaided work of a woman. Miss Martha Morton's brilliant success has given her high rank as a playwright. It is related by the Illustrated American that since her earliest girlhood Miss Morton devoted herself to studying dramatic form and style in writing. Her maiden effort was devoted to a dramatization of George Elliot's great novel. Then followed a number of busy years, when study divided the hours with composition. Three years ago, at the time high-pressure living was agitating public sentiment, The Merchant, was written and read by a number of managers, who, one after another, declined it with thanks. Finally, the disappointed author put her rejected effort away, and not until her family suggested competing for a newspaper prize did she dream it would ever be resurrected from the seclusion of her pigeon-holes. The manuscript won the first prize, and, after production at a matinee performance, was again threatened with oblivion. The play was finally purchased, but another delay of twelve months occurred before it met with the ultimate success it has scored in the last few weeks. Miss Morton has charmingly unaffected manners, is a delightful conversationalist, her fine reasoning powers, intuitive perceptions and close observation combining to render her unusually attractive and entertaining.

Book Chat.

It doesn't hurt a writer half so much to strike a humorous vein as it does to bump his "funny bone."

Education is all right just so it doesn't leave its victim too smart to work and not smart enough to get along without work.

James Jeffery Roche, editor of the Boston Pilot, has written a volume on "The Filibusters of the Spanish Main," for the Adventure series.

Edward Bellamy, it is stated, has received $37,000 in royalties from his book "Looking Backward," and is looking into futurity for more.

M. M. Pomeroy, familiarly known as "Brick," is about 60 years old, bald, and wears a chin beard. He resembles a country Methodist parson.

Author: These two books—I hardly know what to call them—are waiting for titles. Joblots: Why don't you call them "American Heiresses," then?

Ouida's new book, "The Last of the Clarencieux," is a study of different types of Hebrew character. It is said to show entire freedom from prejudice.

Charles Dickens' old house in Doughty street, London, is for sale, or is to be let on a long lease. It was from here that he wrote the letters of "Boz," when he was first winning his name and fame.

W. E. Henley, the poet, is preparing an anthology for boys—a book wherein will appear what he considers all the finest fighting or heroic verse, between and including Shakespeare and Whitman.

Mrs. Besant announces that she can no longer serve upon the London school board. The death of Mme. Blavatsky has imposed additional work upon her, and she prefers theosophy to any other line of labor.

The works of Victor Hugo are still read more than those of any other French author. According to a letter from his son-in-law, Vacquerie, the seven editions of the poet's works published during the last five years have brought in 7,500,000 francs.

Hjelmar H. Boyeson is a successful novelist, if success is to be judged by purity and eloquence combined with piquant naturalness of plot and detail. His latest book is entitled "The Mammon of Unrighteousness," and is a strong picture of American life which all will recognize as ideal yet truthful. The material is drawn from life and vividly reproduces certain types of character. It is unequivocally American, and it is truly enjoyable.

General Benjamin F. Butler will call his forthcoming autobiography "Butler's Book." His mother was a very religious woman, and she struck a bargain with Ben by which he was to commit to memory verses of scripture. "I committed to memory," he says, "the four gospels, and once had recited them at call for a quotation in every part. I know every word, not even excepting the first eighteen verses of the first chapter of Matthew, where everybody begat everybody else."

Prof. Jackson, of Columbia College, is one of the two men in America—Prof. Lanman, of Harvard, being the other—who are honored by occasional autograph letters from the High Priest of the Parsees in Bombay. The Parsees are the descendants of the exiled fireworshippers of ancient Persia, and they are reduced now in numbers to about 100,000, but they remain the most moral and intellectual people of Asia. The High Priest's interest in the American professors is the result of their researches in the ancient literature and language of the Persians.

Professional Chat.

When Justice Stephen J. Field, of the Supreme Court, loomed up as a Presidential possibility his brother Cyrus began casting about for certain State delegations. Georgia, he thought, he might capture through Grady, who was already the recognized leader of the new element in the "Cracker" State, the element generally understood to be useful in practical politics. It is sometimes characterized as the "New South," and extends over a large part of Dixie land. Accordingly, Grady received from "Brother Cy." a check for $20,000, and with it the instruction: "Put this where it will do the most good." Grady invested it in the Constitution.

They are still telling stories about the Sheridans, father and son, thus: "Father," said Tom Sheridan one day, "I wish you would get me a second-hand suit of clothes." "What on earth do you want a second-hand suit of clothes for?" "I want to go down in a coal mine." "And in the name of all that is magnificent Tom, why do you want to go down in a coal mine?" "Oh, nothing particular, except just to say I've been there." Richard Brinsley surveyed his boy with a look of mingled admiration and astonishment, and then, placing his paternal hand upon the youth's shoulder, said: "My dear Tom, it's a very easy matter to say that you've been down in a coal mine, without even spoiling a second-hand suit of clothes." "If you don't see fit to alter your course of life, sir, at once," said the austere moralist and irate father upon one occasion, "I will cut you off with a shilling." "Have you got the shilling about you, sir?" replied Tom.

A correspondent tells this anecdote of the poet Whittier's success in aiding a little girl at a school examination: "You know Whittier's love for children. The aged poet one winter renewed his youth in a handsome overcoat of the purest ulster pattern, clad with which he attended a school examination up among the hills so dear to him. He was standing beside the teacher, who was catechizing a dimpled little dot in geography. 'What are the provinces of Ireland?' asked the teacher. 'Potatoes, whisky, aldermen, patriotism,' began the child. 'No, no,' interrupted the teacher; 'I didn't mean products; I said 'provinces.''" 'Oh,' said the girl, 'Connaught, Leinster, Munster and—and—' Here she stuck, put her chubby finger into her rosebud mouth and sought inspiration successively in her toes, the corner of her apron, the ceiling and the poet. All children love the old Quaker poet's kindly face. He smiled. Her face brightened sympathetically. The entente cordiale had been established between them. He patted his ulster significantly. She looked at him inquiringly. He nodded, and she burst out with: 'Oh, Miss Simmons, I know. Connaught, Leinster, Munster and Overcoat!'"

"I don't think I was ever superstitious about anything until recently," said Colonel John R. Thompson, of the office of the secretary of the Senate, to a Washington Post man. "You recollect the late Colonel Thomas G. Morrow, one of the most whole-souled of men. Well, he used to be in our office frequently when Congress was in session. He learned that I had a weakness for canes; that they were in a manner my 'fad.' One day Colonel Morrow said he had a very old stick at home which he would present to me, adding that he thought it would be an interesting addition to my collection. Not long after that Colonel Morrow brought the cane. Before handing it to me he said: 'Thompson, I have changed my mind about giving you this cane. It has a strange history. I can trace it back to 1803, and it has had twenty owners since that time. The strange part of it is that each time the stick changed owners by gift the person who gave it away died within two weeks after. I am just superstitious enough not to give you the cane; but I will sell it to you for 5 cents.' I felt incredulous, of course, as to any occult power the cane might possess, but to satisfy the Colonel I fished out a nickel and bought and paid for the stick, he receiving the money as a necessary part of the transaction. Thus a legal consideration had been given and received for the cane. Colonel Morrow died within two weeks of that day. Is it surprising that I am now a little superstitious and eye that cane askance?"

When the Cows Come Home.

It is the solemn hour when daylight slowly fades,
And as I sit here in the gathering gloom
I hear afar the tinkling on the night air of the bells,
And soon I see the cows come slowly home.

The long, bright day is done, and as darkness slowly steals Down o'er the farm, 'tis then my thoughts will roam
Until at last, through the dim spectral light,
Slow up the lane I see the cows come home.

Deep in the woods I hear the night bird's song,
And on the summer air the mourning dove's low moan,
And I seem to see the faces of friends long gone before,
'Mongst the shadows, when the cows come home.

This earth is cold and drear, but there is one joy for me;
'Tis when sitting here in silence and alone,
I love to dream and ponder o'er the joys which now are past,
In the evening when the cows come home.

NOTES.

Joseph Hindell, of Company B, Stevenson's regiment, died at Milwaukee (Wis.), July 1st.

We are glad our neighbor the Bee has renewed the advocacy of a new charter. From appearances, we will soon be without a government or anything to govern.

San Diego has raised the $200,000 bonus for an iron-plant subsidy and work will begin at once. It shows that the "boom" has not died out in the south. There are localities in this State where such an amount could readily be raised on paper, but it would never materialize.

Rev. Jos. Kranskopf, of Philadelphia, has often been mentioned and quoted from by THEMIS. In this eminent and accomplished scholar we recognize one of the most advanced thinkers of the day. Broad-gauge and liberal in his ideas, he discloses a finish rarely found among modern theologians. We welcome the learned man to our shores.

A magnet carried by Newton in a finger-ring is said to have been capable of raising 746 grains, or about 250 times its own weight of three grains, and to have been much admired in consequence. A magnet formerly belonging to Sir John Leslie, and now in the physical collection at Edinburgh, has still greater power, however, weighing $3\frac{1}{2}$ grains and being able to support 1,560 grains.

We were greatly surprised to note such artistic skill as that disclosed by the 14-year-old daughter of Captain E. M. Stevens. The young lady's idea of landscape painting is something of a wonder in one so young. We had occasion to examine some of the art work of this gifted child, and without a desire to give false praise, must say that the divine gift of the painter is manifest in little Mabel Stevens.

In Spain, France, Ireland and some parts of England, a tinker is held in such abhorrence by the common people as to make it almost impossible for him to get a meal or find lodgings for the night. The reason alleged is, that when the blacksmith was ordered to make nails for Christ's crucifixion he refused, but the tinker made them, and Christ condemned him and all of his race to be wanderers, and never have a roof of their own to cover their heads, until the world's end.

The largest coral reef in the world is the Australian Barrier reef, on the northeast coast of that continent, which extends about 1,100 miles. Its average distance from the land is 20 to 30 miles, but in some points it is 50 to 90 miles distant. The great arm of the sea thus included is 10 to 25 fathoms deep, with a sandy bottom; but toward the southern end, where the reef is furthest from the shore, the depth gradually increases to 40, and in some parts to more than 60 fathoms. A reef on the west coast of New Caledonia is 400 miles long, and for a distance of many leagues seldom approaches within 8 miles of the land.

Within a week death has claimed two pioneer residents of Sacramento—Captain N. A. Kidder and Wm. Cummings. Captain Kidder died at the ripe age of 82. He was an old sea captain, and arrived on this coast in 1850. Settling in Sacramento, he pursued an active life until his death, and filled many responsible public positions. His sister, Mrs. C. A. Chamberlain, was an accomplished writer, and contributed many poems of merit to the literature of the world. Mr. Cummings was in early days a jeweler of prominence and conducted business here; later on he was in business for a time in San Francisco, but for years has lived in retirement from active business life. He was a member of the Sacramento Society of California Pioneers.

Time and science will demonstrate to what extent drunkards are responsible for their deeds, and will also find a way to reclaim many of the unfortunate persons afflicted with an uncontrollable appetite for liquor. Inebriety is unquestionably a disease of the brain, either inherited or acquired, and must be treated as such to effect a cure. It would be a great boon to humanity if asylums were maintained at public expense where inebriates might either be permanently cured or prevented from inflicting so much misery and suffering. Most of the crimes, and many of the accidents, in which the innocent and guilty are made to suffer alike are directly caused by the use of liquor; and as there seems to be no way to prevent its sale, its worst victims should be confined and treated in the same manner other persons are treated for mental disorders. Public sentiment will soon make the demand for such asylums, and their erection will be of great benefit to mankind by eradicating the great evil of excessive liquor drinking.

Elections in San Francisco come high. According to the annual report of the secretary of the Board of Election Commissioners, the total expenses of the Registrar's office for the fiscal year amounted to $135,073 17, while the total number of votes cast at the election in 1890 was but 55,565; the principal items being salary of Registrar, $3,600; precinct election clerks, $5,589; printing precinct registers, $12,850 55; rent of election rooms, $7,302 50; salary of extra clerks, $29,098 05; election booths, $2,400 55. It appears from the report that the board was created in March, 1878; that their expenditures the first year were $53,007 64. There has been a constant increase in election years, and the cost the last fiscal year is greater than in any year in the past. If the people, through the instrumentality of the board, received compensation for this excessive expenditure no criticism would come; but it is of general notoriety that elections in the metropolis by the sea are unusually shadowy.

Take things as they are and make the best of them. Prudence in a woman should be an instinct, not a virtue. Happiness is like the echo—it answers but does not come. Vice in the young fills us with horror; in the old, disgust. Caution is often wasted, but it is a very good risk to take. The man who never makes any blunders seldom makes any good hits. The great difficulty about advice is the preponderance of quantity over quality. When a man has the reputation of being plain-spoken it is a sure sign that he never sees anything good in others. The slowest and dullest woman soon gets on to a new wrinkle—if it appears in another woman's face. Don't think that because you have exhausted all your own resources you have exhausted all in the world; here are acres to be ploughed outside your own gate. Because a man makes a loud noise by continually shooting off his mouth, don't think for an instant that it is an overflow of brain power; consider the mule; he is a good example.

We were amused at the reading of the affidavits made by the managing editors of our daily contemporaries that were filed in the case of one Smith, charged with complicity in the robbery of Robert Allen, in opposition to an application for a change of the place of trial, based mainly upon the affidavit of the defendant, wherein were pasted all the articles that have been published concerning the Allen case since it transpired. The reports published in the dailies were decidedly sensational, and were liberally interspersed with very direct opinions. Our grave editors swear that the matters they published were as general news, and were not for the purpose of inflaming the public mind or creating any prejudice against any person, nor for the purpose of preventing any person from having a fair and impartial trial; and that they did not believe the publication of the articles referred to will prevent any person from receiving a fair trial in Sacramento county. It seems to us this is an admission that their papers are without influence, and a concession that the "power of the press" is with them a thing of the past. News is one thing; the expression of opinion another. To say, for instance, that the publication of a picture representing a man hanging to a gibbet, and labeled "This is what Sacramento wants," is news, hardly accords with our views. To denominate persons who have not had the opportunity of a trial as "thugs" and "dive keepers," may to some seem news, but we regard it an expression of opinion. We declined to sign an affidavit for the reason that when we express an opinion we believe we are right, and we expect that which we write will, in a measure, influence the public; we intend that it shall. It strikes us that in this matter the dailies say, in effect, to the people: "Do not mind what we say; we do a great deal of shouting, and at times become violent, but it is only for the purpose of gathering in the nickels that come from the sale of our papers. We denounce men because it is popular to do so—suggest they should be hanged or sent to the penitentiary, but it is only that the people will buy our papers; they know we are shamming; they are not influenced by it, and have too much sense to place credence in what we say." With respect to the clause in the affidavits, that the public mind was not influenced by the publications in our daily contemporaries, we cannot with seriousness deny it, and if called upon would be compelled to depose in like manner concerning much of that which they present to us daily. But with the sworn admission that that which is manifestly intended to sway the public mind fails of its object, we see not the gain attained by the publication of these opinionated articles. It seems to us a "vain and idle act." It is perhaps right, however, that journalists on our leading daily papers should swear to the truth, and place it on record. We opine the people have long since suspected that an ordinary newspaper opinion is of as little value as a forty-foot lot in the moon. They do, however, respect the opinions of a journal that expresses itself firmly, and whose editors have such conviction in the views they have written that they will stand by them, and decline to publicly acknowledge they meant not that which they wrote.

NEW YORK LETTER.

SOME UGLY FACTS ABOUT AMERICAN TOURISTS.

Trade Circles—The Gold Output—Beer and Classics—Music—Naval Militia Drills—Broadway Cable Road—Largest Depot in the World.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, July 10, 1891.

If the Honorable James Russell Lowell should propound his celebrated question, "What is so rare as a day in June?" this season he would in all probability be informed that a good business day is much more rare in this part of the country. Here and there you will find a man who makes a pretense of moving goods in and out of his store in a feverish sort of way, and who informs you that he has "not been so busy in years," but the sight of the wonderful bargains that the young man (who is evidently a salesman himself) is obtaining has but little effect on the average buyer. The modern customer is fly—very fly. And if this is the complaint in the retail world, how much more true is it of the wholesale dealer. Business began late only to have its early development stopped by strikes in the most important trades and misunderstandings regarding the tariff among importers. As the matter now stands the season's brisk trade is over with little or no result. As a consequence, the exports of gold have been heavier than ordinary and the stock market has declined proportionally.

The export of gold during the past year has been something unprecedented. Something like $60,000,000 has gone over to the other side of the Atlantic within the past twelve months, a state of affairs that is unequalled in financial history. No other nation in the world could stand the constant drain on its resources such as the United States has been subjected to from the very beginning and yet present a prosperous appearance. How much longer even we can stand such a state of affairs is becoming a question of moment with the student of political economy as applied to a republic. A large share of this exportation goes to pay the bills of the American tourist in Europe. The fashionable world—or rather that share of it that is so ultra-fashionable as to be unable to remain satisfied with things American—annually spends more money in Europe, because it is the correct thing, than would suffice for luxurious support under proper circumstances. In England it is a proverb that "only dukes and Americans travel first class"—a mildly sarcastic way of stating that the extravagance of American travelers is without its equal. Large bills of goods are purchased on the other side, apparently with no other purpose than that of saving the duty on their entry into American ports. Of course our best people would not smuggle—oh, no! but then you know the law says that goods in one's possession over a year are entitled to free entry as personal effects; and it is so easy to have our bills dated a year ago. A bill dated 1890 may be a mistake, but it is so convenient at times. On the other hand, European visitors to this continent are not over liberal. Our hotel keepers will tell you that they are satisfied with very moderate accommodations, and that their bills are never large, if, indeed, they are not seized upon by American friends and not permitted to spend a cent. Letters of introduction are an European product, and few tourists from across the herring pond are unprovided with them. As a result, the free and easy American feels called upon to pay the bills, and is sarcastically written up for his pains. It is an old, old story that the European traveler considers very little experience necessary to fit him for discoursing on America and things American; but the strangest part of it is that so many of them look upon favors as a sign of fear, to be repaid by sneers.

Speaking of the tariff, Ohio seems to have adopted the motto of Commodore Lawrence, with variations. "Don't give up the ship" is simply changed into "Don't give up the sheep."

A number of cherished opinions have been rarely shocked by the success of the Thomas farewell concerts at the Madison Square Garden. The majority of the "best people," being naturally conservatives, predicted that any entertainment where beer was admitted would only appeal to the lower classes and become anything but refined. But the experience of the past week has proved that beer and classical music are no more incompatible in America than in the fatherland. In no concerts have the programmes been more thoroughly classical than at the Thomas concert. Berlioz, Auber, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Gounod and Wagner are all represented on the programmes, which are likewise remarkable for their catholicity. As a rule, the French and Italian schools seem to be most in favor, as being nearer to the people than the heavy classics of Germany. All are received with an attention and evident appreciation, however, that shows a thorough love as well as an understanding of music. The number of elderly people that attend with conspicuous regularity has been frequently remarked. The frequency with which grey heads appear in the audience gives an air of respectability to the entire entertainment that is distressing to the reformers who predicted failure at the beginning.

The drills of the new naval militia which are soon to take place at Fisher's Island are looked forward to with a great deal of interest. Fisher's Island is at the eastern end of Long Island Sound and is a strategic point of considerable importance, as commanding one of the chief approaches of New York city. The new militia are ordered to assemble there, where they will be met by a detachment from the North Atlantic Squadron, which will assist in the drills and afford the most approved means and opportunities of instructing the new volunteers in the peculiarities of naval warfare. A vessel will be dispatched by the Navy Department to serve as a training ship, and no pains will be spared to make the new departure a success. But, nevertheless, it is a new departure, and, as such, is but poorly regarded by a number of military authorities. The gist of the arguments against a corps of naval volunteers is, that while volunteers are excellent for the work of the line, special arms should be served by trained men—a suggestion that loses its point when the fact is considered that the men comprising the new corps are in every way fitted, both by education and training, to deal with the scientific problems of the day, either in the abstract or concrete. The preparations have been thorough, however, and all the plans so carefully laid that it will need more than an ordinary conjunction of adverse circumstances to prevent a successful demonstration of the usefulness of the new militia; and with success comes the possibilities of future development that are simply appalling in extent.

"Talk about your eorduroy roars," said a can't-get away New Yorker to another who started yesterday to camp for the season in the Adirondacks, "there is nothing in the North Woods to beat the Broadway horse-cars just now. For miles the centre of that thoroughfare has been dug out, and the cable is in every stage of being laid. Rails have been temporarily laid at the side of the street, and in a primitive manner, and over this side-track the cars go bumping along in a manner calculated to give its patrons a perpetual dyspepsia. I took a ride along the route one afternoon this week, and the jouncing was so terrific that it actually made a lady swear. To this horrible fact I stand ready to make an affidavit and likewise to thank the young woman for expressing my own sentiments in the matter. She had tripped in jauntily, seated herself in a corner opposite me, took a newspaper out of her bag and settled herself down for a good long read. Presently the car humped itself and jumped into the air, and she looked up with a glance of indignation. Ten seconds later her newspaper was nearly thrown out of her hand, and she had become wrathful. A third bounce settled the business, and she crumpled the paper into her bag and swore softly but audibly, wishing that the road were dammed or otherwise improved. She was really excusable, and I have no doubt that if the recording angel was anywhere around he had cotton stuffed into his ears. The road is run without the slightest regard to public comfort, and if the New Yorkers were not the most patient people in the world they would rise up en masse and demand better accommodation, while the Broadway directors are digging their gold mine—a mine that will prove richer in the end than any Arizona bonanza."

Contemporaneous with the reconstruction of Broadway is the erection on that ancient Indian trail and modern highway of civilization the largest and finest railroad depot in the world. It will occupy the west side of Broadway between Thirty-seventh and Thirty-ninth streets, and will extend back across Seventh avenue to Eighth avenue, being 400 feet frontage on Broadway and 1,300 feet deep, and so arranged as not to obstruct any thoroughfare, as the floor of the depot will be 20 feet above the street. On Broadway the building will be seven stories high for office accommodation. This gigantic depot is intended to accommodate the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company, which is about to build an eight-track bridge across the Hudson. Recent calculations show that 750 passenger trains will cross the river by the bridge at Seventy-first street during twenty-four hours, which is more than thirty trains an hour. The New Jersey promoters of the scheme will unite with the New York corporation at a meeting to be held on the 23d of July, and as the needed $1,000,000 in cash has been provided, the actual work of construction will begin in September. The four blocks in question are mainly occupied by cheap structures of a past era. M. F.

FLASHES.

There is no genuine sincerity in fashionable life.

Envy in the human heart makes the devil's work easy.

A red nose is usually considered a picture of "still life."

The fellow who is good because he has to be, is not good.

Some may feel good—but that is no sign that they are good.

It is astonishing what amount of trash gets into the Sunday papers.

Those who write open letters often wish they had kept them closed.

There is no occasion for lightning to strike twice in the same place. Once generally does the business.

Some men talk in their sleep; many of our preachers sleep in their talk—so does the congregation.

A woman's happiest hours are when she's asleep. When she's asleep is the happiest time of her husband—often.

Death of Thomas W. Humphrey.

But a few weeks ago we noted the marriage of Thomas W. Humphrey to Miss Edith Smith. We little expected we would so soon be called upon to announce his death. He died at San Francisco Monday afternoon, of typhoid fever. Mr. Humphrey was but 27 years of age. While teaching school he studied law and was admitted to the bar. He established himself in practice here, and soon laid the foundation for a lucrative business. We sincerely regret that at the time when life's best success was opened out to him, when in the honeymoon of married life, he should be called away. His friends are many, though he was a man not ostentatious. They deeply feel his death, and extend sympathy to his widow and brothers.

The Weight of the Sun.

The weight of the sun is found in the same way as that of the earth, namely, by ascertaining the volume in cubic miles and its mean density. The theory of universal gravitation gives us the means of comparing the weights of the heavenly bodies as if they were weighed on a steelyard. The sun's distance has been found to exceed its diameter 107 $\frac{1}{2}$ times, and the diameter to be, therefore, about 860,000 miles. As the sun is a perfect sphere its volume is easily deduced from these figures. The mean density of the sun has been found, by calculations based on the influence it exercises upon the earth and the other planets, to be about one-fourth that of the earth. So, roughly speaking, it is one and a half times heavier than a sphere of water of the same magnitude and of uniform density throughout. The dimensions and density of the sun being known, it becomes easy to calculate its weight, for we know the exact weight of a cubic mile of water. The row of figures representing the weight of the sun would be too long to give any real idea of its immensity, which may, perhaps, be to some extent grasped if it is stated that the weight of the earth, as given by Herschel, is 5,582 trillions of tons, and the weight of the sun is 326,000 times greater than that of the earth.

A Curious "Circulating Library."

Perhaps one of the most unique and remarkable institutions in the world is the "Bone Circulating Library," an attachment of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York city. In the room, which is fitted up with shelves, cases, etc., just as any other library room, are hundreds of thousands of human bones of all sizes, shapes and forms. The bones, which are numbered and labeled, are placed in order on the shelves and in the cases, an attendant being always on hand to act in the same capacity as a librarian. It is his duty to keep track of the bones lent; to enter them upon books, and to see that they are returned uninjured. During the day scores of students flock in and out of this uncanny place, carrying packages of strange appearance in their hands or sticking out of their coat pockets. These packages are made up of human bones, which they are returning or taking from this "Bone Circulating Library."

Fashion's Follies.

What folly is this that sends people to "resorts," lodges them in a small, stuffy room, feeds them at an inferior table, and paints heavy dark circles under their eyes as a result of their "much needed rest?" It is the same absolute monarch that has ruled the majority of mankind for so many eras—fashion. If you do not go away for a period during the summer, leaving the comforts of your home for the discomforts of a lodging house, you lose caste among your neighbors. They begin to think—and say—that, after all, you are no better than you should be, a fact which they have suspected ever since early last spring, when the master of the house, with the most hardened indifference to the shocked looks of the neighbors, lowered his dignity enough to push the new lawn-mower several times across the front yard.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"The Lilliputians" drew large houses on Thursday and Friday nights in their musical comedy, The Pupil in Magic. The play is German and rendered in the German language. It is certainly a moral entertainment, and must have required great research to procure so many little people endowed with dramatic and musical ability to fill the roles. To-night the bill will be changed and The Burgomaster of Pinneberg given.

The Valley of the Jehoshaphat.

The valley of Jehoshaphat is named by the prophet Joel as a place of the Divine judgment. In this valley God was to "gather all nations and plead with them" for "His people" and for His "heritage Israel whom they have scattered among the nations." In Joel, iii:12, is this allusion: "Let the heathen be wakened and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about." The Hebrew word "Emek" used by Joel is one that is applied to spacious valleys. George Grove, in Smith's "Bible Dictionary," observes that "the frequent mention in Joel of Mount Zion, Jerusalem and the temple may have led to the belief that the locality of the great judgment would be in their immediate neighborhood. This would be assisted by the mention of the Mount of Olives in the somewhat similar passage in Zachariah, xiv:3-4." Then it is suggested that Jehoshaphat was really an ancient name of the valley of Kedron, and "that from the name the connection with Joel's prophecy and the belief in its being the scene of Jehovah's last judgment have followed." Grove also remarks that "the name would seem to be generally confined by travelers to the upper part of the glen from about the 'Tomb of the Virgin' to the southeast corner of the wall of Jerusalem." Dean Stanley in "Sinai and Palestine," says, "as the southern ravine had already given a name to the infernal fires of the other world, so in Mussulman and mediæval traditions the valley of the Kedron was identified with the valley of Jehoshaphat, or of the Divine Judgment; and long regarded by the pilgrims of both religions (Jewish and Mahometan) as the destined scene of the judgment of the world." Mimpriess says: "The brook Kedron is the only name by which 'the valley' itself is known in scripture; for it is by no means certain, nor even probable, that the name 'valley of Jehoshaphat,' in Joel, was intended to apply to this valley." Robinson speaks of "the valley of Jehoshaphat" as "the brook Kedron" of the scriptures," and informs us that from St. Stephen's gate, on the eastern side of the city, a path winds down on a course southeast by east and crosses the valley. The valley of Hinnom, Robinson tells us, forms a junction with the valley of Jehoshaphat. Also, that in gardens lying partly within the mouth of Hinnom and partly in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and irrigated by the waters of Siloam. Jerome assigns the place of Tophet, "where the Jews practiced the horrid rites of Baal and Molech, and burned their sons and daughters in the fire." This seems to be about all the information that can be obtained about the valley of Jehoshaphat and its adjacent places.

The Plain Boy.

Your plain boy grows to be a still plainer man. When he acquires whiskers they don't fit. His mustache is a fright and his hair parts crosswise. His trousers bag at the knees, and his shoulders are not mates. But the first thing you know he goes courting the prettiest, brightest girl in town. She laughs at him, but he smiles and calls again. Somehow he interests her. He has something to say beyond the silly small talk of the day. The pretty girl, for the first time in her life, has a beau from whom she learns something and who is not tiresome. Moreover, her bright sallies are not wasted on him. The other fellows look blank and say, "Aw!" but he knows when to applaud. She finds that he has a purpose in life, and will do to tie to. And along in June they tie, and the other fellows cannot understand it. Twenty years later when the homely man goes to congress, gets rich, or makes his mark in literature or a profession, his more beautiful companions begin to tumble.

Civility is a very desirable trait of character, and sensible people should make a point of keeping it on hand. Civility is one of the Christian graces; it is obligatory upon a lady or a gentleman, and it is excellent stock in trade for those who wish to get on in the world. We mean civility, not servility. To cringe and fawn and flatter is despicable. Ostentatious politeness, with a profusion of bows and fine speeches, may be burdensome; but a kind word of greeting, a polite attention, a little act of courtesy is quite another thing. There are people who have a great deal of that pride which gives one the assurance of being "just as good as anybody else, if not a little better," fancy that to care nothing for what others feel, to take the best and be the foremost by dint of pushing, and never on any account to allow another precedence, is to assert themselves properly. This is a great mistake; such conduct, instead of being an evidence of true independence of character, is a mark of ignorance and vulgarity.

Famous Aerolites.

On clear nights when the limpid atmosphere permits us to observe to the best advantage the innumerable splendors of the sky, we have perhaps had the good fortune to witness a shower of meteors; and these apparitions have been well calculated to arouse our curiosity and stimulate the imagination. We know of quite a number of these aerolites that exceed 1,000 pounds in weight. Here is a list of some of the famous aerolites:

1. The aerolite which long served as a bench at the door of the church of Caille, in the Maritime Alps, now in Paris. Weight, 1,675 pounds.
2. The aerolite found in 1788, at Tucuman, in the Argentine Republic, now in London. Weight, 1,695 pounds.
3. The aerolite discovered in Siberia by Pallas, in 1749, now in Paris. Its former weight was 1,876 pounds, but fragments which have been broken from it have reduced its weight to 1,390 pounds.
4. The aerolite which fell in 1816 at Santa Rosa, in New Granada. Weight, 2,010 pounds.
5. The aerolite which served as an idol at Charcas, Mexico, was later an ornament of the church there, and was finally taken by the French to Paris. Weight, 2,290 pounds.
6. The aerolite discovered in 1861 at Melbourne. The two fragments, one in Melbourne and the other in London, weigh together 8,040 pounds.
7. The aerolite of Bendego, near Bahia, Brazil, discovered in 1816 and taken to Rio de Janeiro in 1877. Weight, 13,364 pounds.
8. The aerolite which was found near the source of the Yellow river, in China, and which measured fifty feet in height. Weight, 26,800 pounds.
9. The great aerolite of Tucuman, in South America. Weight, 40,200 pounds.
10. The enormous aerolite discovered in 1875 upon a mountain of the province of St. Catharine, in Brazil, and of which the fourteen fragments weigh together 67,000 pounds.

Finally, the greatest of them all, the meteoric stone which was discovered at Ximenes, in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico. The two pieces have the enormous weight of 75,000 pounds.

Mr. Jacques Leotard, a French writer, who compiled this list, says there is little doubt that many aerolites exist that are even larger than those here mentioned. The fact should also be remembered that the surface of the sea is much greater than the land surface, and, of course, the larger number of aerolites fall into the ocean. One remarkable and very curious consequence of this increase in the mass of the earth is that the rotation of our planet upon its axis in the course of many ages must, little by little, become slower, increasing the length of the day.

A shrewd observer once said in walking the streets of a slippery morning that one might see where the good-natured people lived by the ashes thrown on the ice before the doors.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.
ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff, jyt8-St

Fine Table
Wines
From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

Reading the Human Face.

Everyone knows that men's passions, propensities and peculiarities, as well as their callings, are reflected in their faces, but it is only the few who have made the study of physiognomy an especial pursuit who are gifted with the power of reading those faces. Judges who have served long terms on the bench, lawyers in large practice, and doctors of eminence, possess the power of interpreting physiognomies more largely than other people, but anyone can acquire the rudiments of the art by dint of hard study. It is as impossible to disguise a face (without putting on a mask) as it is to disguise one's handwriting. When the expert comes the disguise is torn off and the face tells the true story of the spirit inside the body. One only needs to visit the penitentiary to realize how undeniably vice writes its sign-manual upon the features. It is not the drunkard only whose red nose, flabby cheeks and watery eyes betray him; it is the sensualist whose vice is read in his lips, the knave whose propensity is revealed by the shape of his mouth, and the man of violence who has been betrayed by his eyes. An experienced detective or a trained jailer seldom asks the crime of which a prisoner is guilty; he can tell it on the criminal's face. In short, all the advantages which Fowler told us we were going to derive from the study of phrenology we may possibly gain from the older and more mysterious science of face-reading.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND
HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.
Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,
Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,
SACRAMENTO.

PANTS to ORDER
$3.50 to $13.50
SUITS TO ORDER
$15.00 to $50.00
1000 Patterns to Select from.
GABEL the TAILOR
426 J STREET.

THE PASTEUR

GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

"IN THE HEART OF A STEAMSHIP."

My father was a rich man when I left New York. His partner's only daughter was to be my wife when I should return.

I was a student in Vienna hospital when I received a cable from home that the old house had failed. It proved to be an honest failure, and both families were beggars.

I counted my pocketbook from cover to cover. I had just enough to leave free of debt and get to Liverpool. How to cross? Well, swim if necessary.

In the Liverpool steamer office was an old Harvard college-mate. This embarrassed me. He owed me a grudge from the football days at Berkeley oval. An Englishman seldom forgets.

Determined to work my passage over, I entered what I supposed was not the office where my old competitor was manager. I did not see him, but he must have caught sight of me. I was surprised at the promptness with which I was told to go on board the C—, and something would be found for me to do.

Two days out I was called to the captain's own room, insulted with the charge, at first politely put, of being a stowaway, and finally stung to madness bitter enough to obey silently when the officer said: "If you really don't want to steal your passage, go report to the engineer and shovel coal."

This I did. My experience I want to describe. It is common enough to hundreds of poor scamps this very moment all over the seas. But, God pity them, they have not the tongue to tell, nor, perhaps, always the sensibilities to feel, what their life really is.

Dizzy already with the tossings of the sea, I staggered down the series of iron stairways till I stood at last on the ship's lowest deck. Behind me were the vast bunkers of coal that glistened from a million eyes when the furnace doors were opened, and then faded out of sight. Before me the huge boilers rose, not silent, but roaring monsters, so hungry that the toiling pygmies who fed them jumped to their tasks till the sweat rolled from their bare backs. The heat was, to one descending from the pure breath of the Atlantic, something fearful. I was dressed in my ordinary attire, and even an overcoat at that, so precipitate had been my action. The smell of baking lubricants and red-hot iron, the dead air, poisoned with coal gas and bilge water odors, the dust, despite all showering, but most of all the sudden transition from white light to blackest darkness, momentarily proceeding, as this and that furnace door was open and shut, almost felled me to the deck.

As I stumbled and caught my hold on the stair rail, again the hardy fellows shouted: "Give us your shilling and go back!" supposing that I was a curious passenger seeing the sights of the ship.

The voices of derision roused me. I was no passenger. I was an honest beggar, like the rest; and here I was to be imprisoned for a week, watch on and off!

In a frenzy I tore off my clothing till I stood in my trousers and shoes like my fellows. I stated my hiring to the fellow in charge of the watch, and he gave me my shovel with a pitying laugh.

I was up at the boiler nearest the stair. The 'midships would have been a less drunken spot, but I leaped at the hardest of the task.

My head grew dizzy. I panted for a full vital breath. The corrugated flooring, polished till it was glossy smooth in spots, tangled my poor feet so that I repeatedly fell. Ah, that sense of whirling, whirling, whirling! How little the fair folk in the cabins know of all this Plutonian hole beneath their carpets.

Really, I thought I could describe somewhat that lurid fantasm and these scarlet-skinned, good-natured demons, but I cannot. Vertigo struck me down in less than a half hour. The next I knew I was being revived in the companion-way, and the sea air was so grateful. The ship's surgeon asked me if I felt able to go to work again, and courteously recognized that I was not a laborer. I was graceless enough to growl out my spleen and reassert that I was no stowaway, which the good doctor did not understand.

I turned to the assistant engineer, who stood by, and asked him to give me a job of which I might be capable.

Thrusting his hands in his pockets, he walked off with a command to "try him at oiling."

Ed B—, the head oiler—dear, brave heart, I often go down to the dock to see him when in port here, but the engine is as dear to him as a bride or I would long ago have battered his fortunes—he took me in hand. We walked along those mere bird-cages of stairways and platforms, a labyrinth of passages in a forest of steel arms, wheels, shafting and steam piping. To a landsman, a young physician now, that endless maze of mighty anatomy is at first simply awful. It sobers one, this sullen, ceaseless throb of the monster's heart, the deep breathing of the steam chests, the sigh of the creature's spirit as the pistons make one more and yet one more hereulean thrust turning the crank shaft.

Each time, as the piston slowly starts, it seems as if it must be the last, and infinite fatigue prevail. But no, it goes on, night and day, motion, motion, motion. Don't let me fire you reader, but I do wish I could express to you something of the solemn impression that began to seize upon me, crawling like a fly after Ed, the oiler. Then the hiss, the scream, the little sighs and moans of here and there a jet of truant steam, almost human sounds issuing from the jungle of polished steel!

"She's a tiger, she is!" cried Ed. "Look out!"

I heard that kind exclamation frequently as we went our rounds. There were others doing the same work, but I became a chosen attendant of my cat-like friend. He had a sprained elbow, and I helped him professionally. He got my story. We were intimate in two or three days, and I record it with honest satisfaction, for Ed B— was a genuine man.

It was one day off the Banks that we stopped. The chief got a notion that the shaft was not sound, and the next voyage it proved so, for a hair-line along and around that huge polished arm of power turned out an incipient fracture. But it was, on investigation, decided this voyage that there was nothing wrong. Still, there we lay on the breast of the swells for more than two hours. Ed came to me and said:

"Now she's still, the second engineer thinks we might go into the pit and clean out the waste and oil puddles. I don't like it, doctor, when she's got steam on. What if she turned her crank, eh?"

The brave boy went jumping down, however, down, down, till he stood directly under that massive crank, which had stopped at the half turn over his head.

The reader will understand that the space allowed for the crank to make the full circuit round below was only sufficient for the iron to sweep through. Into that now empty space Ed was preparing to step. It was as dark as a grave and about a grave's dimensions. I held the torch above his head. Men working by torchlight in that place resemble imps. We were good natured imps, however, and, though very cautious, were chatting cheerfully enough.

"I never like this job at sea," resumed Ed, "nor at any time except when the last pound o' steam is out of her, two or three days at dock."

"But the engineer knows we are here," I replied.

"Yes, he ordered me down—and there's no need of it—and he don't like me," Ed got off between his breath, bending to his perilous work in the pit.

"Heavens, man!" I exploded, catching at what I thought was his meaning. "That would be murder!"

"Hush, doctor! Not that, not that! But if I had refused to come, as he thought I would, don't you see he could break me—that is, discharge me when we get into New York?"

A few minutes later Ed sent me aloft for an extra mop of cotton waste. I was to hurry, for we knew not what minute the captain might go ahead. I remember I had scoured the waste; I was picking my way along the enigma of little ladders and platforms. Far below, through the shadows flung from occasional gas-jets, the sleeping monster, like a nickel plated spider, lay prone, and I seemed to be exploring its viscera like some daring pathologist. Away below me in the light of his torch Ed reminded me of a microbe.

Suddenly the gong struck from the pilot-house. God help me, I can hear it yet!

I was near the engineer's landing. Quick as a flash I was on the engineer, and like a tiger I caught at the wheel which he was turning to let on steam.

"Man!" I yelled, "you haven't struck your own warning, 'All clear.' B— is in the crank pit!"

But I was too late. She gave one turn, at least. Then the scoundrel, or fool, I don't know which, yielded to me and we stopped her. But such a cry as came echoing up from the very heart of the engine!

"Thank God for that second cry!" I fairly sobbed as it floated up.

Then I sprang away and down. Ed lay insensible on the arm of the crank, as if the engine had stopped in pity and held him out to us. He had fainted with pain only, for the sprained elbow had been broken. How he escaped heaven only knows.

Now this is the curious part of my story. Less than a year after, when she was cold and lying at the docks without a pound of steam, that engine killed this same engineer. It must have been in the middle of the night. What he was doing down in her no one knows. A list by cargo and tide must have moved the machinery a half a turn and crushed him.

Ed B— says that engines have souls, but seafaring men cherish queer notions.

Indolence is a delightful but distressing state; we must be doing something to be happy. Action is no less necessary than thought to the instinctive tendencies of the human frame.—Hazlitt.

According to law a widow is entitled to her third, but the men are generally pretty shy after she has buried her second.—Binghampton Leader.

UNION ICE COMPANY

ARE NOW PREPARED TO FURNISH

Pure Mountain Ice

NEW QUARTERS:

521 AND 523 I STREET.

CHARLES SELLINGER, Agent.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and original. Those who desire a thorough education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEERCAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHREIER,

TWENTY-THIRD STREET, BET. Q AND R,

CEMENT SIDEWALKS,

Garden Walks, Carriage Drives, Etc., constructed at shortest notice, in the most workman-like manner and at lowest rates.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT
BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.
M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

W. R. STRONG CO.

Founded 1852.

Fruit Packers and Shippers.

PROPRIETORS OF

CAPITAL NURSERIES,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Headquarters for ALFALFA SEED and OREGON POTATOES, in lots to suit.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

M. DUFFY,

Manufacturer of Carriages, Wagons, Carts, Etc.

REPAIRING

Done at Short Notice. All Work Warranted.

1111-1113 J Street, bet. Eleventh and Twelfth,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE NO. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS,

J. B. DOLAN

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES,

Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,
SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

TELEPHONE 248.

Apes and Men.

In the New Review for June there is a very remarkable paper by Professor Garner on the language of apes, which he has been studying with the help of the phonograph, and of which he thinks that he has acquired at least some of the rudiments. He tells us that, with the consent of Dr. Frank Baker, director of the National Zoological Gardens at Washington, he separated a pair of apes which had been living together and placed them in different rooms; then he placed the phonograph near the cage of the female and recorded a few of the sounds which she had uttered in that instrument. It was then removed to the cell of the male and made to repeat the sounds thus registered. "The surprise and perplexity of the male were evident. He traced the sounds to the horn from which they came, and failing to find his mate, he thrust his hand and arm into the horn quite up to his shoulders, withdrew it and peeped into the horn again and again. He would then retreat and again cautiously approach the horn, which he examined with evident interest. The expressions of his face were indeed a study."

Using the phonograph, and doing all in his power to imitate its sound after he had obtained what he believed to be the chimpanzee word either for milk or for the desire to obtain milk, Professor Garner made the greatest effort to repeat this word with his own tongue and lips to a capuchin monkey. The monkey immediately turned to look at him, and when he had repeated it three or four times very distinctly, the monkey repeated the sound and turned to a pan kept in his cage for supplying him with drink, brought the pan to the front of the cage, came quite up to the bars and uttered the word himself, though as yet Professor Garner had not shown him any milk or any other drink. Then, and not till then, milk was brought and poured into the pan, which the monkey drank with great zest, and then repeated the sound again some three or four times. And Professor Garner found that when he wanted his pan replenished he always used the same sound. And as, when water was used instead of milk, the same word was repeated to express the desire for it, the inference was drawn that the word denoted either liquid or the thirst which was satisfied by liquid. The same experiment was tried with a sound which Professor Garner discovered to be always used in connection with solid food, a banana or a carrot, a bit of bread or an apple; and as the same word seemed to apply to all of them equally, Professor Garner inferred that the word described either solid food in general or the hunger for it. And in the same way he discovered the sound which described pain or sickness, and another which expressed either a sense of danger or a threat, the effect of its utterance being to alarm the monkey so violently that he always sprang to the highest point in his cage, and after it had been repeated three or four times the result was that the creature became almost frantic with dread; nor would this monkey even allow himself to be attracted by the words for drink or food after he had once learned to associate Professor Garner with this sound, expressive of either danger or menace. In this fashion Professor Garner obtained the mastery of about eight or nine sounds, which may be changed by different modulations into three or four times that number, so as to express modified forms of the same word, all of them chiefly vowel sounds, with the barest indication of something like a consonant; and these sounds Professor Garner regards as the constituent elements of an ape language which has a variety of different dialects, according to the species of ape addressed.—London Spectator.

Little Curious Things.

At Cambridge, England, butter is sold by the yard, a pound of the article being rolled into a roll a yard long and sold in sections to suit buyers.

The Arabian year is a lunar one, and in the course of thirty-two years each month runs through all of the seasons.

The highest meteorological station in Europe is on the top of the Sonnblick, in Austria. It is 10,168 feet above the level of the sea. The oldest station of the same character is at Pekin, China. It was founded in the year 1279, and still contains three of the original instruments.

The growth of nails on the left hand requires eight to ten days more than those on the right; the growth is more rapid in children than in adults, and goes on faster in winter than in summer. It requires an average of 132 days for the renewal of the nails in winter and but 116 during the summer months.

The distance of the horizon to an eye five feet above the ground is 2.57 miles. The masts, however, of a vessel would be seen after the hull had disappeared below the horizon; and taking the average mast at 130 feet high, then an observer whose eye was five feet above the sea level could, with the aid of a glass, see its tip when it was nearly sixteen miles distant. From the summit of a lighthouse 200 feet high it would be visible when thirty-three miles away. These distances take the refraction of the atmosphere into account.

Strained Morality.

Upwards of fifty of the leading hotel-keepers of Maine recently got together in Waterville to protest against the severe prohibitory laws of that State, which utterly ignore equity and the consideration which is due to a respectable stranger in the State on the part of a respectable hotel landlord. For the past twenty years Maine has but barely held her own as compared with neighboring States. Her lumber trade is being subjected to harder and harder competition with Canada and other sections. The blight which has partially paralyzed farming all over New England has been severely felt by the State. Her short summers and severe winters place limitations upon agriculture and other industries not known in other sections. But her magnificent coast has of late years come to her rescue as a source of income, and scores of splendid hotels have gone up to satisfy the demand of a small army of invalids, and of debilitated and jaded people who go there in summer. Many of these people are ordered by their physicians to use alcoholic stimulants medicinally, and thousands bred in other sections have been accustomed all their lives to beer and light wines on the table. Through harsh and indiscriminate methods the new liquor law comes down upon these landlords and their guests as though they were the keepers and patrons of the vilest grog-shops. The result is that many of these guests, disgusted with such relentless fanaticism, are turning their backs upon Maine. Landlords, being unable to cater to their guests as custom has established everywhere else, see their property going to ruin while many thousands of dollars of needed income are being turned away from the State in a constant stream. Of course, unreasoning fanatics with strained notions of what constitutes temperance report that considerations of income and the growth of the State must not weigh against morals. But, as has been so often shown, unqualified prohibition inevitably infuses the poison of stealth into the public morals to an extent that far outweighs any incidental benefits that may attach to it. While a respectable man is debarred from a bottle of lager or light wine which the physician has recommended with meals, floating rum-shops will anchor off-shore, and evaders of the law will lurk in the woods with jugs and bottles. The moral expediency of indiscriminate prohibition has been the subject of review time and time again and is well understood by thoughtful people; but fanaticism manages to keep the upper hold in Maine, though it is notorious that Prohibition is and always has been a scandalous farce in that State. Neither upon financial nor moral grounds can the level-headed people of Maine afford to continue this absurd species of prohibitory intemperance.—Boston Globe.

The name of the author of the beautiful poem, "Oh, Why Should the Spirit of Mortal Be Proud?" is William Knox, born in 1789 and died in 1825. The poem was a great favorite of President Lincoln.

Grubler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

Felter, Son & Co.

OFFER TO THE TRADE, IN QUANTITIES TO suit, a full and complete line of choice

Wines, Liquors & Cigars,

Including the Celebrated

GOLD CROWN and DELMONICO

KENTUCKY WHISKIES.

At the Old Stand, 1006-1008 Second Street, SACRAMENTO.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second, SACRAMENTO, CAL.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. j27-91

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of George H. Appel, an insolvent debtor. George H. Appel, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said George H. Appel is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at one o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, June 30th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. jy4-51

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of N. IRWIN, an insolvent debtor.—N. Irwin having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said N. Irwin is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said N. Irwin debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated June 29th, 1891.

JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. jy4-51

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. SCHACHT,

DEALER IN

FAMILY GROCERIES

Provisions, Flour,

Wines, Liquors, Cigars, Tobacco

Southeast Corner Second and M Sts.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

C. T. MILLIKIN,

DENTIST,

1008 Eighth Street,

Between J and K,

Over Dr. W. A. Hughson's office.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON,

ALBERT M. JOHNSON,

HIRAM W. JOHNSON,

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 604 J Street,

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLOMON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS.

Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER.

Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,

920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,

630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW

Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

N.W. corner Sixth and K.

The Talking Woman.

"Beware of the woman who talks rapidly," said an old French writer, "for when she has spoken of everyone else she will talk of thee." Of course, that was very cynical, and, perhaps, not altogether true; but everyone must admit that there was a little spice of truth in it. Where there is talk, there must always be a subject of conversation; and when one has talked very rapidly, and for a long time, even with the best intentions in the world, the subjects have a tendency to become mere personal ones. And personal subjects are always so interesting! How far superior to glittering generalities, such as those afforded by books and politics and the weather. Let the talking woman be never so personal, she always has a delighted audience, and it is impossible to estimate the amount of family history and sins of omission and commission with which they become acquainted in the course of one sitting. Is she in society? Every smallest incident that she has seen or heard is detailed in that gay, well-meaning chatter, a perfect crazy patchwork of odds and ends of nothing; but odds and ends skillfully patched together sometimes make a first-rate scandal, and after a scandal is once started anybody can keep it going. That requires no talent at all.

Is the talking woman a trusted employee of some business firm? It shall go hard with her, but she will tell the exact condition of the books and all the plans and hopes and fears of the firm to all her intimate friends, and virtually lay bare every secret of the business every time she talks. Everybody knows all about the threatened failure long before it happens, and the fact that everybody knows it, precipitates the failure, and the firm goes to the wall merely because one of its employees was good at talking and must have something to talk about.

Is the talking woman one of your friends? Then sit and listen to her by all means. Absorb everything she says, and even take a delight in it, but lock your own family skeleton up in the closet and throw the key into the well when you see her coming, for otherwise she will hold it up and rattle its bones for the amusement of some other audience. It is not that she thinks of harming you in the least, but she must talk, and other subjects being exhausted, the inhabitant of your closet is always opportune and always interesting.

The Origin of "Grog."

Until the time of Admiral Vernon the British sailors had their allowance of brandy or rum served out to them unmixed with water. This plan was found to be attended with inconvenience on some occasions on account of a shortage in the brandy locker, and the admiral, therefore, ordered that in the fleet he commanded the spirits should be mixed with water before being passed around among the men. This innovation at first gave great offense to the hardy sailors, who had been used to taking their drinks "raw," the result being that Vernon became very unpopular with his men.

To add to his unpopularity, the admiral, who was conscious of the immense responsibility that rested upon him, became morose and gloomy, often walking the decks for hours without speaking or looking either to the right or the left. In these taciturn moods he always wore an immense grogram coat thrown loosely over his shoulders; this resulted in the sailors nicknaming him "Old Grog," and the term soon came to be applied to the weak mixture stintingly given out to the men, who had formerly looked for a regular allowance of "pure stuff." "Grog" became quite popular after a time, but not until the original mixture of the formula had "gone to his reward."—St. Louis Republic.

The Gulf Stream.

The gulf stream flows out of the Gulf of Mexico between the coast of Florida on the one side and Cuba and the Bahama islands and shoals on the other. With a breadth of about fifty miles in its narrowest portion, it has a velocity at times of five miles an hour, pouring along like an immense torrent. This great ocean river flows in a northeasterly direction along the American coast, gradually widening its current and diminishing in velocity until it reaches the island and banks of Newfoundland, when it sweeps across the Atlantic and divides into two portions, one of which turns eastward toward the Azores and coast of Morocco, while the other laves the shores of the British islands and Norway, and can be perceived on the southern borders of Iceland and Spitzbergen.

A precocious young member of the Loyal Temperance Legion of Kingfield had learned some profane words, and his mother, on his joining the society, strove to impress upon his mind the necessity of keeping his pledge, which included one against profanity. He was very desirous of changing his kilted skirts for waist and trousers, and she finally told him that when he had left off all swearing and slang words the trousers should be forthcoming. One day he was building a block house in her presence. He would get it nearly completed, when it would topple over. After several unsuccessful attempts he jumped up, clasped his hands together and excitedly exclaimed: "If it wasn't for pants, I'd swear."

W. D. Comstock, 501--507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

JUST RECEIVED.

A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES
AND CARD CASES, OF THE
LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

E. JAY SWANSON,

Southeast Corner Tenth and I Streets.

The most wonderful cures performed.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 400 J STREET.

SACRAMENTO.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

July 9, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6:30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11:15 A
3:00 P	Calistoga and Napa	8:10 P
12:50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4:20 A
4:30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7:00 P
7:00 P	Knight's Landing and Marysville	7:25 A
10:50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	7:35 A
12:05 P	Second Class, Ogden and East	2:25 A
11:00 P	Central Atlantic Express	8:15 A
	Ogden and East
3:00 P	Oroville	10:30 A
3:00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10:30 A
10:40 A	Redding via Willows	4:00 P
2:50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11:40 A
4:35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12:30 A
6:30 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11:15 A
8:40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10:40 P
3:05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8:10 P
*10:00 A	San Francisco via Steamers	8:00 A
10:50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2:50 P
10:50 A	San Jose	2:50 P
4:30 P	Santa Barbara	9:35 A
6:30 A	Santa Rosa	11:15 A
3:05 P	Santa Rosa	8:10 P
8:50 A	Stockton and Galt	7:00 P
4:30 P	Stockton and Galt	9:35 A
12:05 P	Truckee and Reno	2:25 A
11:00 P	Truckee and Reno	8:15 A
6:30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2:30 P
6:30 A	Vallejo	11:15 A
3:05 P	Vallejo	11:15 A
*8:20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2:40 P
*12:15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10:20 A
*4:45 P	Folsom	*8:00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted.
A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED K. COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

R. A. OLMSTED.

S. P. OLMSTED.

Fourth Street Cash Grocery.

R. A. OLMSTED & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

Fruits and Vegetables, Provisions, Flour, Hay, Grain,
and all kinds of Mill Stuffs,
Wines, Liquors, Cigars and Tobaccos.

400 L Street, S. E. cor. Fourth, Sacramento.

Fresh Butter and Eggs a Specialty. Goods delivered free of charge to any part of the City. R. R.
depot or Steamboat landing. Highest price paid for Country Produce.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND

JEWELRY.

UNCLE IKE'S, 302 K STREET, SACRAMENTO.

THE LEADER

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1891.

No. 23.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The great democratic dailies in the United States have been over busily engaged in disparaging comments on Secretary Blaine's health. The solicitude of these newspapers regarding the welfare of James G. Blaine is wonderful. Now, it transpires that all these rumors about the broken health of the great premier are without the slightest foundation. The reason which prompts his enemies to resort to this class of tactics seems to be in the fear that the American people may demand that he shall take the helm of State in 1892. While Blaine is the favorite of the masses, it is not at all likely he will be a candidate against Benjamin Harrison, particularly while occupying the relation of prime minister in his cabinet. There is no deceit or hypocrisy in the great Secretary's composition, and it is apparent that Blaine and Harrison have an understanding with regard to the presidential succession, which will prevent the Secretary from looking towards the presidency. It is certain that no matter what occurs Blaine is equal to the emergency. His direction of the affairs of State is the admiration of our people, and the world.

We call these times progressive—so they are with regard to invention, discovery and science. In social life, however, there has been a change not for a higher order. Immense wealth has, in the great majority of cases, sunk the nobler impulses of manhood and womanhood in the vortex of worldly position, where the finer instincts are lost amid the whirl of that travesty called fashion. The integrity and simple manners in vogue when the nation was younger, and great fortunes had not come upon the scene, have given place to vulgarity—hypocrisy takes the place of purity and honesty. All now in the wealthy circles, where the demon fashion rules and reigns, tends to vulgar display and a feverish life. These sudden and unearned fortunes, not being the fruits of the brain, will descend to others who knew not what it was to toil or exert the brain, and thus a danger is to be encountered in matters of social government and social reform. It would be wise to return, at least in a measure, to our Puritan integrity and simplicity. It is this vulgar display of wealth that causes envy in those less fortunate, and from which arises many of the revolts in the restricted labor circles. All we need to regulate this situation is the leaven of common sense and good judgment on the part of those fortune has favored.

Give the republic more carefully guarded immigration laws. This has been a necessity of the civilization called American for some time, and the attitude of a foreign nation and of citizens and residents of the United States claiming nativity in that nation simply accentuates this necessity. The most tolerant and broad-minded of all the nations of history respecting the right of immigration, this republic has now reached the utmost limit of safety in the pursuance of her policy. Henceforth it is the dictate of sound statesmanship to regulate the immigration in accordance with the interests of the existing population, the welfare of the land and the future of republican government on this continent. If this is to be the dumping ground for the refuse population of countries half-assimilated or not assimilated at all to liberty, good government, peace and security are just as impossible here as in the foreign slums which empty their contents upon us. It is very clear in the light of expressed opinion and the tendency of events that the laws now on the statute books will have to be repealed and others better suited to the changing state of things enacted in their stead; that strong and early modification of the immigration and naturalization laws is imperative. There is no need for anybody to be excited. The foreign element in this country is mostly good, and woven into the texture of our national life are some of the finest threads of some of the greatest of modern civilizations. It is not against foreigners, therefore, as such, that the danger signal points. It is time, however, to protect Uncle Sam against the compulsory cramming down his throat of tainted European and Asiatic meat, incapable of assimilation, and against the inevitably resulting indigestion and blood-poisoning.

The very general expression, "As sober as a judge," was originally intended to apply to the dignity and sedate appearance of the judiciary. No reference was evidently intended to sobriety of the judge, from a temperance point of view. Modern times have changed the intent and meaning of the famous expression, and "as sober as a judge" is associated with that other universal saying, "As drunk as a lord." As a general rule those chosen to administer justice from the bench are not addicted to the excessive use of intoxicants. Our judiciary, from a temperate point of view, are endowed with clear heads, unimpaired by the use of ardent spirits. Occasionally we find on the bench men whose mental vision is impaired from the use of intoxicating drinks. In such cases the communities thus inflicted are unfortunate indeed. San Francisco has experienced this misfortune on several occasions within the past few years. One or two of the northern counties were disgraced by having drunkards on the bench. Nothing could be more demoralizing than to have the rights and liberties of the citizen subject to the addled judgment of an inebriate. However, some of the brightest intellects on the bench are what might be termed moderate drinkers. With such men this stimulates the blood and brain to greater work and more brilliant results.

We have often heard the late James C. Goods, who was a companion of Hugh Murray, Supreme Judge, say of the latter, that his most learned and brilliant opinions were rendered after a liberal indulgence in stimulants. Old-timers will remember what a grand judicial mind Hugh Murray possessed, and at the same time what a boon companion he was. At no time did Hugh Murray go upon the bench with the slightest trace of a previous night's ramble with convivial spirits. We have heard that bright light of the California bar, the late John B. Felton, say that it was a necessity with active vigorous minds and men of genius to get "good and drunk" periodically. The effect was to give them a new lease of vigor and life. Not going so far as to advocate getting "good and drunk," there is a necessity for some men to revive their drooping energies by a moderate use of stimulants. There is a certain able member of this bar who is total abstinence in his habits, but who, if he could adapt himself to the moderate use of this stimulous, would be able to undergo greater exertions in his profession. A few drops of pure brandy would brace his energies when his vigor relaxes. In such cases the use of ardent spirits is beneficial. It is the abuse of stimulants that causes such wrecks of humanity.

The other expression, "as drunk as a lord," has the sanctity of age, and just what is the nature of its origin is a matter of obscurity. We are taught to think there is something extremely stupid about the traditional English lord from an American point of view. A near approach to the mental vacuity of this traditional lord is the reference to the last stage of inebriety, "as drunk as a boiled owl." This phrase might be interpreted as having a classic origin, because it refers to the bird sacred to Minerva. In another sense the owl, with his air of affected wisdom, and his utter stupidity, might be likened to the mental vacuity of the inebriate. But as drunk "as a boiled owl" is going beyond the extreme of metaphor. The little skit about the fellow who could not keep sober unless his wife was with him, going the rounds of the press, has furnished another phase indicating "vigorous" intoxication, wherein he telegraphs to his wife that he is "as full as an Irishman's goat." This is certainly a quaint definition of the last stage of inebriety.

Baron de Hirsch's project for alleviating the sufferings of the exiled Russian Jews has been watched in this country with profound interest by Jew and Gentile alike. The present despotic oppression of the chosen race in Russia is so diametrically opposed to Western ideas that its champions have been unusually numerous and outspoken; and in establishing a fund for aiding the distressed victims the baron has only acted in conformity with the desires of every humane and enlightened Christian. His methods of applying the fund have, however, called forth some criticism. The article in The North American Review for July, in which he succinctly sets forth his ideas, is therefore particularly timely, and forms a fitting corollary to the series on the "Obligations of Wealth," contributed by eminent philanthropists of the Western World. In this paper, characteristically short and pointed, M. de Hirsch displays a remarkable concurrence with such men as Mr. Carnegie, in his notion of the management of fortune. "There is, in my opinion," he says, "no possibility for doubt that the possession of great wealth lays a duty upon the possessor."

What an advance in moral enlightenment these words signify! They show not only that the thick crust of Old World conservatism which formerly seemed inseparable from property has been broken through, but that professing Hebrews are acting in praiseworthy obedience to what we consider the peculiarly characteristic tenets of Christianity. This, indeed, has previously received abundant exemplification in the case of Sir Moses Montefiore and other conspicuously benevolent Jews. Nevertheless, it has remained for M. de Hirsch to acknowledge a specific sense of obligation, and the confession reflects no less lustre on him personally than on the people he so worthily represents. For centuries the Jewish disposition to help Jews has been proverbial. Although the stress of the Russian exodus seems to have tested their capacity severely, yet it is known that this particular philanthropist never stops to ask whether a cry for aid emanates from a co-religionist or not. Like Diderot, he relieves "suffering humanity." The explanation of his scheme for transporting the Russian exiles to the Argentine Republic, to earn their own living as tillers of the soil, shows that a strong practicality guides his benevolence. The Jews are often unreasonably blamed for refusing to earn their living by the "sweat of their brow." In this country and in England, where prejudice against them is virtually extinct, they tend unmistakably to trades and professions in which commercial acuteness lessens the necessity of physical labor and increases the money reward.

Yet is this evidence of innate incapacity or indisposition for other work? In several countries of Europe to this day Hebrews are excluded by law from a large number of occupations in which they are naturally qualified to excel. Where a lawyer, a physician or a writer has gained repute, it has been in spite of oppressive restrictions and in the face of tremendous odds. As to farming, there is convincing proof on this continent alone of their skill and adaptability. M. de Hirsch, moreover, points out that the Israelites in the time of Christ were notably agricultural, while commerce then lay entirely in the hands of the Phoenicians, and that they continued to care for their fields so long as they were politically independent.

It has seemed to sympathetic observers that the sudden transplanting of a vast body of exiles of any faith, with the antecedents of the downtrodden Russian Jews, to a new and strange country across the equator must at best incur great risk. M. de Hirsch, however, seems to have looked the ground over carefully. Several hundred Jewish families exiled to Argentina some years ago from Russia he describes as prospering on farms, in spite of formidable discouragements that faced them at the outset. Their example he considers a strong incentive to his present effort. If it should succeed, none will rejoice more heartily than those not of his religious faith.

The Moujik and the Tiger.

Courage is of two kinds. A man may be brave through ignorance of his actual peril, or, although fully conscious that his life is endangered, the sense of duty, the principle of loyalty, or the power of love, may keep him steadfast.

This last kind of courage is well illustrated by a familiar story of the civil war. During one of the fiercest and bloodiest battles of that sorrowful struggle a regiment was awaiting orders to advance, and meantime the men sought such protection as was possible from a deadly cannonade by lying flat upon the ground. While in this position a large rabbit, frightened out of its burrow by an intrusive cannon-ball, went leaping along the front of the line of outstretched soldiers, to any one of whom the next iron missile might mean death. "Go it," cotton-tail!" cried a lieutenant, with ready wit. "If we had no more character to lose than you have, we'd run too."

A remarkable illustration of the other kind of courage occurred not long ago in Russia. Pezon, the famous lion-tamer, was at Moscow with his menagerie, and had taken into his employ a moujik, a fine specimen of a Cossack, to clean out the cages of the wild beasts. The Cossack did not understand a word of French, and the terms of the hireling were settled in dumb-show. By way of instructing him in his duties, Pezon went through a sort of pantomime with broom, sponge and water-bucket. The moujik watched him closely and appeared fully to understand the details of the lesson given.

Next morning, armed with a broom, a sponge and a water-bucket, the Cossack opened the first cage he came to and quietly stepped in, as he had seen his master on the previous day step into two cages of harmless brutes. But this cage happened to be tenanted by a splendid untamed tiger that lay stretched on the floor fast asleep. At the noise made by the opening and closing of the door, the great creature raised its head and turned its terrible green eyes, with a look of haughty inquiry, on the man, who, all unconscious of his peril, stood in the corner dipping his sponge into the bucket.

Just at that moment the lion-tamer came out of his caravan and was struck dumb by the sight that met his gaze. What could he do to warn the man of his danger? A cry, a movement from him might enrage the striped monster, and hasten its attack on the defenseless Cossack. So Pezon thought it best to stand still and await the issue, in readiness to rush forward when the crisis came.

The moujik, dripping sponge in hand, coolly approached the tiger and made ready to rub his majesty down with the stolidity of a military servant polishing his captain's boots. The sudden application of cold water to its velvety hide evidently produced a very pleasant effect upon the tiger, for at once it began to purr, stretched out its paws, rolled over on its back and complacently offered every part of its body to the vigorous treatment of the moujik, who went on scrubbing away with might and main.

While this was going on the lion-tamer stood rooted to the spot and holding his breath in bewildered apprehension. He was the sole spectator of the extraordinary scene, but neither of the actors in it took the slightest notice of him. The Cossack was too much engrossed in his work, and the tiger evidently appreciated the refreshing douche of cold water too highly to have eyes for anything else.

At last the task seemed to be completed, and with a grunt of satisfaction the moujik deliberately gathered up his broom, bucket and sponge and let himself out of the cage, the tiger meanwhile watching him with a lazy look of good humor. The moment the cage was safely barred, Pezon, at last released from his statue-like position, sprang forward and proceeded to rate the Cossack for his unprecedented temerity. But the poor fellow, understanding not a word that was being said to him, and gathering from his employer's manner and gestures that he had been at fault somehow, naturally enough assumed that he had not done his work with sufficient thoroughness, and it required a great deal of vigorous pantomime on the part of Pezon to convince him of his error, and to prevent him making another attempt. A man of such iron nerve was just the sort of servant to suit the lion-tamer, after he had received a little instruction, and Pezon was very glad to make him a permanent addition to his staff.

And yet how surprised he would have been to receive praise for his courage. Such an idea probably never stirred his dull brain. He had simply obeyed orders, as he imagined, with no more thought of showing courage than of eating the tiger which his master so greatly feared would eat him.

The Chinese New Year.

The Chinese date their year from the first new moon after the sun enters Aquarius, consequently it is a movable feast, varying between January 21 and February 19. Their months are lunar months, some called "great," containing thirty days, the others "small," having only twenty-nine days. In some years, therefore, there are thirteen months, one of them being an intercalary. The 1st and 15th of every month, or "moon," coincides with the new and full of every moon, and these are always celebrated as feast days. But of all Chinese feasts the New Year is a regular bacchanalia, in which days before and weeks after are given to feasting and rejoicing. During the last days of the old year the scene in a large city like Canton is one of intense interest to a foreigner. The merchants hurry hither and thither, collecting and paying debts—for all accounts must be satisfactorily adjusted or else the business cannot be carried into the next year. Not only are the business parts of the town alive with thronging multitudes during the day, but at night instead of everything being promptly closed at 9 o'clock, as is usual, the midnight pedestrian will find a perfect chaos of movables and a bedlam of voices. Stores are being deluged with water and the walls are being scrubbed; ornamental scroll paper and charms of good luck are torn down; the tiled floor is getting its annual but probably only cleaning it has had during the year. After this is done the walls are redecorated and new charms and gods are pasted up or set in the windows and show-cases. In private houses the same cleaning process is going on; all the dirt of the year is being removed. When this is done the finest ornaments that are possessed are brought out and displayed on the tables; embroidered covers are placed on the chairs and stands, and the whole house is put in holiday attire. One of the great features of the decorations is the display of "sacred lilies." It is desirable that they should bloom on New Year's day, and the more flowers on the plant the better will be the fortune of the family owning it during the year to come. Up to midnight on New Year's eve this excitement continues; then, as if by magic, the noise and turmoil ceases, only to be renewed in the morning with redoubled energy. This, in short, is the Chinese New Year.

The Controversy Settled.

A female spiritualist, Miss Abbie Judson, has furnished a novel idea of Shakespeare's inspiration. She holds that Shakespeare was not what you might call a thoroughbred medium, but rather a "negative," or "sensitive," through which the spiritual forces might work. From the number of plays which "negative" Shakespeare was made to throw off, it would appear that the spirits worked him for all he was worth. In his youth the fanciful and cupid-like spirits evidently got hold of him and worked off "Venus and Adonis" and "Midsummer Night's Dream" through his negativity. Then the historical spirits took a hand and ground out "Richard III," "Henry VIII" and "Julius Cæsar." Then came the star dramatic spirits and flashed upon the negative such plays as "Hamlet," "King Lear" and "Macbeth." Finally, the philosophic spirits had an inning and forthwith negated "Cymbeline," "Winter's Tale" and "The Tempest." What spirits inspired the "Comedy of Errors" and "Much Ado About Nothing," or such characters as the old and young Gobo, Falstaff and his ragamuffins, Miss Judson does not explain; perhaps the alcoholic spirits got in a little work there. As evidence of Shakespeare's belief in spiritualism, Miss Judson refers to the witches and Banquo's ghost, in "Macbeth," the ghost in "Hamlet," the sprite Ariel, in "The Tempest," and the numerous cupids and fairies in "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Genius and Insanity.

Writing from Berlin, a well-known critic gossips interestingly concerning the relation between genius and insanity. It is like the irony of history, he thinks, that the efforts to promote the cultus of genius should be followed by attempts to prove genius allied to insanity. After much was written on the subject in different languages, Lambroso has published a volume on it in Italian. He aims to prove that genius and extraordinary intellectual power are evidences of insanity, or at best, of an abnormal mental condition. The vast amount of material produced by him gives interesting views of the eccentricities of scholars, and he has established the fact that in many cases genius and insanity are near akin. Critics, however, argue that he has attributed to genius at large what is true of a limited number. And it is claimed that unusual mental power is rather evidence of health, of uncommon energy, or of an unusual exercise of existing energy; it may be a one-sided concentration of energy, but not necessarily a diseased state. The study of the subject is certainly calculated to check the tendency to deify superior intellectual power for its own sake. It is shown that often it is coupled with great folly, lacks the moral and spiritual elements, and at times seems to be a demoniac power. Some hold that great men are mean, despotic, bitter and suspicious. George Sand said of them: "They are worse towards their friends than towards their enemies. May God deliver us from them." Dumas relates that Victor Hugo had a fixed idea that he was the greatest poet and the greatest man of all lands and ages, and that he thought a man so extraordinary as himself ought not to be subject to the rules of government or of culture, but should be free to speak and act as he pleased. Hegel is said to have begun one of his lectures thus: "I can say with Christ that I do not merely teach the truth, but I myself am the truth." What wonder that such utterances are looked upon as evidence of mental or moral perversity!

The Wizzard's Best Trick.

People have repeatedly asked me which of my tricks have pleased me the most, and which I take the most delight in performing. Naturally the effort that brings the greatest success is regarded by a man his best. I consider the trick of restoring the shattered mirror as my most famous one. This I had the honor of performing before the Czar of Russia upon an invitation to give an exhibition at his court. It was done unexpectedly to the spectators, and was not down on the regular bill. While playing billiards with the attaches of the court, after the performance, the Czar being present in the saloon, I shot a ball with all my strength against a plate-glass mirror extending from the floor to the ceiling. It was shattered into fifty pieces. Consternation was depicted on every countenance; on none more than my own. While the Czar courteously waived my apology, considering the destruction of the mirror as trifling, and ordered the game to proceed, I could easily see that my supposed awkwardness made a disagreeable impression. With the Czar's permission I examined the mirror to estimate the damage done and the possibility of repairing it. While so engaged one of the suite playfully challenged me to exercise my art and make the mirror whole again, never dreaming that his challenge was the very cue I wanted, and not considering the acceptance of it as possible. I hesitated an instant and then ordered the mirror to be covered with a cloth, entirely concealing it from view. On the removal of the cloth after ten minutes, the mirror was found without a flaw, and as perfect as before the damage. I will leave it to my readers' imagination to decide how this trick was done.—Chevalier Herman, in North American Review for July.

Unquestionably we have a national literature—poetry and prose distinctively our own, reflecting the divers yet harmonious elements of our polyglot civilization. New England cannot say, "It is mine," nor the South nor the West, "It is ours." But it is American. It is the flower of a steady growth of nearly three centuries—a rare and new blossom, despite the "deteriorating climatic influences" alleged to be the bane of its development. Nature is producing in America her finest types of men and women, and all conditions here justify faith in a brilliant literary future.

Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, editor of Harper's Bazar, in speaking of herself recently, said: "I am surprised that so many of my biographers speak of me as a poetess rather than as a writer of prose. Poetry has been merely my recreation, while prose-writing is my occupation. To every line of poetry that I have ever composed I have written a thousand lines of prose; and so it surprises me to find that it is by my poems that I am generally known."

A French priest, who had usually a small congregation, was one day preaching at a church in his village, when, the door being open, a gander and several geese came stalking up the middle aisle. The preacher, availing himself of the circumstance, observed that he could no longer find fault with the people of his district for non-attendance, because, though they did not come themselves, they sent their representatives.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

W. A. Brady will start Bobby Gaylor out early next month with Sport McAllister.

A discharged chorister in an Ohio town took revenge on the congregation by sitting in a pew and purposely singing out of tune.

For the want of saying something else the London gossipers have it that Mary Anderson is writing a book. There is no truth in it.

Annie Pixley has not found the play she wants, and therefore will rest this winter. She is one of the very few actresses who can afford to do such a thing. But Annie's husband is a printer; that accounts for it.

"Sara" Bernhardt was named Rosine by her parents, who were French and Dutch respectively. Her first appearance on the stage was at the Theater Francaise in Iphigene. She is 47 in years, but dates back, spiritually at least, as far as Cleopatra.

Abraham Lincoln, on which McKee Rankin stakes his reputation and Archie Gordon his skill, will be produced in September in Indianapolis. The play deals on the life of Lincoln, and has the Booth shooting episode, which will probably not please Edwin Booth over much.

Bishop Westcott, who, according to the London Telegraph, is "generally regarded as the greatest living theologian in the church of England," recently gave his opinion to a private correspondent about theater-going. "The universal instinct toward dramatic representations," he says, "appears to me to show that, like music and art, they answer to a natural and a right desire."

Ellen Terry thus describes the symptoms of stage fright: "You suddenly feel as if your tongue had become dislocated and was lying powerless in your mouth. Cold shivers begin to creep downward from the nape of your neck and all up you at the same time, until they seem to meet in the small of your back. About this time you feel as if a centipede, all of whose feet had been carefully iced, had begun to run about the roots of your hair. Your next agreeable sensation is the breaking out of a cold perspiration all over you. Then you feel as though somebody had cut the muscles at the back of your knees; your mouth begins slowly to open without giving utterance to a single sound, and your eyes seem inclined to jump out of your head over the footlights. At this period it as well to get off the stage as quickly as possible; you are far beyond the hope of any human help."

That Jenny Lind was always in earnest, even on the stage, is shown by a story told in a recently published biography. In the last act of Sonambula Amina, walking in her sleep, crosses a crazy wooden bridge spanning a mill stream, and hanging in the air directly over a revolving water wheel. As she reaches the middle of this frail structure the worm-eaten planks give way—or rather, by an ingenious stage device, appear to give way—beneath her feet. She starts—lets the lamp she holds in her hand fall into the stream—and then without awaking calmly proceeds on her way down a rude flight of steps to the front of the stage, where, taking from her bosom the faded flowers that Elvino has given to her, she sings the beautiful air, "Ah! Non Credea Mirarti." It is a dangerous walk for a nervous prima donna, and very few of our greatest singers have ever attempted it. The usual plan is to dress up a poor little "supernumerary" in clothes exactly like those of the real representative of "Amina," to let her perform the perilous feat of crossing the bridge; and, after she has dropped her lamp and displaced some of the loose stones lying at the edge of her path, to let her pass behind a projecting piece of rock arranged for the purpose, and there change places with the real prima donna, who emerges on the opposite side of the cunningly constructed screen, and is supposed by the audience to have performed the entire journey in her own proper person. But Mdlle. Lind would never consent to cheat her audience thus. She once said, when conversing on the events of that memorable time, that she had never in her life let any one cross the bridge for her—not because she was more courageous than other representatives of the village somnambulist; for she confessed to having been horribly frightened every time that she had to undergo the trying ordeal, but because, she said, "I should have been ashamed to stand before the audience, pretending that I had crossed the bridge, if I had not really done it." So the boards were marked with calk, to show the exact lines between which Amina was to walk; and a circle was drawn at the spot at which the bridge was to give way beneath her, so that she might not be taken unprepared. But these precautions formed a less efficient safeguard than might have been imagined; for she had heard that somnambulists always walked straight forward, without looking at their feet, and she risked a fall night after night in order that she might act her part with perfect truth to nature.

Book Chat.

Holman Hunt's "Light of the World," bought for $50,000, has been presented by the purchaser to Keble College.

Austin Dobson has just finished his elaborate "Life of Hogarth," a development of his little monograph published several years ago. Mr. Dobson has apparently ceased to write poetry.

It is difficult to say whether Shakespeare or Goethe is the more popular poet in Germany. The German Shakespeare society has just performed a valuable service to lovers of the great Englishman. They have issued a popular edition of the famous translation of Schlegel and Tieck, with an introduction by Wilhelm Oechelhaeuser. The edition is printed on excellent paper, in one volume. The price has been made as low as possible, in the hope that the working people will purchase the book.

Richard Henry Stoddard speaks as follows in criticism of certain of the famous literary men: "We occasionally find things in English journals which ought to have a wider circulation than they are likely to attain in 'our old home,' and which it becomes us as Americans to consider seriously. They are not apt to be upon matters political, upon which we are quite as well instructed as the English, but upon art and literature, concerning which they sometimes express themselves with refreshing sincerity and independence. The text for this little lay sermon is a recent paragraph in a new English journal—The Speaker—a contributor to which does not share the prevailing worship of Browning and George Meredith, against which he protests. 'My charge against them,' he says, 'is this: 1. They have hurt the English language, by undoing (for awhile, at least) all the purity and precision that the eighteenth century won for it, at great cost and pain; 2. They have done this out of mere egotism—Browning maiming and torturing the delicate instrument to make it reproduce the processes of his thought, and Meredith distorting it for his adornment, as a fop before a looking glass might pull a good tie this way and that until he crumples and spoils it in the attempt to look smarter than his fellows. And I urge, in the first place, that, though language may (and indeed must) help thought in the making, literature has not to express the process, but the product. Take this, for instance:

My curls were crowned
In youth with knowledge; off, alas! the crown slipped Next moment, pushed by better knowledge still,
Which no wise proved more constant. Gain to-day
Was toppling loss to-morrow—lay at last
Knowledge the golden?—lacquered ignorance!
As gain, mistrust it! not as means to gain;
Lacquer we learn by.

A man in this year of grace 1891 will of course be laughed at if he declares the above to be neither poetry nor English; and yet, with a weak voice in the wilderness, I assert the extract—a very fair one—to be no more nor less than a piece of scamped work. A conscientious artist would have worked out the thought and compressed it into a single line. Worshipers of Browning speak of his condensation; and it is true that he gives color to that delusion by omitting to articulate his sentences; but I ask how the thought in the above passage could be more diffusely expressed. An amiable versifier once wrote:

As I walked by myself I talked to myself, and thus to myself said I: * * *

And this pleasant line sums up the method. Further, I urge that the first duty of every author is to his reader. I lay no stress on the fact that Dr. Furnivall belongs to the Browning Society, but merely argue that the very existence of societies, handbooks, etc., professing to explain any man's writings, is a serious accusation against him. Further, I urge that this accusation is more serious in Meredith's case than in Browning's, because the obligation to be lucid is stronger in prose than in verse. Nor is it any answer to say, "Meredith is lucid enough, if only you had the wit to see;" for the most exalted poets and philosophers have owned, in practice, that the obligation to be understood lay on their side, and have demanded the least of their readers; they have, in other words, admitted that before they can justly claim a hearing they must translate their thoughts into the speech of common men. After all—to put it on the lowest grounds—the reader buys the book. It is not, on the face of it, likely, that a writer whose "message" (as the word goes) is barely intelligible to his own age will be treated with much consideration by another; nor will the affectations of to-day appeal to our grandchildren. Lyly's "Euphues" goes unread, while everybody knows by heart his "Cupid and My Campaspe," because it happens to be one of the most carefully simple things in the language. On the other hand, it is almost impossible to suppose that the men and women that Browning and Meredith have imagined can be forgotten. They are the most splendid and glittering inventions since Shakespeare died; and it is possible that, rather than lose them, posterity will take over the language in which their creators have clothed them."

Professional Chat.

One of the first congratulatory messages received by Cardinal Manning on his 83d birthday was from Gladstone, who is in his 82d year, and one from Queen Victoria, whom the word venerable fits gracefully.

"Papa, what are you going to preach about next Sunday?" inquired the youngest son of a prominent minister the other day. "Next Sunday, my son," replied the father of the youngster, "I expect to preach another sermon on the subject, 'What is Truth?'" "I can't understand that sort o' sermon," rejoined the boy, digging the toe of his shoe in the carpet. "Why don't you preach about 'What is Goodness?' or something like that?" The preacher looked fixedly at the boy over his spectacles, pigeonholed the sermon he was writing and went to work at once on another.

Some one has reminded Bishop Coxe, of Buffalo, that the bible does not anywhere condemn bicycling by women, and the prelate has been obliged to admit that, so far as bicycles are concerned, the bible is behind the age—which reminds us of an occasion when ex-Chief Justice Drake of the Court of Claims, addressing a meeting of the Washington City Presbytery against theater-going, and, being asked where the bible condemned it, answered that, of course, theaters were not mentioned in the bible—a remark which brought up Rev. Dr. Sunderland, of the First church, like a shot, but in his suavest manner, with: "I beg the Judge's pardon, but we read in the book of the Acts of the Apostles that St. Paul went to the theater at Ephesus." The Judge was floored.

"Talking about preachers pleasing their congregations reminds me of a young preacher who had just graduated from the college," said Rev. B. F. Thomas, of Carondelet. "How is that?" "Why, when he graduated, his father secured him a place to preach. 'Now,' said his father, 'there are three points you want to remember. They are: First, you must soothe; second, you must arouse, and third, you must satisfy.' Well, the young man went to the church feeling confident he could carry the points. When he returned home his father asked him how he got along. 'First-rate, father; I carried the points, I know. I soothed them, for I hadn't preached very long before some of them went to sleep; I aroused them, for I didn't get very much further before about one-third got up and left the church; and I am confident I satisfied them, for they told me I need not come back any more.'"

Some of the most successful contributors to American literature have been successful lawyers. Judge McMaster, of New York, was the author of the poem "Carmen Bellicosum," which was found in every school boy's reader. Judge Finch, of New York, is the author of the popular poem, "The Blue and the Gray." He was over 40 when he wrote it. William Allen Butler, president of the New York bar association, is the author of "Nothing to Wear." Judge Francis Hopkinson, of Philadelphia, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, is also entitled to the honor of being the first American poet. Homer Greene, of Pennsylvania, is a successful lawyer and the author of several spirited ballads. Judge Robert T. Conrad, of Philadelphia, was the author of several successful tragedies, one of which kept the stage until Forrest died. Griswold said of his "Aylmere," that it was the most successful American drama yet written. Judge Conrad was also Mayor of Philadelphia, and the fact that everybody knew him to be the author of plays and poems did not prevent either his political or professional advancement. Bryant practiced law for several years after he had published "Thanatopsis," and there was nothing in its popular favor to have prevented the author from becoming a successful lawyer. Longfellow was also intended for a lawyer, and Lowell was admitted to the bar. Either of them would, without doubt, have won success as jury lawyers since both developed into most attractive lawyers. Henry B. Hirst, the associate of Poe, was admitted to the bar, Joseph Hopkinson, of Philadelphia, the author of "Hail Columbia," was a distinguished lawyer and judge. It was Boker's fortune and not his poems or plays which stood in the way of his practicing law. Chas. Fenno Hoffman was both a lawyer and a poet. The list of men who have combined success as lawyers with success in the writing of poetry might be greatly extended without crossing the Atlantic. The Pacific coast has been noted for eminent literary lawyers. Jos. W. Winans was an elegant writer in both poetry and prose. W. H. Rhodes ("Caxton") had few equals in choice romance and poetry. Gen. W. H. L. Barnes is noted as a fine dramatic writer. Geo. Cadwalader was the author of several elegant poems. Frank Pixley gave up the bar for literature. Judge T. B. McFarland is the author of valuable literary productions. The late John F. Swift was a finished literary scholar and author. The list could be extended. Hon. A. P. Catlin is also an instance of the unity of literature with the legal profession. Judge Catlin is a student of literature, a classical scholar, and was for several years editor of the old Sacramento Union in its halcyon days.

NOTES.

"The last man killed in the war" is said to have been Lieutenant Hiram Clark, of the 185th New York.

Having just wedded the girl who had the smallest foot in Pekin, the Chinese emperor needn't fear the conjugal "kick" when he comes home late from the club.

This is the season when newspapers are full of sage midsummer "don'ts." The man who attempts to observe all the rules laid down will land in the lunatic asylum or the morgue.

A person can keep cool in this weather by using a little common sense. Don't imbibe too freely of iced water; partake sparingly of heavy food in the middle of the day; don't watch the thermometer, and you will find yourself about as comfortable as it is possible to be with the mercury in the nineties.

"Who was Peter?" asked a Sunday school teacher. "Peter was a brick." "Why, Johnny, I'm surprised at you!" "It says so in the bible, anyhow. I read it the other day. It says: 'Thou art Peter, and upon this brick I'll build my church.'" "Rock, Johnny, rock; not brick." "Well, I knew it was some kind of building material."

Concerning the popular query, "Are the French less polite than their forefathers?" M. Girardeau thinks that they have progressed, not only in personal cleanliness, but in manners. The lords and ladies of the court previous to the revolution were extremely slipshod and slovenly when not strutting about in Versailles.

An American woman in Japan finds herself confronted and hampered and embarrassed by the ceremony and pomp which she must render to royalty. At the Yokohama races an American woman was threatened with arrest because she did not close her eyes and bow to the earth when the emperor drove past in his carriage.

Constant devotees of beauty often have forsaken and forgotten love for poor humanity. But true love of beauty is, after all, only a part of real philanthropy. Philanthropy is not a theoretic charity for paupers. Within its scope are all the forms of self-devotion for the good of others, including the highest statesmanship, and even Christianity itself.

Among all classes of people in Great Britain there is a widespread belief that the common white pigeon is the herald of death. Thus, a white pigeon alighting on a chimney or flying against a window betokens the death of some occupant of that house. On account of this curious belief English housewives cannot be persuaded to use pigeon feathers about their beds.

The crop of editorial predictions as to the nominations for 1892 is surprising. There are all sorts of these predictions, and if a half of them were to come true the conventions of that year would be Donnybrook fairs in harmony and unanimity of opinion. As yet but one reliable forecast has been made—viz., that somebody will probably be nominated, and that somebody who has been nominated will be elected.

The very latest from that precarious midst called "society," as enacted in this case at that rendezvous of adde-pated, green-gozlings of the gilt-edged youth of the land, Del Monte, is the startling announcement that one Miss Beth (doubtless the lisping pronunciation of Bess) Spray, to inaugurate her entré into the vortex, gave a lot of her friends a dinner. To while away the hours after the feed the young lady instituted an entertainment which, for intellectual, mind-developing employment, overtops anything heretofore invented by those original geniuses who set the California Four Hundred wild with the archetype of their inventions by which to attract attention to their puny creation. The promising young leader of the ton haut ton, evidently knowing full well the capacity of her friends for the enjoyment of profound pleasure, inaugurated a bubble-blowing contest in the parlor, where each guest was supplied with a clay pipe and a bowl of soapsuds, whoever blew the largest bubble to be declared the winner! Was ever the human intellect put to greater strain? Was ever man's genius so drafted upon, as that gathering grunted and strained and perspired? And think of what possibilities there might result from such strained efforts as each strove to excel the other and produce the biggest bubble! Ah! the heart palls at the thought of what might have been. And the hero of that blow was one Joseph Tobin, who was decorated doubtless with a pint of soft soap, for he also carries the badge of superiority when in the water down there. What honors are heaped on this rising young American whose fame must soon fill the world as the champion soap-and-water divinity of Del Monte society. May he always keep clean.

NEW YORK LETTER.

THINGS WHICH CAN MAKE YOU AND OTHERS HAPPY.

For a Young Author of a Play—The Baby with the Bottle—A Southern Mamma's Views—What Women Were Made to Love.

NEW YORK, July 15, 1891.

It is the time of year when romance is in one's bones; when one wants to read a romantic novel, swing in a hammock under a shady tree, think that one is just commencing life again; that one is sixteen, and that the gallant, gay cavalier will soon ride up to claim his own true love. These days of romance, when the sunshine is bright and the flowers are blooming; when every daisy is nodding its "how do you do;" when every black-eyed Susan is tossing its head in a coquettish sort of fashion, as much as to say all mankind loves dark eyes; when the sweet Williams are at their best and tallest and most perfumy, and look at you straight in the face as if they were saying, "I am the typical lover; I am the Romeo come to look for his Juliet"—why, a woman would have ink, ice water or shoe polish in her veins instead of blood if she didn't fall in love with something. She may be sixty and she may be sixteen; she may fall in love with a book, a play, a baby, a boy or a man; but she certainly falls in love with something. For my part, I am thankful that there are the books and the plays, not to mention the babies. They are safe. You can have a beautiful time crying your eyes out over a love story, or you can dream away an hour or two over a delightful play, filling it in with your own pictures of the men and women, as well as the world in which they live. That is one reason why I like plays—to read, I mean. When the heroine says, "All Paris will mourn for me because no other woman is so beautiful," I see a direct descendant of Venus, dressed by Felix and Worth, coming forward to announce the fate of Paris; and I am not obliged, as I am sometimes at the theater, to look at an awkward, ungainly woman, in a dowdy gown, proclaiming to the audience her great beauty and chic. I can make all the people in the play as delightful as I want them, and I can have the villain such a cold-hearted, blood-curdling creature that the chills creep up and down my back, and I abhor his wickedness with great intensity. There is a great, and I was going to say unknown, pleasure in reading plays—good plays, I mean. You make your own world and put the people in it, after you have gained a few ideas from the author, and from that time on they do their own talking.

Probably no plays were ever as agreeable to read as those written by the younger Dumas; but of Dumas it always has to be remembered that each play has a motive—a kernel in the gilded nut, that must be found and carefully digested. As a people, we don't care much for plays with motives in them. We are getting excessively tired of Howells and James-like plays, and we want a pretty story, a story bound together with the blue ribbon of love; in which human passions are found; in which they are truly depicted; and somebody, reading or seeing this play, suddenly thinks, "If I'd been in his place I'd done just the same." We laugh at romance; we think we are very cynical and very clever, and yet a woman's brown eyes and a woman's selfish, arrogant, absorbing love will twist us all around until we don't know whether we're human beings at all, or whether we are not just something put on earth to adore these descendants of Eve; that is, when we are men. You and I, my friend, probably love a romantic play—I always feel better after seeing one—a proper one, I mean, where the villain is disposed of, the true lovers united and live happy ever after.

A sunshiny day not long ago I read a play written by a man who is himself, in appearance, as picturesque as the little one-act drama that had its birth for one of his friends. He has youth, good looks and ambition, and I believe, after reading that play, he is going to succeed. What is it? And who is he? Well, the play is a story, in one act, of love, unhappiness, revenge and repentance, with the scene laid in Italy, and with all the people thinking and speaking as people would who lived, loved and died. We talk about plays that are etchings, plays that are cameos, but this little play, called Fra Diano, seems to me like a great red rose giving out the sweet perfume of an innocent love, and having, deep down in its heart, a suffering that came when the days were cold, and the glory of love and joy had departed. Enthusiastic! Perhaps so. Would you give a straw for the woman who wasn't? The author is named Robert Dronet, and comes, I believe, from Chicago. I have seen a picture of him, and my woman's eye told me several things. First, that he was marvelously handsome; as a man who looked at the picture said: "It is the head that sculptors put on their Greek gods." Then, secondly, my womanly instinct told me that he was a sensitive man, an ambitious man, and a man who could get success, unless he permitted himself to lose hope. I am not a mind reader; I don't know how to tell fortunes, but I've truly read all this in a picture, and somebody who knew the man said I had read aright. And now I'll tell you who is to play the leading part in this story, and for whom it was written—Joseph Haworth. And when it comes near you, if it should be six months or a year from now, just think to yourself, "A friend of mine, told me to go and see how one of the best emotional actors told the story of the life of a man who yearned for the love of his wife and child, who spent his days in prayer and good deeds, and yet, when he met the one who had wronged him, felt the man rise superior to the monk, and killed his enemy, and died himself afterwards while the chimps were ringing in a glorious morning, and the gentle pupil, who had really been his daughter, was going out into a new world where love reigned and where Cupid was king." Now, just remember what I have said.

Everybody is going on a mission. It's either to supply the people in the jail with books or newspapers, flowers or fruit, or else to make homes in the country for people to go to and have a good time. These are all very good missions, and sometimes I wish I were in jail and could get some of the books and papers, or else that I would be trotted off some place and be made to have a good time. But the mission I'd like to have in hand, and in which I should like to occupy all the positions from president to administrator of justice, is one in the interest of babies. What's become of mothers nowadays? And will you please tell me why a woman will permit a little bit of a helpless thing to be taken out in a perambulator covered with a rug that is entirely too heavy, and get the fresh air by having an impudent nurse race that perambulator around as if she were training for next year's Suburban? Just suppose you were put in one? Wouldn't you kick and rage and do everything that would be calculated in any way to make his satanic majesty arise? When you nearly cry your lungs out, just because you are thirsty, you are not given a nice cool drink of water, but you are expected to take sour milk through a long, black tube that looks like a gaspipe. I may be very old-fashioned in my ideas, but I don't believe the Lord intended babies to absorb their nourishment through a bottle, or else he would have made some special sort of bottle for them, and not left the designing of one to the ingenuity of man. Down South it's funny to hear the excuses that an old mammy will give about the baby that is raised on the bottle. All weaknesses of the brain or heart are forgiven for that reason, and whoever the man or woman may be, he is regarded as the victim of a sort of original sin or misfortune, and one that was not his fault. I remember once hearing a very knowing old mammy say this, when she was talking to a lot of her intimate friends about a young man who had forgot his father's name, married a variety actress, spent most of his time in a bar-room, and was about as disreputable a person as can be imagined: "You see, honey, yer musn't judge too harshly ob de unfortunate soul; he neber had de advantage ob de rest ob de family, and lackin' de mainstay, what can be respected from him. He were marked from de day ob his birth as a creature liable to sin and uncertainty. He were refrained from de natural fountain ob yout, and were given over to dat breastliest ob drinkables, de bottle." And all the colored ladies shook their heads knowingly, and agreed with Mammy May that a "chile which were raised on de bottle could not be held accountable."

I don't suppose all the talking or all the missions in the wide world would ever make mothers of women who are beasts, but they might at least urge them to get somebody to take care of the babies, who would look after the poor little souls properly, and would be polite enough to eater to such ordinary weaknesses as hunger, thirst and comfort. I saw a woman carrying a baby the other day—one of those miserable, limp-looking babies—and she had it hanging over her arm as if it were some sort of a fancy scarf. The poor little head was wobbling, and all the blood in its body looked as if it were trying to reach its brain; but that woman coolly stared at some religious books in a shop-window and let the baby get along as best it could. Usually I am a polite woman, but it was only the persuasion of my own parent that kept me from expostulating with that woman by means of the end of a parasol. As my parent remarked: "It wouldn't help the baby any, and it might annoy the woman." When I see a child like that I always hope it is going to die, for I can't but wonder what life with an indifferent mother must be. There are babies and babies, but I am going to tell you a great secret: The very rosebud among all the babies in the world is a little girl who came to this world three months ago, and who is going to be raised on proper principles, getting good food, having simple clothes, plenty of mother's love, and, what ought to belong especially to every girl baby, a father's adoration. Of course, this is just between you and me, and if some mean editor blue-pencils it out it is because he wants that baby himself, or else it's because he thinks woman's love for babies is nonsense, indeed! The woman who doesn't like a baby in the right way will never love a man; and there is not a man in this wide world who doesn't like to think that somewhere some woman's heart gives a throb when his name is mentioned, and that some woman thinks of him when he is all alone, and thinks of him lovingly and kindly, excusing his faults and exaggerating his virtues.

Did you ever happen to think that women were made to love men and babies and to make life comfortable for them? The superior woman looks down upon me when I say this, but I believe it. There wouldn't be quite so many divorces and there wouldn't be quite so many matrimonial squabbles, nor quite so many children, who, after seeing what was going on at home, concluded that they didn't want to marry, if my doctrine were lived up to. The superior woman asks, "What will a woman get in return for this?" And that is where the superior woman shows how inferior she is. Do you give for what you get in return? But to be logical (a woman always enjoys thinking she is logical), you do get something. If it's a hot night, and you get the dearest fellow in the world a nice, cool drink—I don't care whether it's milk or mint julep, shandy-gaff or champagne—and give it to him pleasantly, you ought to get a kiss of appreciation, a pleasant "thank you," and the knowledge, if you look in his eyes, that he's thinking you're the dearest little soul in the world. And if you don't get any of these, you can think, "Poor fellow, he's too tired to talk, and after all, I've done what is right." If you give him a pleasant and loving "good-by" in the morning, and a happy and joyful greeting in the evening; if you do not ask him for sweet words to you until he's had his dinner, and is blowing away all business cares in smoke, then while he mayn't say anything, he'll put his hand on yours, and you'll remember some years ago when he first held your hand closely, and you'll put your head down on his arm and cry a little bit because you are so glad. If you give him consideration, love, pleasant words and pretty looks, you will get beautiful golden coin in return—the best kind of coin, the money that is current in every country, which we all try to get, and which most of us are so careless about keeping. That golden coin called love, which has "Faithful unto death" on one side, and on the other, "When love goes, what is life?" These seem like a good many ifs, but all might be summed up in one great big if which is this: "If you are a real woman you will know how to love, honor and obey that exquisite duet, trio, quartet or quintet formed of husband and babies."

What Became of General Benedict Arnold and His Family.

History is sometimes false. Tradition is sometimes contrary to the truth. The case of Benedict Arnold and his family is in point. It is generally believed in America that Arnold died miserably in disgrace, and that his descendants never held their heads up before their fellow men.

Now, let us get at the facts. Recent encyclopedias and writers, and notably a writer in the Philadelphia Press, throw a new light upon the Arnolds.

After Benedict Arnold's death in England his widow never rested until she paid the last cent of his debts, contracted in unfortunate speculations. That was the only cloud on his name in Europe. Otherwise he stood well, and enjoyed the favor of brave and distinguished men.

The young Arnolds went to the front. For 50 years they fought like heroes for the British flag. At Surinam, James Robert Arnold led the assault, captured the fort, was presented with a $500 sword, made aid-de-camp to King William, and died a lieutenant-general in 1854.

His nephew, William, an English captain, was killed by the Russians in a desperate fight in the Crimea.

Of Benedict Arnold's other sons, Edward died a paymaster in the English army in India, where he was noted for his good and charitable deeds. George died lieutenant-colonel of the Second Bengal cavalry. William, the father of the captain killed in the Crimea, was a country gentleman in Buckinghamshire. One of his sons was the Rev. Edward Arnold, who married Lady Charlotte Cholmondeley.

Altogether, there have been few families braver, more successful, and more popular. Fortune has favored them from the time of Arnold's treason, and while millions of Americans have believed them to be suffering disgrace and poverty, they have been exceptionally favored. All of which goes to show that much of the stuff called history and tradition is worthless. History is very often mere fiction.

FLASHES.

A self-possessed man is often poor in his possessions.

Some of our girls who merely sing to kill time have good weapons.

As we recognize virtue in others, the more defects we find in ourselves.

Most of the seaside visitors cannot raise the wind to be heavy swells.

When your mind is made up right, there is no occasion for changing it.

The noblest motive is the public good. This is a maxim for our City Fathers.

Ideas are like beards—men have none until they grow up; women never have any.

We are prompt in forgiving our own faults, but slow to forgive the faults of others.

The first thing a woman does when you tell her a secret, is to look around for some one to tell it to.

You can never break a cow of kicking by kicking back. For the same reason a "kicking" woman can never be stopped by "kicking."

The Sacramento Valley.

Mr. W. J. Hassett is engaged in the preparation of a work setting forth the resources of the great Sacramento Valley, and the manifest advantages which must of necessity recur to this city and county in the publication of such a work. To the home-seeker, Northern and Central California offer inducements not to be found in any other section of the State. The services of a gentleman in every way identified with the interests of our State, a writer of national reputation, will have supervision of all papers in the book, which will be carefully revised and edited by him. The work will be beautifully illustrated with new engravings and a map of the valley, showing all the railroad connections and the certainty of Sacramento becoming the railroad center of California.

Address by Col. Irish.

Col. John P. Irish, chairman of Committee on Immigration of State Board of Trade, is now visiting all the counties in affiliation with the State Board of Trade, for the purpose of gaining information to embrace in a report he is soon to make on that matter. Col. Irish will be in Sacramento during the coming week to address our people, under the auspices of the Improvement Association, Trustees and Supervisors. He is acting under the State Board of Trade.

Played a Trick on Him.

Old Tom Barrett's sons were the young swells of the big country town where they were brought up, but old Tom himself still retained tenaciously all the uncouth manners of his younger days, when the broad acres of his homestead gleamed with wheat where the town hall now stood. Long rows of stores and houses were standing where old Tom had once grubbed pine stumps and ploughed his furrows. And still the land was his. So he was rich, and yet he was a sight to look at.

He had saved every penny for so many years that spending money was almost pain to him, but the warm old heart that beat beneath his shaggy exterior prevented him from being mean to his sons. He educated them, set them up in business, admired them, and was willing to do almost anything for them, except to give up his old ways or wear respectable clothes.

One day the boys decided to play a little game on him. The buggy he drove about the town was absolutely disgraceful, and he would not buy another or allow the boys to present one to him. He was exceedingly fond of a bargain, however, and his sons knew it. They accordingly arranged with a carriage maker to sell a stylish $200-buggy to their father for $75. They paid the difference themselves. The next day one of the boys mentioned casually to the old man that Smith, the carriage maker, had had a $200-buggy thrown back on his hands by a discontented customer, and he was willing to sell it "dirt cheap." Then they both joined in begging him to go over and buy it, and not disgrace the family any longer by driving around in such a disreputable and ramshackle conveyance.

Finally the old man consented to look at it, and perhaps to buy it, if he got it at a great bargain. The price asked, only $75, surprised and pleased him so that he bought the buggy on the spot, and delighted his boys by driving about in it everywhere.

Before many days, however, they were shocked to see the horrible old buggy out again, and their father coming toward them in it, with a wide grin on his face.

"For goodness' sake, father, why have you brought that old rattle-trap out again?" they asked. "Is the new buggy smashed?"

"Smashed, no!" replied the old fellow, with a chuckle. "I met a man who offered me $150 for that buggy, and I jumped at the chance to make $75 so easily. Ah, boys, you'll never come to want as long as the old man is left to make the money for you." And he drove off with a shout, and left his sons to kick themselves into their store.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Grab Bag was given last night by the Mestayer-Vaughn company. There is much that could not be said regarding this combination. This is another instance of farce-comedy run mad.

Gilmore's combination, The Twelve Temptations, will be with us on July 31st and August 1st. It is a brilliant spectacle and has held public favor for many years. A splendid ballet accompanies the spectacle.

Geo. C. Staley, an old-time favorite in Sacramento, will present his success, The Royal Pass, on July 27th, at the Metropolitan. Our old friend Geo. Staley has made himself and his piece famous throughout the nation. The support is excellent, and Staley can expect a sound and hearty welcome to his old home.

[FOR THEMIS.]

The Power of Good Laws.

After King Alfred had succeeded in expelling the Danish marauders from his dominions, he set to work to rectify the anarchy and disorder into which his people had fallen during the period in which the country was in possession of their enemies. To this end he divided all England in counties; these he subdivided into corporations of hundreds, and these again into tithings or companies of tens. Every householder was answerable to the tithing man, or the chief of the company of ten householders to which he belonged, for the conduct of his family, of his servants, and even of his guests if they resided in his house three days; the chief of the company of ten was answerable for the conduct of those under him to the next higher corporation, and so on until all centered in the king and his council. Every man was punished as an outlaw who did not register himself in some tithing, and no man could change his habitation without a warrant and certificate from the chief of the tithing to which he formerly belonged.

The plan for the administration of justice under this system was of the most liberal kind. The tithing-man summoned his whole decennary to assist him in the decision of smaller differences among the members of the corporation; in controversies of greater moment, the dispute was brought before the one hundred, which consisted of ten decennaries, or a hundred families of freemen, and was regularly assembled once in four weeks for the trying of causes. At these courts, twelve freemen, the equals of the litigating parties, were chosen, who, after being sworn by the magistrate, or chief of the one hundred, to administer impartial justice, proceeded to try the case and render a verdict according to the evidence. This is considered as the origin of the trial by a jury of equals—that just and benign institution which has had so much influence in developing and preserving some of the noblest characteristics of the Anglo-saxon race. The next superior tribunal—the county court—and finally the king and his council, while authorized to try cases which failed to receive final adjudication in the inferior courts, also exercised supervisory powers over the corporations beneath them, punished all malversation of office, removed all those officers who were found unequal to the trust reposed in them, etc.; and the whole was regulated by a system of laws, framed by King Alfred, which, though now lost, are generally regarded as the origin of our common law. Under these regulations, no crime could be committed that could not be traced its perpetrator by means of this regular system of clues, which ramified from the king downward through these inferior corporations to the individuals of each particular household; and it is said that so efficient was the working of this system that, when golden bracelets were, by way of experiment, hung up by the side of the public highway, no one dared to touch them. And yet no man ever had a greater respect for popular liberty than this same great prince. "It is just," says he, in his will, "that every Englishman should forever remain free as his own thoughts." But while instancing the foregoing as illustrating the power of well-conceived and well-executed laws, and as showing that the political and social evils of our own country at times are not beyond the rectifying power of judicious legislation, we would not, of course, recommend the transference of those identical laws of King Alfred to our own statute book, whatever modifications of them might be profitably adopted by us—inasmuch as the Americans of to-day are not the Saxons of a thousand years ago. But the lesson that we desire specially to enforce at present is, that there are no political and social disorders under which we now labor, which might not be corrected by a judiciously methodized, united, and well-sustained movement on the part of that large, intelligent, and better portion of community who feel aggrieved. Verbum sat sapienti est.

A grateful mind

By owing owes not, but still pays; at once Indebted and discharged.

—Milton.

Dennis Mud.

We are getting tired of writing about the town hall that never came and the fire company that didn't organize, so now we are going to ask somebody that knows whether any of the following subjects will do for the local debating society or not:

7. Resolved, that to find a young goat asleep is a genuine case of "kidnaping."

2. Resolved, that a boy found with his clothes caught on a farmer's barbed-wire fence and his pockets full of free-as-stone peaches is a serious case of "boycot."

14. Resolved, that snakes get more of a "wriggle" on themselves than a great many people, but resolved that the hired girl out walking with her new dress and best fellow knocks the shine off a whole nest of wigglers.

3. Resolved, that a newspaper man's pants are "darned" oftener than his bad luck. Delinquents please pay attention and whatever money they can spare.

19. Whereas, it has been decided that birds are the "flyest" of all living creatures; therefore, be it resolved, that thunder is the "highest roller."

103. Resolved, that the day "breaks" as often as a savings bank.

53. Resolved, that a musician with his watch in soak is "out of time," and resolved, that a man searching each of his pockets with a wishful look and a pipe in his hand is out of tobacco.

It will be noticed that the above resolutions are not numbered in rotation, but the way it happened was, that is, those are the way it was put down in the book it a-i-n-t in cause we cut it out.

**

Nature and her poor relations had a quarrel the other day. It wasn't because some of these "poor relations" came to spend "a week or two" and the old lady's money; nor it wasn't because somebody left the gate open and the cows got in and broke down the dried apple vines. The way it started was like this: A small rock called a big boulder an old "moss back;" a spear of grass laughed at the remark, and that made the boulder mad and it said to the grass, "if I was as 'green' as you are I wouldn't say anything." A mud-puddle then went in to assist the grass, but the sun told the puddle to "dry up" and pretty soon there wasn't anything left of that puddle but a few drops of water in an oyster can. The wind then said something and an old pine tree wanted to know what it was "blowing" about. Then the wind got angry at having that old chestnut sprung on it, and espied a leaf on the top of the tree, "Ah, come off, will you," said the wind to the leaf, and down it came. "Hold on a minute, please," said a tree-frog to the wind when it found the wind was shaking it off, but the wind wouldn't hold on and the tree-frog couldn't, so down it came. After the wind had gone around the corner to get a drink, a little pine told a manzanita bush that the wind was the most ungrateful fellow it ever knew; that the wind would give his best friends the "cold shake" every chance he got.

**

Recently we went on a visit to the county seat. That's the poetical way of saying it, but the truth of the matter is we went there on the train instead of on a visit. We saw an item in the paper the other day that said John Brown came in Saturday "on business;" we know that's a darn lie, because saw him come in "on horseback." That proves that he did not come on business—unless that was the horse's name. In which event he looked like a mighty poor business. But this isn't getting to Auburn. Auburn is called the county seat, probably because the people of the county seldom see it. We visited the county seat, and sat down in it. At least we sat down on an iron bench in the court-house yard. The only thing that makes us think that iron bench was the county seat was because we saw the sheriff sit down on it, and because they had the bench chained down. The reason this bench was chained was because the Auburn people were afraid we might want to move the county seat up to Colfax. Auburn is also a town, as well as a county seat. The chief industries of Auburn are fruit raising and blowing about the climate. The town started at the depot and played follow your leader down the hill. When it found a level place it sat there. And that's the way it became the county seat. Auburn raises vegetables and her newspaper editors raises sheol. Or at least they think they do. And that reminds us of a little dialogue that we overheard recently in that town. We will tell you about it:

A mother and child were seated on the veranda of one of the hotels near the depot. The mother was reading something out of a paper about four inches long by six wide. It looked like a Sunday-school sheet, but the heading said it was the Auburn Daily—something or other. She threw it down with a weary expression on her face, and said, "Those editors make me tired." The child heard the remark, and came and sat in her lap while the following conversation took place:

Child—Mamma, what's an editor?"

Mother—He's a man that writes a newspaper. He thinks he knows more than all the reporters and printers put together, and is always fighting with some other editor.

Child—And do all the editors fight, mamma?

Mother—No, my child, only the New-castle and Auburn editors.

Child—And do they really fight?

Mother—No, child, they just call each other bad names and talk fight through their papers. They wouldn't fight a sick cat.

Child—And will these editors go to heaven when they die, mamma?

Mother—Hush, my pet; of course not. They will go to the place that in one respect is like a printing office—the person of most importance is the "devil."

Child—What will they do there?

Mother—About the same thing that they did on the earth, my child. They will start their local columns by saying "hot weather." But instead of them burning up their devils the devil will burn them up.—Dennis Mud, in the Colfax Sentinel.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,

Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

	Assets.
Etna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

SADDLE ROCK

Restaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

PRINTING D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.
ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PANTS to ORDER
$3.50 to $13.50
SUITS to ORDER
$15.00 to $50.00
1000 Patterns to Select from.
GABEL the TAILOR
426 J STREET.

Fine Table Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Apud Humphrey & Co.
Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

The Isle of Long Ago.

The following poem was written by Benjamin Franklin Taylor, who was born in Lowville, Lewis county, N. Y., July 19, 1819, and died in Cleveland, O., February 24, 1887. He was a voluminous and attractive writer, and was a lifelong contributor to the columns of the Examiner and Chronicle, New York. In 1840 he was editor of the Chicago Evening Journal. During the civil war he was a correspondent on the field, following the Western armies. His war letters were very picturesque, and many of them were translated and republished in Europe. The London Times called him "the Oliver Goldsmith of America." We find the poem specially alluded to in a scrap book, bearing the title "The River Time," but we are inclined to presume that the author's title was "The Isle of Long Ago."

O! a wonderful stream is the River Time,
As it runs through the realm of tears,
With a faultless rhythm and a musical rhyme
And a broader sweep and surge sublime,
As it blends in the ocean of years.

How the winters are drifting like flakes of snow,
And the summers like birds between,
And the years in the sheaf, how they come and they go
On the river's breast with its ebb and its flow,
As it glides in the shadow and sheen!

There's a magical isle up the River Time,
Where the softest of airs are playing,
There's a cloudless sky and a tropical clime,
And a song as sweet as a vesper chime,
And the junes with the roses are straying.

And the name of the isle is the "Long Ago."
And we bury our treasures there;
There are brows of beauty and bosoms of snow,
There are heaps of dust—oh! we loved them so—
There are trinkets, and tresses of hair.

There are fragments of songs that nobody sings,
There are parts of an infant's prayer,
There's a lute unswept and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows and pieces of rings,
And the garments our loved used to wear.

There are hands that are waved when the fairy shore
By the mirage is lifted in air,
And we sometimes hear through the turbulent roar
Sweet voices we heard in the days gone before,
When the wind down the river was fair.

O! remembered for aye be that blessed isle,
All the day of our life until night;
And when evening glows with its beautiful smile,
And our eyes are closing in slumbers awhile,
May the greenwood of soul be in sight.

Mulish Intelligence.

The cars in the Suto tunnel are drawn by small, stout mules. From the mouth to the inmost point of operations, in the Comstock lode, is over four miles and a half. At different places in the tunnel the air is very good, but there are long stretches where the heat is intense and the air impure. The Virginia Enterprise says when the mules get to a good place they get down to a slow walk, and they will kick—not metaphorically—if the driver tries to get a "motion" on them. When they come across long stretches of heat they travel along at a good speed. In different places the air is supplied by big pipes. Here they will stop and poke their noses in the end of the pipe, and cannot be made to move until they get a good "fill" of air; and they will fight viciously for the end of the pipe, too.

In many places in the tunnel the cross-caps come down rather low. With horses, the moment their ears touch anything, up go their heads; but it is different with the mules. They guide themselves through the dark tunnel by the tips of their ears, and in comparatively very few trips they know every bad place in the tunnel and how to advantage themselves of the good places. Horses are utterly worthless for the work done by the mules.

Gossiping Women.

Among the ordinances promulgated at St. Helena in 1709 we find the following: "Whereas, several idle, gossiping women make it their business to go from house to house about the island inventing and spreading false and scandalous reports of the good people thereof, and thereby sow discord and debate among neighbors and between men and their wives, to the great grief and trouble of all good and quiet people, and to the utter extinguishing of all friendship, amity and good neighborhood—for the punishing and suppression thereof, to the intent that all strife may be ended, charity revived and friendship continued, we do order that if any women from henceforth shall be convicted of tale-telling, mischief-making, scolding or any other notorious vice, they shall be punished by ducking or whipping or such other punishment as their crimes or transgressions shall deserve or the governor and council shall think fit."

Things to Remember.

That salt fish are quickest and best freshened by soaking in sour milk.

That fish can be scaled much easier by dipping into boiling water about a minute.

In boiling spinach or other greens a little soda should be used as well as salt.

That ripe tomatoes will remove ink and other stains from white cloth; also from the hands.

That a teaspoonful of turpentine boiled with pure white clothes will aid the whitening process.

That milk which is turned or changed may be sweetened and made fit for use by stirring in a little soda.

Onions, turnips and carrots should be cut across the fiber, as it makes them more tender when cooked.

That a bit of charcoal put in the saucepan with your cabbage destroys much of the disagreeable odor.

That kerosene will soften boots or shoes which have been hardened by water, and render them as pliable as when new.

That eggshells are nice to clean bottles or cruets, also little bits of raw potato and soap-suds. Shake well, then rinse several times.

That salt curdles milk; hence, in preparing milk porridge, gravies, etc., the salt should not be added until the dish is almost finished.

That boiled starch is much improved by the addition of a little sperm or a little gum arabic dissolved; some like a few drops of kerosene.

That varnished woodwork should be cleaned with cold tea. Soap takes off the gloss. Wash thoroughly with weak tea and rub dry with a soft cloth.

That alcohol or benzine is a good thing to clean glass, and clean paper is better than any cloth, sponge or towel. Dry paper leaves an excellent polish.

That kerosene will make a tin kettle as bright as new. Wet a flannel cloth and rub with it. Kerosene will also remove stains and dirt from varnished furniture.

That meat slightly sour or tainted can be made sweet by holding over the fumes of ground coffee, burned on a shovel or stove-lid. Game and fowls can be treated the same.

That cracks in furniture may be filled with putty mixed with Indian red or burnt umber to get the desired shade. When dry it will take on equal polish with the wood.

That when hams or tongues are cooked they should be instantly thrown into cold water, as the change from the boiling water they were cooked in to cold water loosens the skin from the flesh and it pulls off without trouble.

That beeswax and salt will make flat-irons as clean and smooth as glass. Tie a lump of wax in a cloth and keep it for that purpose. When the irons are hot rub them with the wax cloth, then rub well on a paper or cloth sprinkled with salt.

Plenty of hot boiling water should be used in cooking vegetables, as the greater the quantity of water the greater the heat. If only a little water is used the whole soon cools, the vegetables become tough, and no length of time will render them tender.

Once was Enough.

Old Farmer Hayseed lost his barn last year by fire. They said at the time that he was insured more than the building was worth and that he was not sorry to see the old shed destroyed. Unfortunately for his hopes, however, the insurance people took advantage of an option in their policy and replaced the barn instead of giving him the money—greatly to his disgust. Not long afterward the traveling agent of a life insurance company came into the village and, among others, solicited Mr. Hayseed to effect an insurance on his life. "No, no," said the farmer. "I should feel as if I were a-going to die to-morrow." "Well," said the agent facetiously, "if that is the case, take the insurance on your wife." "You don't catch me there, either," chuckled the old man. "I know the way of you insurance chaps; you would just go and give me another old jade, even worse than the first." —N. Y. Tribune.

The barbers of long ago were barber-surgeons, but the rapid advance of surgical science has caused them to fall from their high estate. The gilt knob at the end of the barber pole of to-day represents a brass basin, which, but a few decades since, was actually suspended from the pole. The basin had a notch cut in it to fit the throat, and was used in lathering the customer, preparatory to shaving him. The pole represents the staff held by the patient who came to the barber-surgeon to be bled. The two spiral stripes painted around it signify the two bandages, one for twisting around the arm previous to the act of phlebotomy, or blood-letting, the other for binding when the operation was completed.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Guttenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

FRED. SCHREIER,

TWENTY-THIRD STREET, BET. Q AND R,

CEMENT SIDEWALKS,

Garden Walks, Carriage Drives, Etc., constructed at shortest notice, in the most workman-like manner and at lowest rates.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for, in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.
M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO.

W. R. STRONG CO.

Founded 1852.

Fruit Packers

and Shippers.

PROPRIETORS OF

CAPITAL NURSERIES,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Headquarters for ALFALFA SEED and OREGON POTATOES, in lots to suit.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar
Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

M. DUFFY,

Manufacturer of Carriages, Wagons, Carts, Etc.

REPAIRING

Done at Short Notice. All Work Warranted.

1111-1113 J Street, bet. Eleventh and Twelfth,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS.

J. H. DOLAN.

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES,

Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,
SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

TELEPHONE 248.

Jesting Death.

The following poem was written by an Irish officer, Lieutenant —, in the English service, while on duty in a city in East India in which the plague was doing its terrible work. The inhabitants, particularly the foreign residents, were dying every day by hundreds, when twenty officers of the English army, without a shadow of hope of ever seeing their country or friends, formed a club and sought to drown their senses in the wine cup, and by jest and song to divert their thoughts from the terrible and irrevocable fate which each knew awaited him. The author of this poem died almost before the echoes of "Hurrah for the next that dies!" had ceased to reverberate, and in less than a week every member of the club had crossed the "sable shore."

We meet 'neath the sounding rafters,
And the walls around are bare;
As they echo our peals of laughter,
It seems that the dead are there.
But stand by your glasses steady,
We drink to our comrades' eyes;
Quaff a cup to the dead already,
And hurrah for the next that dies.

Not here in the goblets flowing,
Not here in the vintage sweet;
'Tis as cold as our hearts are glowing,
And as dark as the doom we must meet.
But stand to your glasses steady,
And soon shall our pulses rise;
A cup to the dead already—
Hurrah for the next that dies!

Not a sigh for the lot that darkles,
Not a tear for the friends that sink;
We'll fall mid the wine cup's sparkles
As mute as the wine we drink.
So stand to your glasses steady,
'Tis this that the respite buys;
A cup to the dead already—
Hurrah for the next that dies!

Time was when we frowned on others;
We thought we were wiser then.
Ha! ha! let them drink to their mothers,
Who expect to see them again.
No! stand to your glasses steady!
The thoughtless are here the wise;
A cup to the dead already—
Hurrah for the next that dies!

Plants That Move.

There are plants which possess powers of motion strictly comparable to those exhibited by the lower order of animals. The sensitive and insect eating plants display these qualities in a remarkable degree. Similar movements to those of the sensitive plants, but occurring spontaneously, may be observed in others. Thus, in the telegraph plant, the leaf consists of three leaflets in a large central and two smaller ones. The motion is especially observable in the small side leaflets, which, on a warm summer day, may be seen to rise and fall by a succession of jerking movements, now stopping for some time, then moving briskly, always resting for awhile in some part of their course and starting again without apparent cause, "seemingly of their own will," as Prof. Asa Gray remarks. The movement is not simply up and down, but the end of the leaflet sweeps in more or less of a circuit. The leaf is not set in motion by a touch, but begins, goes on and stops of itself. In some cases we find the whole organism endowed with spontaneous motion of a very remarkable character. An instance of this occurs in the case of the regular undulating motion, exceedingly similar to that of some of the lower animals, characteristic of a class of algae, which grow in the water and are constantly in a state of oscillation, balancing themselves backward and forward during the whole period of their existence.

The following are some of the absurd movements introduced into figures in the ancient books of dancing: "Clap hands—snap fingers—beckon your partner—strike feet against the ground—stamp four times—give three jumps—give a little jump—hold up finger—put hats over your eyes—slip up—slip down—fall back and slide in—walk to the wall—peep three times—cast up and kiss your partner—peep down and up—hold up finger—trot half—advance four steps, nod and retire—dart with your fingers—first man go about the women and point your finger, then the figure—change places with one woman and act the cobbler—cross over and act the cobbler again." "What was meant by acting the cobbler," adds an indignant professor of serious dancing, "I leave to the ingenuity of the reader to discover; I cannot."

"You think everything is old foggy that doesn't belong to the present day of enlightenment and grand inventions," said a church deacon a few evenings ago. "Hump! Old Solomon said 3,000 years ago, 'There's nothing new under the sun.' Why, even in Job's day, 500 years before, they had cash boys in their stores," and the deacon looked around complacently on the grizzled faces of the brethren when he said it. "But how can you prove that, deacon?" said one. "It's plain enough," replied the deacon. "Did not Job say, 'All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change comes?'"—Delroit News.

Not an Improbable Story.

"What's the matter, old man?" he said, as they met the morning after. "You look blue."
"I feel blue."
"But last night you were the jolliest member of the party."
"I felt jolly."
"You acted like a boy just let out of school."
"I felt like one."
"You said your wife had gone away for the first time in three years and there wasn't anyone to say a word if you went home and kicked over the mantel clock."
"I remember it."
"You said that if you stayed out until 4 o'clock there was no one to look reproachfully and sigh and make you feel mean."
"Yes; and I stayed out until 4 o'clock, didn't I?"
"You certainly did."
"And I gave an Indian war whoop on the doorstep."
"Yes; and you sang a verse from a comic opera song and you tried to dance a clog."
"And my wife had missed the train. Now go away and leave me; I want to kick myself a little more for not taking the precaution to get an affidavit from the conductor that she went with the train."

Mme. Blavatsky smoked cigarettes to excess, says the New York Advertiser, and Dr. Elliott Cones, the leading American theosophist and a man of rare intellectual attainments, also consumes quantities of them. One of his servants' regular duties is to keep a jar of Egyptian tobacco and package of rice paper at the Doctor's side. Whenever the occult philosopher converses on his favorite topic he punctuates his discourse every five minutes by plunging his fingers into the jar and deftly rolling a cigarette, which he lights with a perfumed wax match.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Felter, Son & Co.

OFFER TO THE TRADE, IN QUANTITIES TO suit, a full and complete line of choice

Wines, Liquors & Cigars,

Including the Celebrated

GOLD CROWN and DELMONICO

KENTUCKY WHISKIES.

At the Old Stand, 1006-1008 Second Street,
SACRAMENTO.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.
BOHEMIA PILSNER,
BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors
and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.

WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint. In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.
ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff,
Jy18-St

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. Jc27-91

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of George H. Appel, an insolvent debtor. George H. Appel, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said George H. Appel is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at one o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, June 30th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,

Judge of the Superior Court.
PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. Jy4-51

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of N. IRWIN, an insolvent debtor.—N. Irwin having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said N. Irwin is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said N. Irwin, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated June 29th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. Jy4-51

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. SCHACHT,

DEALER IN

FAMILY GROCERIES

Provisions, Flour,

Wines, Liquors, Cigars, Tobacco

Southeast Corner Second and M Sts.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

C. T. MILLIKIN,

DENTIST,

1008 Eighth Street,

Between J and K,

Over Dr. W. A. Hughson's office.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON. ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,
LAWYERS.

504 J street. Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER.
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER.
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,
630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.
Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

The Garden of Eden.

The true site of the garden of Eden has been the subject of almost endless conjecture. The three continents of the old world have been gone over by theologians in a vain search for its most probable location. From China to the Canary islands, from the mountains of the moon to the coast of the Baltic, each country has been the subject of search, and no spot supposed to correspond in the slightest degree to the scriptural description of the first abode of the human race has been left unexamined. The most ancient opinion, which is given by Josephus, is that it was in the country which lies between the Ganges and the Nile. This view imagines Eden as being a very widely extended territory, embracing all of the country from the Indus on the east to the Nile on the west. As the "garden" is said to have been "to the eastward in Eden," it is placed definitely in the valley of the Euphrates. Von Hammer, the famous oriental scholar, places Eden in Bactria; others locate it in Babylonia, at the confluence of the Euphrates and the Tigris. Capt. Wilford, a profound student of Hindoo antiquities, has labored to locate Eden in Bactria, south of the Koosh range of mountains. Buttman puts it down in India; Heider, in his "History of Mankind," identifies it with the Vale of Cashmere; the orientals (many sects of them) believe that it was on the Isle of Ceylon, while the Greeks place it at Beth-Eden, on Lebanon. Lastly, many regard the whole story as given in Genesis as a myth.

Edison's Story.

Edison's accomplishments are not all in the electric line. He can tell a good story capably. He told one the other day about an experience he had recently in an up-country town in Pennsylvania one Sunday morning. He had been out to see some iron works. A cold rain was falling and he got soaked through. When he reached his hotel the first thing he did was to order a hot Scotch.

"Can't give it to you," said the clerk.
"Eh? Can't give it to me? Why not?"
"Because it's Sunday. We can't sell anything to drink on Sunday."
"Well, but I'm wet through," said Edison, "and cold. I want a drink."
"Well, I'll tell you what we can do," replied the clerk, "we can give you a kodak."
"What's a kodak?" asked Edison.
"You just go up to your room and press the button. We do the rest."
Edison got the drink.

We are so tired, my heart and brain and I,
We only crave the privilege of rest.
A few short hours will do, in which to lie
With fast-closed eyes—hands folded on the breast.

We neither wish to work nor think nor grieve,
O friend! We only wish to lie quite still.
You see, we have been stunned, my heart and I,
And now, with upturned face, would wait
God's will.

We pray you do not speak to us, O friend!
No sound nor touch of earth, nay, even right,
Must come between my God and heart and self;
Draw close the curtains, dear, exclude all light.
I know you deem me childish, weak and wrong;
But then my heart and I do know we're right.
The tide of love and feeling is at ebb.
Ebb tide it is—and sorrow's at its height.
Leave us, kind friends, ye may not comfort now;
My heart and I do wait the Master's voice;
We have been smitten, and do wait for Him
To bind our wound—to say, Arise! Rejoice!

The average woman does not make a good poker player. It is said of Tallyrand that if he were hit on the back his face would not show it. The poker player may not get a pair or he may get four aces, but his face does not show his disgust or pleasure. A woman is naturally emotional, and when in poker she gets a good hand her joy can hardly be kept within her features. A shrewd observer may know a woman's hand by observing her features as she picks up her cards. There may be one woman out of a hundred who can control her feelings sufficiently, but the great majority talk too much with their face. Talking of women card-players in general, there is one fault many have: they lack the power of concentrating their minds upon the subject under discussion—the game. If there is a gay, talkative fellow at the table, they talk and forget trumps, in euchre, or fail to notice how many cards the various players called for in poker. Watch the player who talks during a game or tells some funny story and see how much it costs him or her. It is deplorable to see a woman poker player. The excitement, the mortification, the temptation to cheat, all tend to rob her of the noble qualities that surround our women.

A man's trials can not be insufferable if he lives to talk about them.

CURES CONSTIPATION.
LASH'S
KIDNEY AND LIVER BITTERS
CURES HEADACHE.
CURES MALARIA.
CURES DYSPEPSIA.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

TOP NOTCH SPICES.
SCOTT & GILBERT.
MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS AND PROPRIETORS OF TOP NOTCH TONIC,
TOP NOTCH FLAVORING EXTRACTS, STOCKMAN'S CONDITION POWDERS,
STOCKMAN'S LINIMENT,
DR. GILL'S BOTANIC COUGH SYRUP.

J.B.GILBERT.
JED.M.SCOTT.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.
San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,
Book and Job Printers,
410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

THE GREATEST OF AMERICAN WATERS
A NATURAL MINERAL WATER OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT.
"SHASTA" WATER
BOTTLED FOR EUROPEAN TRADE
MOUNT SHASTA, ELEVATION 14,442 FT.
MT. SHASTA SPRINGS, CALIFORNIA
BOTTLED AT THE SPRINGS
TRADE MARK COPYRIGHTED

JUST RECEIVED.

A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES
AND CARD CASES, OF THE
LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND JEWELRY.

UNCLE IKE'S, 302 K STREET, SACRAMENTO.

B. Ruhl Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 400 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

July 9, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.15 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.20 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knight's Landing and Marysville	7.25 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
12.05 P	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express Ogden and East	8.15 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.40 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.40 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.30 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.15 A
8.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
*10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	*6.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.30 A	Santa Rosa	11.15 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
12.05 P	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	8.15 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.30 A	Vallejo	11.15 A
3.05 P	Vallejo	*5.10 P
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1891.

No. 24.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

There are some queer inconsistencies, or apparent inconsistencies, in the administration of the laws, particularly in the matter of jury trials. It often occurs that the application of legal principles amount to a paradox. This week there was a very important jury case wherein the defendant was accused of violating an ordinance of this city which makes it a misdemeanor to keep open any place where vinous, spirituous or malt liquors are sold by the glass, or bottle, between the hours of 12 o'clock midnight and 5 o'clock in the morning. A jury of forty representative citizens was summoned to try the case. In questioning the several jurors, the questions were asked, whether the persons interrogated had any opinion regarding the ordinance in question, and whether they thought the ordinance good or bad. About six out of seven of the jurors answered that they thought the ordinance oppressive, and an unwarranted interference with the rights of business men; that so long as a respectable place of business was conducted, it is unjust to restrict the business by limiting the hours during which it shall be conducted. While the jurors who thus replied were good citizens, and believed in enforcing the laws, this prejudice against the ordinance, under the ruling of the court, excluded these jurors from sitting on the jury. Now comes the apparent paradox. If the juror, in reply to the questions mentioned, declared that the ordinance named is a good one, and should be enforced strictly, there was under the law no disqualification, and the jurors are competent to try the case. This may be the law, but it certainly has a somewhat paradoxical look.

It has become so common for newspapers to pre-judge important cases, and to condemn those accused of crime, upon mere suspicion, that we feel it incumbent on us to enter a protest against this unwarranted license of the modern dailies. From the Albany Law Journal we reproduce the following, which is a truthful exposition of the subject: Meanwhile, all over the land, the process of trial by newspaper goes merrily on. And what an easy, sure and altogether cheerful process it is! How swiftly, and with what an admirable confidence in its infallibility, it progresses! Every penny sheet in the land is a tribunal of home-made justice. Conviction follows suspicion, and punishment follows conviction, with the swiftness and inevitableness of gravitation. We suspect that people, especially lawyers, who do not like this method of disposing of grave charges, fail to realize how great an improvement it is upon older and more primitive forms of extra-judicial procedure, such as trial by combat, the ordeal of fire, and the like. In these the accused, whether innocent or guilty, sometimes got off with his life, but who ever heard of an escape from their modern substitute—unless, indeed, the offense charged was newspaper libel? Moreover, the earlier modes of trial had the sanction of religion, which was sheer superstition, while our modern equivalent has the sanction of that lovely substitute for religion, which its devotees call public opinion, and in whose voice they detect the accents of the voice of God. But in other respects the modern device for dispensing with justice is very similar to the earlier ones. There is the same lofty disregard of law, the same sublime contempt for the processes of courts, and the same pious satisfaction in the results attained. It is not to be marveled, then, that these inerrant organs of divine inspiration have little patience with the fallible decrees of our judges and the merely approximate results obtained by the operation of legal and judicial machinery. In view of all which, no one will be surprised to learn that at the recent convention of the New York State Press Association, held at Bluff Point, on Lake Champlain, last week, it was unanimously concluded that there are too many lawyers in the Legislature, and that the bar of the State constitutes the principle obstacle in the way of abolishing the control which the courts of law continue to exercise over the newspapers. This is veritable gospel truth—this last charge against the lawyers—and we are almost prepared to go a step further, and claim that the bar of the land is the principal bulwark of society and of our institutions against the persistent encroachments of a licentious press.

That was a departure from the usual address to a graduating class, delivered recently by Justice T. B. McFarland to a young ladies' graduating class, upon delivering diplomas. After extending congratulations to the young ladies and calling attention to the joyous spirit that should attend youth, the Judge said: "It is unpleasant to contemplate the future of a human being who has never known a pleasant childhood or youth—one upon whose tender years have fallen the duties and trials which should come alone to the firm muscles and mature brains of men and women. Such persons may, indeed, achieve what the world calls 'success,' hard lines in youth sometimes develop those rough and aggressive qualities which are effective in the fierce struggles of life; but the successes to which they contribute are apt to be cold and colorless and unsatisfying. Such people are apt to look upon their fellow-beings as rivals or enemies, and are apt to want those kindly human sympathies and those warm friendships and attachments and that love of the beautiful and the grand and the noble in nature and art and human character which make up the best of life. Their successes are apt to be like the triumph of a cheerless journey through a wintry day, and upon their lives there seldom falls the mellow effulgence of summer sun-sets or the breath of morning flowers." In his quaint manner Judge McFarland admonished the sweet girl graduates not to follow the examples of those who are inclined to look on the dark side of life—such as welcome calamities and enjoy funerals. "Life is mostly pleasant to those who make it so. Neither social nor financial eminence is necessary to the fullest enjoyment of life. The struggle to the mountain top often ends in a scene of barrenness and silent desolation, while far below is the pleasing and enjoyable landscape, variegated and made beautiful and fragrant and musical by trees and grass and flowers and birds and brooks." Continuing, the Judge said: "And don't think that the only good in life is to be found in youth, and that it must therefore be hurriedly gathered up. Every season has its advantages; if there are flowers in spring, there are fruits in autumn. We old fellows have some fun, and I know some ladies well advanced in years who are as happy, and almost as sweet, as girl graduates." Referring to the resources of the young ladies, he said: "Your education here has given you the key to the largest and most valuable department of human enjoyment—I mean that enjoyment which comes from books and the love of learning and literature. People of course should not be mere book-worms; they should have fresh relations with the actual world, and should learn from nature and from human living beings around them. Neither do I wish to decry the other sources of enjoyment which young ladies have. The theater, the opera, music in its various forms, the entertainments of society, ice cream, the companionship of congenial friends, soda fountains, beaux, the ornamental arts, hats and bonnets that are 'just too lovely for anything,' progressive euchre and drive whist, dancing and other 'things o' that sort'—all these are to be enjoyed as opportunity offers. (As to the statement that dancing is a proper amusement—'for goodness' sake don't say that I told you') But these things you cannot have always with you. No matter what your circumstances in life may be, you will find many hours and days when you will be thrown upon your own resources for entertainment. Then you will find literature to be the great inexhaustible and ever available reservoir, from which you can draw when the running streams of enjoyment are dried up or inaccessible. It will furnish you society in solitude, and companions of the most delightful characters. You will find there something in accord with every varying mood and a solace for nearly every sorrow. You will find there the choicest thoughts of the brightest intellects of all time, while your own minds will constantly be enriched with increasing wealth of knowledge and with new subjects for your own thoughts. There you may listen to the sweetest song of the poet and the most thrilling words of the orator, and may follow the profoundest speculations of the philosopher and the deepest researches of the scientist. And in your more leisurely moods you may wander with delight through the elegance of the lighter realms of belles-lettres. There you may enter that delightful world of modern prose fiction created, we might almost say, by the genius of Sir Walter Scott, and peopled by him, and those who, after him, conjured with less magical wands with those wonderful 'beings of mind,' whose society is a joy forever.

The address of Judge Geo. A. Blanchard before the High School graduates on Thursday evening is replete with brilliant thoughts. We cull a few lines from this classic effort: "The tracing of a single word of common and constant use back to Zoroaster and the birth of Buddha will bring you into the charmed region about Paradise itself. Science, which in our time it is a crime for any one to totally neglect, has made such advance of late years as the imagination had not spanned fifty years ago. History can be courted all the time:

" 'She is the owner of the sphere,
Of the seven stars and the solar year,
Of Caesar's hand and Plato's brain,
Or Lord Christ's heart and Shakespeare's strain.'

"Literature will be a sweet solace to you at all times when consolation is most sweet to the taste. At no hour of your life will the love of letters ever oppress you as a burden, or fail you as a resource. In the vain and foolish exultation of the heart which the brighter prospects of life sometimes excite, the pensive poetess of Science shall call you to her pleasures of her holy cell. In the mortifications of disappointment her soothing voice shall whisper serenity and peace. In social converse with the mighty dead of ancient days you will never smart under the galling sense of dependence upon the mighty living of the present age. And in your struggles with the world should a crisis ever come when even friendship may deem it prudent to desert you, when priest and Levite shall come and look on you and pass by on the other side, seek refuge, and be assured 'ye shall find it' in the friendship of Lælius and Scipio, in the patriotism of Cicero, Demosthenes, and of Burke, as well as in the precept and example of Him whose law is love, and who taught us to remember injuries only to forgive them."

There are some structures in this city that may have been improved in appearance by the removal of awnings and porches; the great majority of buildings, however, look barren and ungainly without the awnings. It is a matter of very grave doubt whether the alleged improvements are in any degree an improvement, even in the general appearance of the city. Certain it is, that, as a question of comfort, the removal of our awnings has served to deprive us of that comfort and convenience formerly enjoyed. When we come to walk along the streets in the glare of the burning sun, with no protection from its rays, we begin to realize the genuine benefit of our much-abused and unappreciated awnings. Again: When we have our winter rains the old-fashioned awnings were a great protection; now, we are exposed to the full fury of every storm when passing along the streets. It is never good judgment to sacrifice comfort for mere appearance's sake. In the present case we have sacrificed our personal comfort and have not added anything to the general appearance. Our model reformers need reforming themselves, if they are to be judged by their work. We have voted $100,000 for street improvement, which is not to be taken into account on behalf of the so-called improvers. About the only thing these men have done is to cause annoyance to the citizens by insisting upon the enforcement of their crank notions of reform.

A TRAGEDY OF ERRORS.

It was after Mrs. Jeffries, still a young and pretty woman, was dressed for dinner, and sitting at the window with her embroidery, that she saw a messenger boy crawl up the street, stop to throw a stone at another boy, and finally rung her door bell. A moment after this, Bella, the "up-stairs girl," brought her a note. It was from her friend, Edwina Jones, familiarly Ned, who had come from afar to pay her a visit, and being timorous, had decided to wait at the depot until she came to meet her. There was no time to lose. Mrs. Jeffries gave a few directions to her cook and hurried away.

Half an hour after she had gone Mr. Jeffries returned home and let himself in with his latch key, wondering that his wife did not come to meet him. Mr. Jeffries had been a very jealous man before he married. He confessed it. He would not permit anyone to pay the least attention to his Emma Jane. Even cousins of the first degree made him suffer pangs of grief unknown when they called on Sunday afternoons, and an uncle, who was unusually young for that relationship, while as yet unknown, had driven him to the most serious thoughts of suicide, for Emma Jane had kissed him in the front hall.

"Do you really think, Jefferson Jeffries, that I can endure such conduct?" his Emma Jane had remarked. "Is it possible that anyone can put up with being followed around like that, and stared at like that? Do you think I will?" and then she had given him back his ring, and he had ground it under foot. However, he bought her another in a month or so, and they made it up and married; and Mr. Jeffries, warned by the past, had behaved himself very well indeed, and he had never yet been jealous of his wife, when one afternoon in August he came home early to dinner and found her "gone out." "Bella, did she say where she was going?" asked Mr. Jeffries.

"No, sir," said Bella. "She gave out the things for dessert, and went out in a hurry loike, in her best things, just after she got a note loike, brought by a boy dressed like a tallygraph."

"Ah!" said Mr. Jeffries. "I trust her mother is not ill. It really seems as though something must have happened." He went up stairs when he had said this and looked about him for the message, which, doubtless, she had left lying somewhere. He could see none. He opened the drawer in which Emma Jane kept her trifles of lace and ribbon and quilled muslin, and still saw nothing. But, glancing into the waste-paper basket, he discovered a twisted paper, and, as it was the last of the little heap, picked it out and unfolded it. Spreading out the wrinkles he put his glasses on his nose and read. And as he read his cheek grew pale, for these were the words:

DEAREST EMMA JANE: Meet me on the New York side of Twenty-third street ferry. I long to see you after our long parting. Yours very, very fondly, NED.

"Ned!" ejaculated Mr. Jeffries; "Ned!" He ground his teeth and clenched his fists. He could have howled with rage, but for the proprieties which we generally observe in our greatest agonies. This was the end of it all, then; Emma Jane had gone to meet her old beaux. Old or new, who could tell? A lover, anyhow. He tried to be calm; but he could not believe himself mistaken. He knew her brothers and cousins well. They were Peter, Paul, William, Elias, Samuel, and James. Even her father, who would not have signed his first name, was Adoniram. There was no way out of it.

"No end but one," thought Mr. Jeffries, as he sought for the pistol generally kept on hand for possible burglars. "I must follow them, find them, shoot him first, her next, and myself last. No one shall know why; but the traitress will know as she dies!"

He put the pistol in his pocket, crowded his hat over his eyes and rushed out of the door. A Twenty-third street car was passing; he jumped into it and retired into a corner, folding his arms.

"Fare!" cried the driver. Mr. Jeffries mechanically deposited something in the box, and sank into his seat and a black study again. A volley of shocking reproaches from the driver aroused him. He found the passengers glaring at him.

"I've had this trick played on me before," cried the driver through the door. "You're a nice one, ain't you, at your age, to put a coat button into the box?"

Mr. Jeffries received the remark without an answer, and repaired his error by putting a quarter into the same aperture into which he had dropped the button.

"My belief is you are crazy," remarked the driver.

Mr. Jeffries only groaned. What was silver to him? He rode on, the object of much comment. Shortly after, a friend entered the car. He was a man of jovial disposition, and, as he said, fond of his joke. After nodding and smiling in vain, he bethought himself to poke Mr. Jeffries in the ribs with the immense knob of the handle of the umbrella. Taking the passengers into his confidence by a knowing wink, he stole forward and perpetrated his joke. The "punch" was a hard one; the result an explosion. If anyone had tried to fire the pistol in that manner he would have failed. Accidentally Mr. Joblings had done it. Mr. Jeffries gave a groan, started up and fell forward on his face, blood trickling over his stocking. The car was stopped, and policemen carried Mr. Jeffries into a drug store. The penitent Joblings was in custody, having voluntarily delivered himself over to justice. The wound was not perhaps a dangerous one, but Jeffries remained unconscious. Joblings accompanied him to his home in a cab, and, having told the tale in a court of justice, was permitted to go free on his own bail. And just as Jefferson Jeffries opened his eyes his Emma Jane arrived at her door in a cab, with a trunk fastened on behind marked "E. J.," and a young lady within in a plum-colored cloth traveling suit.

"My dear, dear Jeffy hurt!" cried the poor wife, as Bella told the tale. "Oh, let me go to him!"

Away she rushed up the stairs to the bedroom above and bent over her husband's pillow.

"Jeffy, dear!" she sobbed; but to her consternation Jefferson opened his eyes, looked at her and said:

"Leave me, woman!"

"It isn't a woman. It is your own Emmy," sighed Mrs. Jeffries.

"Take her away!" said Jefferson.

"Is he delirious, doctor?" asked poor Emma Jane, trembling.

"No, madam," replied that gentleman, gravely.

"Then what does this mean?" asked the poor woman.

"Madam," said the doctor, the most solemn of his profession, which is saying much, "madam, I have no desire to pry into your domestic difficulties."

"My domestic difficulties? I never had any. Oh, dear, dear Jeffy, speak to your Emmy," sobbed Mrs. Jeffries.

But her Jefferson only replied by saying, in deep chest notes:

"Crocodile! Take her away. The sight of her is madness. Will no one rid me of her presence?"

"Oh, Mr. Joblings, tell me what he means?"

"Beg pardon, madam, I must request you to retire," answered Mr. Joblings, all his nature apparently turned to gall. "You alone know the meaning of those awful words."

Poor Emma Jane. She rushed down stairs when the door of her own room had actually been closed upon her, and told her incoherent story to her friend.

"I've seen him jealous before," she said, "but not like this. What can it mean?"

"What did you do? Whom is he jealous of?" asked the other woman.

"Oh, Ned! I don't know," sobbed Emma Jane. And Edwina Jones concluded, very naturally, that Emma had been flirting terribly with several individuals. Thus, wronged by all, even her girlhood's friend, Mrs. Jeffries abandoned herself to despair.

A bullet in the calf seldom kills, and as it was extracted promptly, the wound healed and Jefferson Jeffries began to recover; but he still refused to see his wife, and on the first day of his convalescence he summoned his lawyer and sent him to Emma Jane empowered to effect a separation.

"This letter is my reason," he said, with a dreadful groan, thrusting the crumpled note into his hands. "I was on my way to shoot the fellow when Joblings managed to shoot me. She shall keep the house if she likes, but I never wish to see her again."

With this message the lawyer sought the unhappy lady, and in the presence of Edwina Jones interviewed her.

"One comfort at least I shall get from this," said Mrs. Jeffries, with dignity, "I shall know my crime."

"Mr. Jeffries opines that this will explain," said the lawyer, presenting her with the crumpled letter, which, with its signature, suggested very dreadful things indeed.

Emma Jane took it in her hand, looked at it and then handed it to her friend. "My letter!" cried Edwina, dumbfounded. The puzzled lawyer elevated his eyebrows. "I am called 'Ned' at home," said Miss Jones. "Surely Mr. Jeffries knew that. Oh, Emma Jane! how I have wronged you in my heart."

Explanations followed. The lawyer, choking down his laughter, returned to Mr. Jeffries' apartment and gave them to that gentleman with dramatic effect. Never had he more trouble in preserving the grave dignity proper to his position, when Jefferson Jeffries, clasping his hands together, ejaculated: "'Edwina Jones!' Of course I knew. But I forgot her very existence. How I have wronged my wife. Wretch that I am, can she ever forgive me?"

"Never!" Emma Jane decided. "You have disgraced me before your friends, before strangers; cast suspicion on me and insulted me by word and deed. I demand a separation." Then she went home to her parents and Jefferson Jeffries was left alone to reflect on his ridiculous conduct. He was obliged to explain to the doctors, to Joblings, to everybody, and suffered agonies of shame. He longed for his Emma, whom he loved more than ever, and he writhed under the reproaches of her mother and father and the menaces of her big brothers. When he was able he used to go alone at midnight and stare up at his wife's window, and by day haunt her steps unseen when she went out walking. At last he followed her to church on Sunday. She was alone in her pew. He entered and sat down beside her. When the hymn was given out he offered her his hymn book. Over it their heads met.

"Oh, Jefferson! how could you?" she whispered. But that evening she went back home again. She felt that Mr. Jeffries had had his lesson and would profit by it for the rest of his existence.

Ned says they are the happiest couple she knows.

From Key to Throne.

A sudden favorable turn of fortune does not always alienate the lucky individual from his habitual occupations. This more or less wise saw is applicable to the case of the present King of Segon, who was put on the throne of his black kingdom by Colonel Archinard, when his royal predecessor, Ahmadou, took to flight for his safety.

Mademba, the present monarch, is a native of the country over which he at present rules, but was formerly controller of telegraphs at Senegal. Before accepting his regal state he made it a condition that his name should continue to be inscribed on the list of telegraph servitors, and that his situation of king should be considered as subservient to his original employment.

Mademba must have learned, either by intuition or from acute observation, that the lot of a monarch is less certain in these days than the position of an officer in the service of the Postes et Telegraphs, and so preferred to keep in reserve what might one day prove to be a happy issue out of all his afflictions.

He has, no doubt, constantly one eye on his throne and the other one, of memory, on the office of his former telegraphic exploits. Should the future bring about for Mademba that change which is in the modern order of things, he may return to the tick-tick of his former days, with the right to add to his title of preference that of "ex-King of Segon."

Politeness in telegraph offices, although once seriously complained of by M. Guy de Maupassant, is generally the rule, even with the ordinary employes, but should Mademba I of Segon ever return to his Senegalian bureau his clients may expect to be treated in right royal fashion by a man who never lost sight of business, even when promoted to the honors of an African throne.—Galignani's Messenger.

The city of Liverpool is just completing a great work in bringing a new supply of water from Lake Vyrnwy, some thirty or forty miles distant. On May 31st a temporary pipe was laid across the bed of the Mersey, and, although the method adopted has already been used in this country, there were peculiar conditions that made the undertaking especially difficult. The pipe was 800 feet long, made up of sections of 12-inch steel tube. The pipe was first put together in a long wooden trough or launching-way on the shore, at right angles with the river. The ends of the pipe were plugged, and by means of wire ropes attached to an engine on the opposite side of the river, launched from the wooden trough and floated across the river. The plugs were then withdrawn from the ends, the pipe filled with water and sunk to the soft bed of the river. Within an hour from the start the pipe was in position, connections were made and water was flowing under the river.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Marie Wainwright will make the play of Amy Bob-sart her prominent attraction next season. In this piece Adelaide Neilson made an eminent success.

Edwin Booth, the greatest actor on the stage, is reported to be seriously ill and rapidly declining. There is no successor of this accomplished artist. Frederick Warde in some few roles might be considered as such.

Rose Coghlan retains her shapely loveliness, she claims, by brain work. "There is nothing," she says, "like an active brain for reducing flesh. Then, too, I never drink when I am eating, for I believe that drinking with your meals makes you grow chunky."

Francis Wilson, the comedian, has an abiding admiration for Napoleon, whom he tries to imitate in the manner of wearing his hair and in other ways. A stage Napoleon is necessarily slower than a railroad Napoleon like Henry S. Ives, but he benefits the public a great deal more.

It is probable that Buffalo will furnish the operatic stage with a new prima donna in Miss Gertrude Sears, who created a sensation by her singing at the annual concert of Mme. Marchesi's pupils in Paris. Miss Sears has a splendid soprano voice, full, clear, resonant and admirably trained. She was in all respects the star of the exhibition. In personal appearance she is a refined and rather pretty brunette.

Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Mrs. Charles Collis, Lillian Russell and Miss Elita Proctor Otis, the amateur actress, are among the few New York women who wear thumb rings. That which adorns the sinister thumb of Mrs. Wilcox is set in diamonds and is very valuable. The fad does not number many votaries in this country, although the wearing of such rings is said to be rather common in France and England.

A strange sign appeared in a piece of music published a few days ago by a Berlin music-seller. In a certain passage of one of Dressler's publications entitled "Letzes Lied," a pause is marked, a special pause, which has nothing to do with the ordinary signs used in music. The song was one of Moliere's favorite songs. It was while listening to its performance that he was seized with apoplexy. The pause indicates the precise moment when the old field marshal fell back to die.

"That, sir," said the man with the baggy-kneed trousers and the bad eye, as he finished narrating his experiences, "is the story of my life. Is it any wonder I have a deep and bitter grudge against mankind?" "You have had a sad history," answered a sympathizing hearer, "but what can you do? What satisfaction do you expect to get by hating the whole human race? Are you going to turn hermit or anarchist?" "Neither!" exclaimed the other, a gleam of triumph lighting up his bad eye. "I am getting a thundering sight more satisfaction than that. I have two boys that go through the aisles at theaters and yell. 'Opera books! Books of the opera.'"

Book Chat.

One of the horrors of African exploration is the book that follows it. Here is another one of the rear guard with a volume.

"A Nameless Novel" is one of the latest candidates for public favor. Many of the recent novels are not only nameless but senseless.

A new work by Thomas a'Kempis has been discovered and is almost ready for publication. It is entitled "De Vita Cristi Meditationes."

Bjornson, the Norwegian novelist, writes so abominably that no one but his wife can read his manuscript, which she has to copy for him before it is sent to the publishers.

Goethe may have said "Light! more light!" on his deathbed, says a letter recently published, "but his last words, clear and distinct, were: 'Now comes the change to higher changes!'"

Whittier is quoted as saying, the other day, that there were times when it seemed to him that he must take up his pen and write, but that he felt that he had done enough and that his work was really completed.

Col. John Hay, one of the joint authors of the famous Lincoln biography, has a trim figure, closely cropped gray whiskers and a mustache, and an elegant way of handling his glasses which bespeaks the man of leisure. Col. Hay married a large fortune.

"Reflections, Thoughts and Maxims" is the title of the book Gen. Boulanger proposes to inflict upon the world. His maxims and thoughts are perhaps not worth a penny, but if he has the good judgment to properly review his own career, his reflections may possess a certain somber value.

George Smith, "king" of the English gypsies, announces that in the fall he is going to begin the publication of a paper in the Romany language, to be called the "Wandering Folk." He hopes to get 20,000 subscribers. In the prospectus he refers in terms of warm gratitude to those good friends of the gypsies, Barrows, Charles Godfrey Leland and Archduke Joseph, of Austria.

Alexander Dumas has been at work for more than a year on a comedy, that is now approaching completion. Last winter the brilliant dramatist spent several weeks at Monte Carlo, where he watched intently the operations of the gaming tables, and it is generally conjectured that the Casino will figure among the scenes of the forthcoming play. But it is not likely that his Monte Carlo will equal his father's "Monte Cristo" in general interest.

"The Coming Terror" is a series of powerful and entertaining essays, by Robert Buchanan, written in a most fearless style upon topics of universal and absorbing interest, among which are the following: "Is the Marriage Contract Eternal?" "Is Chivalry Still Possible?" "The Modern Young Man As a Critic." Place is also given to his remarkable paper on "Descending Into Hell," a letter addressed to the home secretary on the proposed suppression of literature.

It must not be supposed that rural newspapers are mere conduits through which the news and opinions of the metropolitan press are distributed in the rural districts; on the contrary, they are the critics and censors of the great city dailies. They have more time to think than the writers for the latter, whose often hasty and superficial editorials are frequently of less real value than the productions of the man who has a week in which to mature his reflections upon the topics of his choice. The country newspapers are in many cases the sources of much original thought which finds its way into the city dailies; the nurseries of ideas which are transplanted and developed in the city hot-house. Taken together, they represent an aggregate of intellectual, political and social power which far outweighs that of the metropolitan press. Of the 18,536 periodical publications in the United States only 1,300 are daily newspapers. There are nearly 17,000 weeklies, consisting mainly of country newspapers. They form an army of missionaries whose work covers every county and township, every nook and corner of the United States; a vast array of influences which reach through every home, down through all the social strata of that great commonalty of American yeoman which forms the controlling power in American politics and whose will shapes the destinies of the republic. The reign of the country newspapers thus stretches over a vast territory which is inaccessible to the city dailies or even to the city weeklies. The city papers shed their far-reaching light upon the hilltops, but it is the rural press which illuminates the valley and the plain.

"I Swear!" is the title of a very well written and interesting novel by Frank H. Powers. Mr. Powers was for many years a resident of Sacramento, and, if we are not in error, was born in this city. From the prologue it appears that the story is based on a romance of the Cherokee nation, Wawona Brooke, one of the heroines, being a descendant of that nation; and upon the assassination of Major Brooke, at the instigation of John Craig, she was required to "swear" to have no intercourse with the descendants of John Craig. This was exacted to prevent her harboring a spirit of revenge. The bright sketch then commences by the introduction of Fannie Northrop, a California girl, who is intended by the author as the real heroine. The various characters are cleverly cast in the plot, which embraces some splendid descriptions and sensations. The description of the view from the cañons near Berkeley, where Fanny Northrop for the first time communes with her soul, and the sensations to herself, are vivid and realistic. There is a shade of the psychical running between Fanny Northrop and Paul Morrison, and Wawona Brooke and Paul Cameron, the principal characters of the plot. The author does not depict a genuine California girl in all particulars, and allows the "slang" to crop out inopportunities, but he does place some splendid sentiments in the mouths of Fanny Northrop and Wawona Brooke. He makes Fanny a little agnostic and in a degree a sharp critic, severe upon our girls who, because they write a little English, allow their girlish sentimentality to deceive them into the belief that they are capable of writing novels; and others, because they can repeat a little declamation, imagine they can become great actresses. The originality of the scene of Wawona's marriage, where the picture of John Craig, shown her by her intended husband, recalls the oath exacted by her father ("I swear!") and defeats the scheme of Paul Morrison's uncle, is a very clever conception by the author. There are some crudities, which are excusable in the first attempts at romance writing. Mr. Powers shows the proper ideas in novel writing, and his work is refreshing when we consider the trash that is flooding the country under the name of literature. "I Swear!" is published by the Vires Publishing Co., New York.

Professional Chat.

Rev. Dr. Brown, of Westminster Presbyterian Church, Utica, cleaves to the claw-hammer in the pulpit.

A judge in Kansas who knows no law refuses to hear mortgage foreclosure cases because "they are oppressing to the people." He will find that there is something still more oppressive to them when they become unable to borrow money on any terms as long as such judges are in office. He is not likely to remain long, however, for he has been overruling the Supreme Court by the advice of his fellow-grangers, and will get himself committed for contempt of court if he does not soon alter his course.

"Your honor," said a prosecuting attorney in an Alabama backwoods court, "the prisoner at the bar is charged killing one of the most exemplary citizens of this county. Andrew D. Boyson, your honor, was in every respect a model man. He was a beloved member of the church, and was never known to be guilty of an unchristian act. Why, your honor, he was never known to bet on horses, play poker, drink whisky, or use tobacco. He——" "Hold on a minute," the judge broke in; "you say he didn't bet on horses?" "That's what I say, your honor." "And he didn't play poker?" "Never was known to play a game." "And he never drank liquor?" "Never drank a drop, your honor." "And he didn't chew tobacco?" "Never took a chew in his life." "Well, then," said the judge, leaning back with a sigh, "I don't see what he wanted to live for. There wa'n't anything in life for him, and I don't see why he ain't about as well off dead as alive. Release the prisoner, Mr. Sheriff, and call the next case."—Arkansaw Traveler.

While Mr. Hamlin was Speaker of the Maine Assembly there was in that body a certain gentleman of faultless attire, pleasing manners, good address, and some reputation. This gentleman had one foible—that is to say, one pronounced and particular foible—his hair was thin, and he was sensitive in regard to it. To hide his approaching baldness he had a habit of carefully, with bandoline and other preparations, stroking each particular hair which was left to him into its place. One day, while in the chair as speaker, Mr. Hamlin, in the innocence of a good and joke-loving nature, sent for this gentleman, and, looking fixedly at his smooth and polished pate, said, with a chuckle: "Blank, old fellow, I just wanted to tell you that you've got one of your hairs crossed over the other." "You insult me, sir; you insult me," replied the member, with unexpected and altogether unnecessary indignation, and then, refusing to listen either to reason or explanation, he left the speaker's desk and returned to his seat. When Mr. Hamlin became a candidate for the United States Senate this gentleman was a member of the upper house of the Maine Legislature, and positively refused, though a member of the same party, to vote for the man by whom he believed he had been insulted. So it was that Hannibal Hamlin was defeated for a seat in the Senate by a hair. In the end his strength was thrown for Mr. James W. Bradbury, and that gentleman was elected to succeed George Evans.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska has decided that when a husband is physically unable to support his family, and his wife earns the money to pay the bills, she is the legal head of the family. Few authorities, legal or social, will presume to question that such a decision is in accord with the equities, and, therefore, promotive of the public good. Nevertheless, in its tendency it is calculated to create an apprehension in the more timorous of manly bosoms that the doctrine of legal headship if given an inch may gradually proceed to help itself to an ell; in other words, that it might result in a division of authority which would afford lamentable disproof of the adage that two heads are better than one. This apprehension is premature, to say the least. There is not the slightest warrant for assuming that woman, drest in a little brief authority, would so abuse it by fantastic tricks as to wring tears from the angels, as Shakespeare tells us man is wont to do. So far as actual headship of the family may go, money, or the capacity for earning money, is by no means the only test of primacy. Talent of various sorts, and especially executive talent, is very often found to serve the same function as authority. This, however, is merely de facto authority, which is a very different thing from authority before the law. Thus far the rights of the husband are entirely secure even in Nebraska. The decision is not only unassailable from the standpoint of equity, but it is one more proof of the oft-noted fact that the western courts are taking advanced ground on questions touching the legal status of woman which the more conservative judicial functionaries of the East may as well prepare to keep pace with. Meanwhile, and until the coming of that golden era, we may expect to see a hegira of eastern wives, with their husbands and families, to the promising Nebraska plains; for the women of the East not only know a good thing when they see it, but, as Ingalls tells us was the case with Washington, they see it a great way off.

NOTES.

Pure chloroform, something hitherto unattainable, will now be made by M. Pictet, a chemist of Geneva.

Hon. Jos. McKenna, Congressman from this district, is at Kennebunk port, Maine, where his children are spending their summer vacation.

Princess Mary, of Teck, is the prettiest marriageable royal girl in Europe. She is the object of devotion of Prince Edward, of Wales, but the match is prevented by the strong objection of the Queen.

Investigation of the working of the Kansas liquor law shows that a resident of Topeka had a cold one day and a fever the next for a year without a break, and that his medicine was invariably whisky or beer.

There are more women in British India (12,400,000) than there are men, women and children in Great Britain, France and Germany put together, with the population of several minor European States cast in as well.

A man's intentions and aims in life may be ever so good, if he doesn't direct his efforts in the proper channel to bring about practical results, the excellence of his intentions are of no consequence and he himself remains a mere cipher in this busy world.

The eminent Mr. John Hutchinson, of the London Hospital, recommends for the treatment of nose-bleed the plunging of the feet and hands of the patients in water as hot as it can be borne. The most rebellious cases are said to yield to this method of treatment.

Henry Watterson's declaration that the Lord will provide a Democratic candidate for President next year shows a commendable but belated inclination on the part of the Democratic party to transfer its allegiance. The Lord has not been their shepherd heretofore.

Every year some inventive genius adds to the risks of war. It is only a question of time when nations will refuse to take the risks of war with modern appliances. All that is needed now is to perfect the balloon and make it as terrible and more destructive than great guns.

The recent discussion on tobacco and alcohol, following Tolstoi's merciless screed against their use, has revealed a man who smoked for seventy years without interruption, consuming between 8,000 and 9,000 pounds of tobacco, and yet retaining perfect physical and mental health.

Reputations are being shattered in Kentucky while the merry war goes on. A stump speaker has just charged Senator Carlisle with living in a house presented to his wife by the Standard Oil Company. It behooves the Senator to arise at once and explain in a voice that all may hear.

Undying fame awaits a Frankfort woman who has originated a novel and unique though painful method of committing suicide. She went into a zoological garden there and fed herself to the bears. The system has obvious advantages, but unlike others it affords pleasure to at least a few—viz., the bears.

The meanest young man in Michigan lives in Cheyboygan. He has cut from the papers accounts of people dying from ice cream poison and pasted them in his hat. When he visits his girl he leaves that hat on the center-table so that she cannot but notice the pasted notices and reads them. He says it is a great scheme and works so well that she has not asked him for ice cream this year.

Our neighbor, the News, has occasion to burnish up its classics. ("When the old Greeks spoke of their boss deity 'Jove' the cloud compeller," etc.—Evening News.) Jove was the Roman deity who is said to have sat in state on Olympus. Zeus was the Grecian deity identical with the Roman Jupiter. Neighbor, "Jove" is Latin, "Zeus" is Greek. Perhaps, however, all is Greek with our contemporary.

The Bee has commenced the fight for a new charter in earnest. It is certain that the people will be educated upon the subject through the medium of the Bee. We have always been known as the advocates of a new organic law, and the Bee has, through its wide circulation, notified the people of the needs of this city, and the selection of 15 freeholders to frame a suitable charter for the present government of the city.

Few people can form a definite idea of what is involved in the expression, "An inch of rain." It may aid such to follow this curious calculation: An acre is equal to 6,272,640 square inches; an inch deep of water on this area will be as many cubic inches of water, which, at 227 to the gallon, is 22,000 gallons. This immense quantity of water will weigh 220,000 pounds, or 100 tons. One-hundredth of an inch (0.01) alone is equal to one ton of water to the acre.

Robert Allen, after nearly three months' suffering, has at last succumbed to the death-blow dealt by the murderous thugs. He died Friday morning shortly after ten o'clock. We have heretofore given a history of the life of Robert Allen since his arrival on these shores, from the pioneer days to the present. "Bob" Allen, as he was familiarly called by his hosts of friends, was a worthy and estimable citizen. His demise leaves another empty chair from the board of the pioneers of "49." He leaves a widow, and a son and daughter.

We suggest the adjustment of the liquor traffic in this city as follows: The Trustees to repeal the midnight-closing section, being Section 10 of Ordinance 276. It is plain that the mass of the people are not in favor of this restriction. Modify Section 12 of the ordinance by making the quarterly license $30 instead of $45. This, coupled with the $30 per quarter county license is high enough. The Board of Supervisors should also modify the county ordinance in regard to that clause requiring a majority of the taxpayers resident of the precinct to enable the granting of licenses. This course will undoubtedly secure a cessation of legal hostilities and will prove equitable and just. While the tax under this plan is much greater than that required by any other business doing proportionate business, it will be acceptable to the liquor dealers.

What to Name the Baby.

"People might select names for their children with better discretion if they were acquainted with the very expressive meanings borne by many of the personal designations in the language," said a linguist professor to a writer in the Washington Star. "Some of them have rather funny significations; for example: Julia means 'mossy-bearded,' Ursula is a 'female bear,' Priscilla is 'a little ancient' and Cecilia is 'dim-sighted.' Barbara signifies 'foreign,' Abel is 'vanity,' Bernard is 'a bear's heart' and Caleb is 'a dog.' Daniel is 'judgment of God,' and Raphael is 'medicine of God.'

"Ever so many English names have very beautiful meanings. Beatrice is 'making happy,' Letitia is 'joy,' Mabel is 'my fair,' Selina is 'a nightingale,' Susan is a 'lily,' Sarah is 'a lady,' Rebecca is 'faithful' and Lydia is 'a well of water.' What is prettier than Margaret, which signifies 'a pearl,' or than Amelia for 'sincere,' or than Sophia for 'wisdom,' or than Katherine for 'pure,' or than Adeline for 'a princess?' Bertha is 'bright,' Charlotte is 'all noble,' Cornelia is 'harmonious,' Caroline is 'noble-spirited,' Harriet is 'a sweet perfume' and Jane is 'a willow.' Again: Henrietta is, properly translated, 'a star,' Judith is 'praising,' Jemima is 'sweet song,' Isabella is 'fair Eliza,' Agatha is 'good,' Felicia is 'happy,' Lucy is 'constant,' Muriel is 'myrrh,' and even humble-sounding Bridget is 'shining bright.'

"If these are good names for sisters, sweethearts, wives and mothers, equally appropriate for fathers, sons and brothers are Nicholas, which means 'victorious,' David for 'beloved,' Hugh for 'thought,' Horatio for 'worthy,' James for 'superior,' Thomas for 'a lion' and Edward for 'truth-keeper.' Philip is 'warlike,' Robert is 'famous,' Richard is 'powerful,' Eustace is 'firm,' Ralph is 'help,' Charles is 'a man,' Matthew is 'a gift,' Hubert is 'bright mind' and Hilary is 'cheerful.' William stands for 'helm of the will,' Patrick for 'a nobleman,' Felix for 'happy,' Oliver for 'an olive' and Isaac for 'laughter.'

"Incidentally to naming children, it is worth while to look out for the initials. I have known two men who were obliged to write themselves for short 'A. S. S.' just because of their parents' carelessness."

Paper With Silk In It.

Anybody who wishes can go into the big Crane & Co.'s factory at Dalton, Mass., and see the workmen place the blue silk on the machine that makes the paper for all the United States notes. The silk comes in spools, and is made by Belding, of Northampton. It is sold here in Bangor. There is no more secret about it than there is about the water flowing over the dam above the toll-bridge.

The real secret is in the composition of the paper. The silk thread is secured by patent, to be sure, but the making of the paper, the compound of the ingredients, is safe in the head of J. Murray Craue, who received the art from his father, who made bouds for Salmon P. Chase, Lincoln's secretary of the treasury, away back in war times.

The pure linen pulp is in a big room, looking for all the world like any linen pulp. Then comes J. Murray Craue with a grip-sack. He and the "grip" enter the room together, and it is presumed that he locks the door, for the door is locked on the inside, and the "grip" does not look able to do it.

They are closeted a half an hour. When they come out the pulp goes to the paper machine, and Mr. Crane and the "grip" go home. But the pulp is changed by that visit, and nobody has been able to penetrate the Crane secret. The company gets about fifty times as much for that paper as for other linen paper made in the same mill.—Bangor News.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Parnell's Movements—Breaking the Record—Crossing the Atlantic in 5 Days, 21 Hours, 10 Minutes—Mrs. Astor's French-made Toilets Held by the Customs Officials—Steel Mackay as a Miner—The Streets of New York—The Broadway Cable—Carnegie's Music Hall—Musical Unions and Gen. Fitzgerald.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, July 25, 1891.

There is a rumor circulating to the effect that Parnell, the Irish leader (or ex-leader as you may choose to call him), has arranged to come to America to attend the Convention of the Irish National League, to be held in Baltimore next September. This promises to be an international episode of a pronounced kind. John Fitzgerald, President of the league, has, it is said, received a letter from Parnell pledging himself to do everything consistent with his position to carry out Fitzgerald's views, which are understood to refer to the demand of the party in America that the factions in Ireland unite on a leader before the September convention. Of course, there is the additional idea of securing funds for the cause to draw Parnell to this side of the water. Fitzgerald says no money will be subscribed until the leadership question is settled, but that plenty will be forthcoming then. What would become of the nationalist cause without American contributions is hard to say. It is rather amusing to hear that Parnell found some difficulty in finding a priest willing to perform the ceremony of his marriage to Mrs. O'Shea on account of the objections of the church to the marriages of divorced persons. One thing remains certain, however, he did find such a priest, and the fact that the marriage is not condemned goes to show that the church can be lenient if the marriage is only prominent enough.

The Atlantic steam packet record has again been broken. The new steamship "Fuerst Bismark," of the Hamburg-American Company, has just made the passage from New York to Southampton in 5 days, 21 hours and 10 minutes, which is the fastest eastward passage ever made. The time of the eastern passage was first brought within six days by the Inman steamer "City of Paris," in December, 1888, between Sandy Hook and Queenstown, and that time, 5, 22, 50, remains the best ever made between those points.

Compared with New York's latest custom house sensation, the case of Meyer and Dickenson, of Philadelphia, sinks into insignificance. In their case the government has only to refund the excess duty paid, but in New York it is no such personal and pecuniary matter. Mrs. Astor, the famous and only, purchased two handsome toilets in France during the past winter which arrived per steamer last week. The customs authorities demanded a duty which Mrs. Astor considered an excessive one, and which she refused to pay. The authorities retaliated by announcing that the gowns would be sold at auction. Mrs. Astor replied that they might sell them as she would not bid. Now, here is a chance for some one to obtain a bona fide Astor dress—something that belongs to the very innermost shrine of "society." There is no doubt of the effect it would produce; the only question is would the comment be pleasing to the wearer?

Steel Mackay, the dramatist, is said to be in North Carolina, mining. He went there for his health, and a little wild life, early in the spring. While tramping over the mountains he became interested in the stories of mines and moonshiners that the guides had to tell. Of course he made up his mind to get to the bottom of those stories, and did so to the extent of investing in a mine somewhere back in the mountains. For the past month he has hidden himself from the world and is industriously seeking wealth. I really pity him when he comes to answer the questions that will be fired at him from all sides on his return in the fall. He will have to carry a printed statement about with him to satisfy his friends. New Yorkers have become shy of North Carolina mines, but they wish Mr. Mackay luck none the less.

If the streets of New York are not the cleanest of any city in the world it is not because of parsimony on the part of the city officials, who make annual appropriations for this purpose. Each year the sum is greatly increased, but the cleanliness of the city shows but little improvement. Broadway and a few avenues and principal side streets are kept in good condition as the show streets of the town, for which the fear of adverse criticism from the visiting stranger is unbearable. Whenever the streets become unclean, and the protest of the people is over strong, the plea is made that the appropriations are insufficient; and on this plea a considerably larger amount is obtained for the succeeding year—with no perceptible difference in the streets. Usually the money is spent in experiments. The last scheme has been the "patrol system," coupled with a small engine belonging to the fire department, for washing out unusually dirty ways. The results are not very apparent, however.

The progress of the work of constructing a cable road on Broadway is slow—very slow, although carried on at half a dozen different points simultaneously. The engineering difficulties are numerous. Nearly the entire length of the street is filled with water, gas and sewer pipes and electrical subways. As it is necessary to lay the foundations of the cable road at least four feet beneath the surface, and as many of these pipes are nearer than that, no direct work can be done until these have been removed to one side. Of course, the unwieldy water mains are the greatest source of difficulty. One track is laid at a time, and the indications are that Broadway will be torn up and almost impassable for months to come. It is to be hoped that the completion of the road will bring some permanent relief to travelers, as a reward for their indulgence and patience under so many difficulties.

The directors of Mr. Carnegie's music hall in this city have set forth the attractions of that resort in a neatly illustrated pamphlet. Mr. Walter Damrosch, who is to fill it with music and audiences, is still in Europe gathering musicians for his orchestra. Of course the trades unions will make a fuss over the landing of two or three capable artists, while they say nothing about the hoodlums and "assisted" immigrants that are landed daily on our shores. Such is artistic consistency.

The musical unions are still assailing General Fitzgerald because he did not order out the bands at the recent parade of the New York militia. During the winter the unions decided that an advance of $2 should be paid to every bandsman parading with a regiment. The commanding officers of the dozen or more commands in New York and Brooklyn objected to this high-handed proceeding and on Memorial Day ordered their regiments out with field music only; hence the attack on General Fitzgerald. The general insists that he had nothing to do with it, and says that the colonels were at liberty to refuse accession to the extortion of the band members. He adds, moreover, that he is proud to be denounced by such a crowd as the followers of Johan Most, and that if he chooses to order a parade without music he will do so, without reference to strikers or unions. The general impression is that the bands have thrown themselves out of work.

A Batch of Snake Stories.

Mrs. Cyrenas Slack, of this city, says the Lambertville Beacon, had an unpleasant experience while visiting in Easton last week. One afternoon during the week she and her three children strolled out of the city and rested along a fence surrounding a field. Mrs. Slack was sitting on the grass watching her children at play, when suddenly her youngest child exclaimed: "Oh, mamma, look in your lap!" She turned her head quickly, and there in her lap, curled up and head erect, was a blacksnake some five or six feet in length. Mrs. Slack, of course, terribly frightened, but jumped to her feet, when the snake fell to the ground and crawled away, while the frightened lady gathered her children together and hurried to the residence of her relatives. She had intended to extend her visit to at least another week, but she cut her trip short. Mrs. Slack thinks it was "nearly as thick around as a telegraph pole."

Miss Myrtle Leiphart, of Springboro, says the Comeautville Courier, attempted to kill a large spotted adder. The snake showed fight and tried to strike her. She dodged it and caught up a little child which was in danger, and ran for the house. In her fright she fell over a wash tub, dislocating one of her knees and breaking one bone. The snake was killed by her sister, and was found to measure four feet.

A rattlesnake three feet long, with a tin cup fastened to its back by the handle, was killed near Hancock, Wayne county, a few days ago. The Hancock Herald says: "The snake had pulled its body through the handle of the cup half the length of it, where the fit became too tight, causing the cup to stick to the scales of the snake."

New South Wales to Make Pig-Iron.

A syndicate has been formed by a member of the New South Wales Parliament to develop the resources of the colony, and it is proposed to begin at once the erection of blast furnaces, and in the future, rolling-mills and steel works. The ores are said to be found in apparently inexhaustible quantities, with deposits of coal and limestone within short distance. The ore shows 50 per cent. of metallic iron, and some of it is shown to be suitable for steel manufacture.

FLASHES.

West Pointers can be truthfully called "dogs of war."

The democratic press will not give Secretary Blaine a rest.

Fashionable marriages and fashionable divorces are often kindred.

If extreme high license prevails our drug stores will be transformed into "jug stores."

Some of our judges may get full, but one of the Federal Supreme Judges is always Fuller.

Summer girls flutter too much. Her highest ambition is to wear as scant a bathing suit as possible.

The warning sign "look out for paint" would be appropriate on some of our fashionable women.

The alleged society news is the merest bosh, and those who affect society foibles are of little minds.

Twice during the year man feels the need of rest—just before his vacation and again immediately after.

"Did you speak to me when you asked for the Billy Fair?" inquired the blonde waiter. "No, I didn't menu," replied the saucy maiden.

Beware of the three women. The one who does not love children, the one who doesn't love flowers and she who openly declares she does not like other women.

Young Woodson's Death.

The sudden and untimely death of Edmund D. Woodson has cast a gloom over this community. In the fresh bloom of young manhood, just on the threshold of a useful and honorable career, he was taken without warning. It seems like cruel fate, when a bright, healthy young man is seized without any previous warning and taken from earth. Young Woodson was beloved by all who knew him. He possessed a warm, generous heart and was the soul of honor. Even in one so young, he had the attributes of brilliant inventive genius. The blow is a terrible one to his honored parents, who must feel that the Ruler of the Universe is cruel beyond measure to them.

Installation and Ball.

The Grand United Order of Odd Fellows, District Lodge, No. 32, will have a brilliant reception, installation and ball, the latter in the Assembly chamber, on the evening of August 4th, under the auspices of the local lodges. The annual session of the Grand United Order of Odd Fellows will be held on Monday and Tuesday, in Pioneer Hall, where the business of the order will be conducted. Delegates from all parts of the State will be present on this occasion.

Death of Mrs. Frank Snook.

It was a surprise to the many friends of Mrs. Frank Snook (formerly Miss Nannie Scaniker, daughter of the late Judge Scaniker) to learn of her sudden death. She was stricken with typhoid fever a few days ago, which culminated fatally yesterday afternoon. Her sister, Miss Mollie Scaniker, was with her during her last hours, having been telegraphed of the illness of Mrs. Snook.

Death of a Pioneer Printer.

"Tom" Reed, one of the pioneer printers of the State, died in Oakland on Thursday last, aged 67 years. Mr. Reed occupied the position of foreman of the State printing office from 1856 to 1858, and was succeeded by the late E. G. Jefferies.

On Mont Blanc's Summit.

During last summer Mr. Janssen, a well-known French scientist, spent some time on Mont Blanc for the purpose of making meteorological observations, and his experience has resulted in a daring proposition to construct a permanent observatory upon the very summit of the mountain, 15,781 feet above the sea level. In conjunction with M. Eiffel, M. Janssen has elaborated the plans for an observatory to be built entirely of iron, and having a length of 85 feet, with a breadth of 20 feet.

In order to find a firm foundation for the building it is necessary that the solid rock of the mountain shall be reached, and excavations are to be made in the ice of the highest glacier in order to ascertain the location and character of the rock. This once accomplished, a structure will be designed which will give to the observatory a firm hold, by iron pillars bedded in the rock. It is intended that the observatory shall be rendered habitable throughout the year.

An Atchison man had a "nightmare" after eating a lunch of cheese, mustard and dried beef, and had a disagreeable dream that his son was in great danger. Instead of being unable to run from ghosts, as is usually the case in nightmares, he was unable to get ready to go to the rescue of his son. Finally he awoke, and was so impressed with the dream that he went into his son's room. He found him out of bed and on the roof of the house, where he had climbed in his sleep.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Last night Gilmore's Twelve Temptations was introduced with new features. This spectacle has been a success for many years, principally upon its good management. To-night Twelve Temptations will be again presented at the Metropolitan, when a full house is assured. One temptation is enough for the ordinary mortal, but when it comes to "twelve," there is no resisting.

A Word to National Guardsmen.

The National Guard of California, as well as that branch of the government in every State in the Union, is formed and protected and subsidized by the Legislature to act as the standing army of the older nations that it may be ready, armed and equipped for emergencies, to protect life and property, and enforce the laws in cases of insurrection, or rebellion, or riot at home, or the sudden incursion of enemies from abroad. And so perfect is the system that perhaps no power could so quickly throw into the field a well caparisoned and efficient army, of all arms, as the United States, raised direct from the homes of the private citizen. The laws of our own State governing and providing for her National Guard are most liberal and generous, and in no other State is better provision made for its efficiency, and even comfort. Among the laws, enacted at a comparatively late session of the Legislature, is one requiring the citizen soldiery to go into camp once annually, that active practice in camp life in all its detail of field experience may be indulged by the members, both officers and privates. This is a most beneficial and sensible regulation if properly enforced by the officers in authority, as it enables the soldier to learn what it is to turn his attention, for a time at least, from the luxury and ease of the life of a private citizen to the stern realities of the soldier's life of obedience and hardship in the tented field. It is then that the men of arms recognize the fact that though, when at home, he may be free and equal with his daily associate, yet in camp he must know that he has superiors whom he must obey, and disobedience or insubordination to whom means court-martial and disgrace thereafter. In fine, those encampments are designed to give to the participant a taste of what should be the hardships of military life.

But is the National Guard of California really gaining to itself credit by the way it is conducting and behaving itself at its annual meetings, as reported every year about this season? Is it fairly and honestly earning the money appropriated by the Legislature at every session for its maintenance? And is it acquiring one atom of benefit by the way it is reported to act at the sea-side to which it naturally gravitates when looking for a camping place? If corroborated report, much multiplied, is to be believed, the Guard is not doing itself much credit by its behavior on those occasions. Not that any petit crimes or misdemeanors are perpetrated, nor that the privates are to be blamed for the inactivity that characterizes the meetings, but that there seems to be an almost total ignorance of the duty that calls them to field life and instead a week's time of hilarity, pomp and display in the social circle, at hops, balls, drives, soirees, etc., etc., all of which tends to make men effeminate and languid, and consequently poor soldiers and worse officers, and to do away with military authority and discipline, which, of course, are absolutely essential and necessary, and without which there can be no efficiency and less tuition in the manual of arms or drill. Why is it that the officers chosen for that purpose will annually select the fashionable resorts of Santa Cruz or Monterey for the encampments? Of course, for the social enjoyment there to be found. Does the law of the National Guard, and the appropriations made for its maintenance, contemplate such a useless waste of time and money? Why then, if the officers mean to advance and propagate the efficiency of the Guard, would it not be an excellent plan to amend the law so as to compel the encampments to be located annually in some remote part of the State, far away from the "haunts of men," where the enervating influences of society could not be courted, and woman and her wiles would not be a drawback to the duties imposed on the genuine soldier of our State, from whom so much is expected in an hour of need.

Important Citizens' Meeting.

There will be a meeting of citizens and taxpayers of this city at the Clunie Opera House this evening at 8 o'clock, the object of which is to induce the Board of Trustees to modify the late liquor license ordinance. Hon. Grove L. Johnson and W. A. Anderson will present the facts in behalf of the aggrieved.

Labor.

The federated trades will join in the Iron Molders' picnic next Sunday. All societies of organized labor will be invited to join in the demonstrations. There will be a due observance of "labor day" on the first Monday in September.

The Prizefighter.

A prizefighter, says the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, is a creature that corresponds among men to what a prostitute is among women; he is a male ruffian and loafer who is willing to sell his splendid body to be pounded and abused by another equally low-minded ruffian and loafer for money. Civilization places this brutal business under the ban of the law in every Christian country in Europe, and a prizefight cannot legally take place in the United States save in Louisiana, Texas and California—where public opinion does not yet seem willing to relegate it to the lowest depth of society where it belongs—to the applause and enthusiasm of outlaws, criminals and other wild beasts that rage and gnash their teeth at the base of every civilization in the world.

A prizefighter is as utterly useless and contemptible a member of society as the "road agent" that robs a railway train, or the lusty beggar that tramps to and fro, an eyecore to all persons who love public peace and are devoted to private industry. A bull dog is not useless, for he can be trained into a useful watchdog, but a prizefighter produces nothing but public disorder and demoralization; he watches no slaughter-house, but only helps to make the earth in spots look like the shambles; he guards no property; he watches nothing, but prowls up and down the land selling his person to anybody who cares to pat his red brawn and bet his shekels on his blood. He is a nuisance, and the bigger the brute the more he cumber the earth. A prizefighter stands for nothing but that shameful degradation of human nature that is found everywhere and is expressed by the words burglar, pick-pocket, pimp and prostitute no more vividly than by the word prizefighter. Prizefighting is the survival of the brutal social habits of the last century, when even English clergymen were not ashamed to ride hard after foxes and drink hard at dinner; when men of liberal education and high rank were not ashamed to get drunk at home and abroad; when men of literary genius went to cockfights, and were not ashamed to gamble all night over gin and water.

The law in England and America prohibits prizefighting, but in England the law is enforced with sternness compared with America, where the law is evaded or ignored. Prizefighting was once under the patronage of the English aristocracy and gentry; the prizefighter, Mendoza, a Spanish Jew, was a great favorite with the court of George the Fourth, and the English prizefighter, Jackson, who whipped Mendoza, taught Lord Byron how to box, and was highly esteemed by a great many very respectable people; but since the accession of Queen Victoria prizefighting in England has slowly but steadily declined. After the famous Heenan and Sayers fight in 1859 prizefighting in England has had no influential support, and during the last thirty years no prizefight has taken place in England that was not followed by the arrest and severe punishment of all parties concerned in it.

Prizefighting has a far more vigorous life with us than in England, because the law against it is not earnestly enforced in certain States of the Middle West, the South and the Pacific coast, notably California, where prizefights take place under the patronage of the athletic clubs. It is easier for England to enforce her law against this brutal practice, because public opinion varies greatly in the different States. Home rule exists in every State, while in England the central authority can stop prizefighting in every county of the three islands.

Nothing can be said in extenuation of prizefighting; nothing, truthfully, in defense of the prizefighter, for he is nothing but an utterly base-minded, unprincipled, stupid brute, who defends his disreputable calling by saying "there is money in it," which, of course, is as utterly forceless a plea in his case as it would be in the case of the keeper of a baguio. There is money undoubtedly sometimes in infamous callings to both men and women; but nobody but a moral idiot seriously defends a ruffianly life by saying, "I'd like to do right, to lead an industrious, law-abiding, law-respecting life, but there is no money in honest work; so I feel obliged to do wrong."

There is no courage cultivated by prizefighting; nothing but ferocity and cruelty; insensibility to human suffering; coarseness of thought, speech, feeling and action. A prizefighter is nothing but a splendid animal who sells the sanctity of his body for money, just as does his immoral correlative, the strumpet, whose pet hero he generally is. His venal abuse of his person is an act of self-degradation that sinks the prizefighter quite down to the level of the strumpet; in the play of degraded life he is the Ingomar and she the Parthenia—

Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat like one.

Granting this to be a true picture of a prizefighter, with all the paint and tinsel, all the peacock fuss and feathers removed and his fame viewed in a cold, dry light, what shall be said in explanation of the interest felt in the issue of prizefights by persons that could not be hired to witness one and would be pleased to see all parties to it placed in the penitentiary? The only decent explanation of the interest felt by a humane, intelligent man in the issue of a prizefight is that it is due something to the same feeling which makes a man who loves peace and hates war, nevertheless read with satisfaction the story of Austerlitz and Waterloo. The average man loves the sensational, and he reads the story of the prizefight, which he would shudder to see, and whose principals he would be glad to punish, with something of the same passionate yearning for the sensational and the sanguinary which the little boy manifests in "Helen's Babies," begging his father when he reads the Bible to be sure and read about "David and Goliath with his head all bluggy." This is the feeling that makes men who ought to know better take a certain interest in that abuse of athletics; that ditching of the really noble art of self-defense that is constantly wrought by the American slugger.

The survival of the bullfight is in line with the taint of cruelty that runs through the Spanish character in all history, but the survival of the prizefight is not in line with the average humanity and refinement of the governing masses in America. We are not a cruel or ferocious people, and we ought not to suffer prizefighting to ever show its grisly, bull-dog head in defiance of the law without making all parties to its presence suffer for it. It ought to be as disgraceful among gentlemen to go to a prizefight as it would be to go to a hanging, a dogfight or a cocking main, because the gratification of a desire to witness such spectacles is cultivating the basest part of human nature—the ferocious, the cruel, the cowardly, the coarse quality, which every man has to subdue in order to be a gentleman after God's own heart, which loves mercy and hates cruelty.

SACRAMENTO TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, No. 46.

The members are requested to meet at the Valley Press at 1230 P. M. on Sunday, August 2d, to attend the Iron Molders' Picnic in a body.

By order of the Union.

M. H. STROUT, President.

J. L. ROBINETTE, Secretary.

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

PANTS to ORDER
$3.50 to $13.50
SUITS TO ORDER
$15.00 to $50.00
1000 Patterns to Select from.
GABEL the TAILOR
426 J STREET.

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Grand Hamworthy & Co.
Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

B. Ruhl Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

The Death of the Ideal.

With misery bowed, with affliction bent,
Like a gray, gaunt specter, his way he went.
A fearful secret he carried with him,
Which rendered his journey so grim, so grim!
Through the mists of the past there shown from afar,
And allured him still onward, a lonely star.

With glorious promise the star had beamed
On his destiny, while his eyes still gleamed
With the fire of youth. With what fervor and pride,

He had hoped for and followed his future—
his bride!
Now feeble and dim it illumines as before,
His path, by the painful and rocky seashore.

There he pauses and marks the fierce waves play,

And break on the shingle in helpless spray.
But what have the billows cast on the strand?
A lily, plucked from a pallid dead hand.
The emblem of one who was pure and fair;
Say, why is this old man bowed in despair?

Fishing in the Arctic.

Wherever there is a level field of this season's ice, inclosed by lines of hummocks, the fish are sure to be plenty. Such a field as this, about half a mile long, practically afforded a living to most of the people in the village during the season of 1883, because that year the ice was very unfavorable for sealing, and food was very scarce in the village. The fishing is carried on mostly by the women and children, though one or two old men generally go out, and one or two of the younger men, when they cannot go sealing and food is wanted at the house, will join the fishing party.

Each fisherman is provided with a long-handled ice pick, which he frequently leaves sticking in the snow near the fishing ground, a long line made of stripes of whalebone, reeled lengthwise on a slender wooden shuttle about 18 inches long, and provided with a copper sinker and two pear-shaped "jigs" of walrus ivory, armed with four barbless hooks of copper, and a scoop or dipper made of reindeer antlers, with a wooden handle about two feet long. Hardly an Esquimaux, and especially no Esquimaux boy, stirs out of the house in winter without one of these scoops in his hand. To every party of two or three there will also be a good-sized bag of sealskin, generally made of a piece of an old kavak cover, for bringing home the fish. Arriving at the fishing grounds each proceeds to pick a hole through the ice, which is about four feet thick, clearing out the chips with the scoop. The "jigs" are then let down through the hole and enough line unreels to keep them just clear of the bottom, where the fish are playing about. The reel is held in the right hand and serves as a short rod, while the scoop is held in the left hand and used to keep the hole clear of the scum of new ice, which, of course, is constantly forming. The line is kept in constant motion, jerked up quickly a short distance and then allowed to drop back, so that the little fish that are nosing about the white "jigs," after the manner of codfish, are hooked about the jaw or in the belly.

As soon as the fisherman feels a fish on his hook he catches up a bight of the line with his scoop and another below this with his reel, and thus reels up the line on these two sticks on loose coils until the fish is brought to the surface, when a skillful toss throws him off the barbless hook on the ice, where he gives one convulsive flap and instantly freezes solid. The elastic whalebone line is thrown off the sticks without tangling and paid out through the hole again for another trial. If fish are not found plenty at the first hole the fisherman shifts his ground until he "strikes a school." They are sometimes so plenty that they may be caught as fast as they can be hauled up. One woman will bring in upward of a bushel of little fish—they are generally about five or six inches long—from a single day's fishing. This fishing lasts until the middle of May, when the ice begins to soften. A good many are also caught along the shore in November in about a foot of water, when there are no tide cracks in the ice. At this season the Esquimaux use a little rod about two feet long, with a short line and a little ivory squid, at which the fish bite.—Forest and Stream.

The cost of producing bananas is little, as a bunch weighing fifty pounds requires as a total outlay for clearing, purchase of land, and every other expense necessary, even to boxing for the market, the small sum of 53 cents—the result of an actual test in the island of Trinidad. When one considers that the productiveness of the banana is 42 times that of the potato and 131 times that of wheat, and that when once planted it needs little care, the profits of the industry will be readily seen.

The discovery of an enormous under-ground reservoir of water in the midst of Sahara desert will undoubtedly develop trade and travel throughout that region. Explorations have shown that there are large portions of the Sahara which are really capable of cultivation, and after a time it will doubtless be as completely effaced from the map as has been the great American desert.

In the Dark.

Did you ever try to find a match in the dark? You know the box is on the mantel and place your hand with confidence on the spot where you think it stands. Down goes a piece of bric-a-brac to the floor. More care is used. You find the end of the mantel and run your hand along the marble slab. Off goes a vase or two. You strike the clock; you've got it. No, it's on the other side. Not there! Ah, then it's on the table. After running against the stove and tripping over the chair, you find—the sofa. Keep cool and take your bearings. The table is north of the sofa, and the sofa runs east and west; north, therefore, is in front of you. Now you have it. That article that dropped to the floor sounded like the match safe. But it's the ink well, and your fingers are dyed with a color warranted not to fade. A bright idea—the stove! You burn your fingers, and warp your patience, but you secure a light. And the match safe? It is on the mantel piece in front of the clock—the only place you didn't search.

Language of the Brutes.

It is announced as a new discovery that monkeys have a language of their own, vocal sounds to each of which an idea is attached. That is nothing new. Every observant farmer's boy knows that the cat-bird talks, and the crow and nearly every other animal, and it does not take much study to learn what each means by its words. You know what they say for "come," for "get out," for "here is something good to eat," for "run, there is danger," for "I'm hungry." "Cluck, cluck," says the mother hen, and every chickling will run full tilt to get the bug or crumb which she says she has. Then "chir-r-r," and the chicks will scoot under the bushes. Hunters used to call the moose and the deer and the wolf. The stag moose required two kinds of invitation—first, the call of his mate, which would bring him toward the hunter, but not near enough for a shot, and then the challenge of his rival, which would bring him with a plunging charge. To say that Simians talk is nothing new. Everything talks that has lungs and a larynx.

The Joke Took a Turn

The best-planned jokes sometimes take an unexpected turn, as those of us who are given to making jokes have no doubt all noticed. Mrs. Dean said to a friend the other day: "I am so glad you can stay to tea; there is to be such a joke on Mr. Dean. He's always criticising my cooking. To-day his mother happened in, and I persuaded her to make some cakes. Will it not be very funny when he finds fault with the cakes and I tell him that his mother made them herself?" Half an hour later Mr. Dean remarked: "My dear, you are becoming a perfect cook. These cakes are as fine as those my mother makes."—Family Herald.

Says a Westerner: "I remember the first young lady typewritist we ever had in the office. What a stir she made. It is strange how we boys brushed up, kept our feet on the floor and stopped smoking. Not that she objected to smoking. O, no. On the contrary, she said she liked it, but we could not bring ourselves to smoke in her presence. Then, too, Smith, who was one of the book-keepers, suffered pretty badly. He had a habit of swearing outrageously every time he went to the telephone. He would go up to the instrument and yell, 'Central, give me thirty-five,' and when 'Central' kindly gave him twenty-five instead, the air in his vicinity became blue and sultry. But when the aforesaid young lady arrived all such little pleasures had to go by the board. Even the porter caught the contagion and cleaned up the office for the first time in the memory of the oldest worker within its precincts."

In olden times, if a person accused of a crime refused to plead, he was condemned to the forte peine et dure. He was stripped, taken into a dungeon and laid on the floor, with a sharp stone under his back. On him was laid a door, whereon were piled heavy weights, as much as he could bear, and more. The first day three morsels of bad bread were given him; the second day three draughts of stagnant water, and so until he died. If a prisoner was convicted, his estates were confiscated. To prevent this confiscation, many prisoners suffered this punishment. In this country a man called to plead to an indictment of witchcraft stood mute, and is said to have been pressed to death, at Salem, Mass., in 1692.

Those who believe in man's close kinship with the lower animals might point out that these settle their little love affairs after their own fashion—bulls by their horns, lions by their claws and teeth, wild horses by their heels—the female in the case unquestionably accepting the delicate attentions of the victor. Of course, among the more intelligent of our species, however much women may prize physical vigor in men, there are mental and moral qualities which are even more conclusive than physical attractions. Love is a matter of soul affinity first of all, though, of course, an attractive appearance may aid in the discovery of such an affinity.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEERCAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.
M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice,

SACRAMENTO.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St.

SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar
Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

RED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS.

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE NO. 41.

J. H. MIDDLEMASS.

J. H. DOLAN.

DOLAN & MIDDLEMASS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

GROCERIES,

Produce and Provisions,

Northwest Corner of Seventh and N Streets,
SACRAMENTO.

GOODS SOLD AT LOWEST PRICES.

TELEPHONE 248.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & CO.

410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

Scraping the Pan.

We have often been told of the unalloyed bliss,
Shared alike by the simple and wise,
That has come to each one in his bright childhood days—
The making of tempting mud pies.
But it seems to me strange that the sweetest and best

In our young lives should not be forgot—
The frolic, the fun and exquisite joy
In scraping the pan or the pot.
In the long, shadowed life "what is left" is but dregs,

More bitter the older we grow;
Then we think, with a sigh, of the cake in the pan

That we scraped in the sweet long ago.
Could I from the years full of hours gone by Choose one to live over again,
I would take that dear hour from my childhood's best days

On mother's old kitchen floor, when,
After waiting so long, with a hungering taste,
At last, with a goodness benign,
The old ebony cook put the cake in to bake,
And the pan, all unscraped, then was mine.

An Old Story that Has a Moral Even in These Days.

It happened at Athens, during a public presentation of a play in honor of the commonwealth, that an old man came too late for a place suitable to his age and quality. Some of the young men, who observed the difficulty and confusion he was in, made signs to him that they would accommodate him if he came where they sat. The old man hustled through the crowd accordingly for the seat proffered him. But when he came to the seats to which he was invited the jest was to close and expose him as he stood out of countenance before the audience. The frolic went round all the Athenian benches.

But on these occasions there were also particular places assigned to foreigners. So, when the old man skulked toward the boxes appointed for the Lacedemonians, that honest people, more virtuous than polite, rose all to a man and, with the greatest respect, received him amongst them. The Athenians, being suddenly touched with a sense of Spartan virtue and their own degeneracy, gave a loud applause of admiration.

Then the old man, as soon as the noise subsided, cried out: "The Athenians understand what is good, but the Lacedemonians practice it."

Dr. Glass, of Poplar Bluff, one of the "stand-bys" of the Methodist Conference, who has officiated at the birth, baptism, marriage and final exit of more men and women under 30 years of age than any reverend doctor in Southeast Missouri, tells a good story on an old brother preacher up at Granby. On one occasion this old brother was called on to conclude the doctor's sermon. His theology was a little "off" so was his grammar, but his earnestness, piety and purity of heart were undoubted. He could run the gamut in a single sentence, from double bass to pianissimo shrieks, and to preserve the cadence of his periods he used the "holy grunt." He never, in the course of his long and useful life, perpetrated an intentional pun, yet the one he got off in Granby church has made him famous. "Yes," concluded the old brother, "yes, my beloved brothers and sisters, for forty-five years I have lived on the Lord's side, ah, and now, ah, I have got one foot in the grave, ah, and the other is all but, ah." To this day he cannot account for the smile that rippled over the faces of his congregation at the comical picture his peculiar speech conjured up, of an old gentleman living on the Lord's side, with one foot in the grave and the other all butter.

"Please, sir, may I take your picture?" The speaker was a little girl of a dozen summers on the deck of the Servia Monay afternoon, says the New York Advertiser. She had a toy camera. "How shall I stand?" asked Prince George. "Stand just as you are," answered the happy maiden. She snapped her camera. There will be many prints of that amateur photograph. Passengers say that the Prince is fond of children, but as bashful as he is big. They smile at newspaper stories about his heroism in "calming the fears of the ladies" after the accident. "He didn't look at a lady on board," said one, "and while he wasn't nervous, he was as retiring as ever after the trouble. He is not graceful yet, though he may be later in life. His table manners are not exact, and he eats with more energy than is customary among well-bred Americans or Englishmen. His speech is entirely without accent."

It is believed in Philadelphia that the only one of the original continental flags in existence is in the possession of the City Troop of that city. The old flag is spread between two large pieces of plate glass which keep the air away from it. The probabilities are that were it removed from this case it would fall to pieces. In design it is somewhat similar to the English jack. The design was made by a committee, of which Benjamin Franklin was a member, in 1776. A few years later the first American standard accepted by Congress was submitted and adopted.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,
Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE	Assets.
Aetna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

SADDLE ROCK
Restaurant and Oyster House1019 SECOND STREET,
Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

JUST RECEIVED.A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES
AND CARD CASES, OF THE
LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND JEWELRY.

UNCLE IKE'S, 302 K STREET, SACRAMENTO.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers In

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,
SACRAMENTO, CAL.Felter, Son & Co.OFFER TO THE TRADE, IN QUANTITIES TO suit, a full and complete line of choiceWines, Liquors & Cigars,

Including the Celebrated

GOLD CROWN and DELMONICO

KENTUCKY WHISKIES.

At the Old Stand, 1006-1008 Second Street,
SACRAMENTO.Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS
LAGER BEERWISSEMAN'S SALOON,
Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE
(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors
and Cigars.ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. DODDY, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jy18-St

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting:

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. je27-9t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of George H. Appel, an insolvent debtor. George H. Appel, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said George H. Appel is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at one o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, June 30th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,

Judge of the Superior Court.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. jy4-St

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of N. IRWIN, an insolvent debtor.—N. Irwin having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said N. Irwin is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said N. Irwin, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 7th day of August, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

W. C. VAN FLEET,

Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated June 29th, 1891.

JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. jy4-St

J. FRANK CLARK,UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County

Coroner. Telephone 134.

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. SCHACHT,

DEALER IN

FAMILY GROCERIES

Provisions, Flour,

Wines, Liquors, Cigars, Tobacco

Southeast Corner Second and M Sts.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

C. T. MILLIKIN,

DENTIST,

1008 Eighth Street, Between J and K,

Over Dr. W. A. Hughson's office.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS.

Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER.

Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,

920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,

630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW

Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Harrison at Cape May.

Harrison may be boss of the nation, but he isn't boss of his own home. He is a very tractable boarder at the seaside capital, who takes three meals a day and dares not protest if he should find a hair in the butter. The President is getting a waist like a pie-woman, and his views upon men and measures are expanding like the ripples upon a still pond into which a stone has been tossed.

Newspaper men are particular ogres in the Harrison household. Mrs. President is especially opposed to them. She never misses an opportunity to freeze or snub them. Hot water is her remedy for the intruding interviewer, although this has not yet been tried. Candidly, the family have some reason for this aversion, but not to the extent that they show it. Sitting on the portico of the Presidential home a few days ago chatting with a male member of the family, the question of newspaper annoyances to the Harrisons came up. The mention of the subject seemed to arouse the entire household.

"One of the papers says that the President walks along the beach with a suspicious-looking article sticking from his coat-tail pocket, intimating that he carries a flask and takes sly nips," remarked one of the gentlemen. "Now, the President has not seen that article yet, but he will go as far as the Presbyterian Catechism will permit in denouncing that story. If the President desires to take a drink he does not go behind the door; nor need he seek a secluded spot on the beach. He has plenty of good liquor in his house, and he drinks when he feels like it."

Then the party recited a list of the wrongs that the family had been subjected to. It would seem that two years in office has not yet hardened the Presidential hide; and just so long as petticoat government is to run the White House the hide will remain soft and the critics' and cartoonists' shafts will wound deeply.

The bent of the Presidential mind at this juncture seems to be toward achieving some wonderful feat that will cause the country to rise up and call him blessed. The President is playing for an encore, and he is willing to repeat his performances if the people will only call him. At the present time the relations between the President and Secretary Blaine are the most cordial. If Blaine should become a full-fledged candidate, and Harrison could be assured that his Secretary seeks to succeed him, then Mr. Blaine would incur the full measure of the Harrison hate—sisters, cousins and aunts. While D. O. Mills, the wealthy New Yorker, was at the Harrison home on Wednesday last he asked the President as to Mr. Blaine's real condition.

"I really do not know," replied the President. "I have given Mr. Blaine a vacation, in all that a relaxation from cares implies, and he is not to report for duty until September. The matter is thoroughly understood between us."

This was said in a most kindly manner. The President then gave Mr. Mills to understand that he was at work on reciprocity, Behring Sea, seal killing and many other subjects, the details of which would naturally go to the State Department. As Mr. Mills has many thousands of dollars tied up in the American Commercial Company, along with Hon. Sealskin Elkins, Tom Platt and other Republican leaders, he naturally sought the fountain-head of the Government to lay before him a list of grievances.

While the President was swinging around the circle last spring Mills, Elkins & Co. tried to coerce Blaine into their way of thinking about the seals. Harrison served notice on them that he was the person to be consulted, and if seals could be traded for second-term support, Barkis might be willing. It was to protect his millions that D. O. Mills came to the shore.

Early Cantalever Bridges.

The first number of Engineering, a new monthly magazine published in New York, contains a very interesting article on the great Forth Bridge by Thomas Curtis Clarke.

The cantalever bridge has been so much discussed and written about since the completion of the Forth bridge that it seems like an old idea in engineering, but Mr. Clarke states that when the Forth bridge was begun in 1881 there were only two cantalever bridges in existence, one of them carrying the Cincinnati Southern railroad across the Kentucky river, and the other spanning the River Warthe, at Posen, in Germany. Both of these were built in 1876.

The Forth bridge was built between 1881 and 1890, and during that interval nine other cantalever bridges were constructed, six of them in the United States.

Some people find it hard, in using the telephone, to realize that they are not face to face with the person they are addressing. A prominent merchant in the capital city of a State sat at his desk one hot day in July. In order to secure some degree of comfort he had taken off his coat and his collar and necktie. A clerk came into the room. "His Excellency, the Governor, wishes to speak with you through the telephone," said the clerk. "The Governor! Dear me!" said the merchant. He rose, hastily put on his collar, his necktie and his coat, gave his hair a stroke and went to the telephone to answer the Governor's call.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

J.B. GILBERT.
JED. M. SCOTT.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.
San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

Imperial
GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,
Between Fourth and Fifth,
SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,
Book and Job Printers,
410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11 05 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8 10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4 20 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7 00 P
7.00 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7 40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9 35 A
11.50 P	Second Class, Ogden and East	2 25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5 25 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10 30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10 30 A
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	4 00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11 25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12 30 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11 05 A
5.00 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10 40 A
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8 10 P
*10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	26.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2 50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2 50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9 35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11 05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8 10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7 00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9 35 A
11.50 P	Truckee and Reno	2 25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5 25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2 30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8 10 A
3.05 P	Vallejo	8 10 P
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2 40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1891.

No. 25.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

"What mighty contests rise from trivial things."

Seemingly with more propriety this single line could have been dropped by Pope from his "Rape of the Lock" and made an appropriate gift as a text upon which writers present and future could base their articles concerning the condition of things that exist in Sacramento. That Alexander Pope will be excused is that he died in 1744. The estimate of history is that he was one of acumen and magnanimity. Doubtless, therefore, it would be, were he now in life, in position to view the acts and non-acts of the Sacramento Trustees, the local society for general and specific reformation, and the various other organized evils; to hear the speeches made in our public meetings and to read the press contests and the multitude of "Public Echoes"—he would have made us a donation of the sentiment, authorized its inscription in the marble archway at the entrance of the city hall—and left town.

Mighty contests reach intelligent and final adjustment elsewhere than here. As a rule, they grow not from trivial things. Therein lies the appropriateness the city should copyright this legend. We have here witnessed mighty contests as to the best manner the appetites of a species of insect known as the "cottony cushion scale bug" could be curbed. We do not recollect that the "bug" was represented at the public meetings, either by orator or special counsel; nor was he defended by editor or even an "echo." Certain it is, enough wind was blown to drive the majority of the scale bugs from the city, and enough printer's ink poured out to overwhelm the balance as completely as were the hosts of Pharaoh overwhelmed by the waters of the Red Sea. Yet we opine the "insect" did sing as did Moses on the occasion of the destruction of the Egyptians: "The depths have covered them; they sank into the bottom of the sea." There is but this difference in the parallel: in the one instance the shouts of the imperious Egyptians were stilled forever, and the persecuted survived and held their peace; in the other, the "scale bug" did not sink into the bottom of the sea, but lived to pursue the even tenor of his way; and, so far as he is concerned, the voice of his pursuer was hushed. We need hardly refer to the many other exhibitions that preceded and followed: the proposition to build a grand hotel; to maintain a strip of lawn along the street; to build various characters of factories, and, later on, to provide such means as considerations of public health demand for the perfection of a sewerage system. These and the various other propositions, unquestionably meritorious, and, in some cases, of urgent necessity, failed of accomplishment because the few, seemingly, who wished the credit of their conception crowded the others out, and there resulted a narrowment to a handful of self-admiring men. Then again, some who esteem there has been delegated to them by the people the exclusive regal function of doing all the public thinking, quite frequently, and very generally, forget that other minds, equal, and perhaps superior in capacity to their own, reflect, and in silence, and arrive at their conclusions. When a public meeting is called here the occasion is seized upon by many who will fall under the criticism of Lee: "Then he will talk—good God! how he will talk!"—and, it may be added, utterly insensible to the fact that the listeners are reminded that in truth was it said, the emptier the vessel the greater the sound.

To our mind there are two elements in this community that are of detriment: That which endeavors to do it all, and that lesser element that, parliamentarily speaking, are born objectors, and who will oppose measures manifestly right, simply for the petty satisfaction of being "off." Between them stands the great majority, whose expression is modestly given, but when given is that of sincerity, and, we might say, is of power when opportunity is afforded. What was the meaning of the vote of this people that declared they desired to pay to the police officers the compensation justly due them? That is but an instance. Cheerfully did they vote upon themselves a tax to raise money to purchase grounds for the State capitol, and for the erection of the pavilion. We venture that in expression on every measure the people will act with justice and intelligence. We hope there will come a time when the people will conclude men of broader views should be called into our municipal councils; that the business of the city will be conducted with more dignity than it has been; that there will be a shutting off of the intrusion upon the people so constantly of the narrow-minded views of one-ideaed cranks. We find men who believe the only object of the police is to prevent Chinamen from playing fan-tan; others whose hobby is against faro; others who are opposed to street railroad lines being established; others who want the assessments of everybody except themselves increased, etc.

The papers permit these persons to advertise their hobbies, and the trustees, it would seem at times, regard their vaporings as the consension of the public mind. We observe with amusement, yet regret, that an evening contemporary views the question of awnings with seriousness, and probably not being able to come to a conclusion on a question of such seriousness, announces with gravity: "This question of awnings is getting to be a serious one in the city of Sacramento, and one with which the trustees of Sacramento will grapple on next Monday. In the meantime, the columns of the Bee are open for the expressions of opinion from the people on this subject. Many of them have doubtless good suggestions to offer, and in a multitude of counsel there is wisdom."

Doubtless our contemporary will have the advantage of suggestions from a multitude who will discuss the question of awnings through the awnings they wear—their hats. It would seem in better judgment if this question is so serious its gravity should have been discovered before our business streets were placed in a situation of disfigurement. Now, when we are half-way through, the question presents itself in three phases: Shall they all come down? shall those demolished be rebuilt? or shall the matter remain in statu quo until the editor has an opportunity to make up his mind? Were we in business, and had our awning up in this roasting weather, we would say, "let it stay," for we observe men are as other animals, seekers for comfort, and will stand and talk under shelter from the rays of the sun; likewise that rule will apply on rainy days. The advantage the merchant with an awning has is, that those who want to keep cool in summer and dry in winter will loiter under the shelter his canopy affords. There may be, however, awningless merchants who will esteem that a man afraid of sun stroke or fearful of a drenching will seek shelter in his store and await there till the clouds roll by or till the sun goes down. Others there are who believe in variety, who like the shine and the shadow, the wet and the dry. The proof-reader of our contemporary will perhaps be the only man who will be able to found a judgment on this serious question; he alone of all is compelled by sheer virtue of his employment to read all that goes into the paper. We await his judgment; trust he may survive to render it.

By this time next year the great political parties will be arrayed against each other in the national Presidential contest. The party leaders will have been chosen and the fury of political party war raging. It is natural for the American citizen to take an active interest in politics. The great majority are actuated by patriotism and love of country, as well as principle. Devotion to the party tenets on the broad idea of principle is the prevailing sentiment with the loyal partizan, no matter to which of the great political armies he belongs. There are, however, very many who care little for the principles of party, and who are only devoted to their respective party for the sole purpose of gratifying personal ambition, greed of office, or malice toward some individual or individuals. Occasionally two or more of these motives are combined and control the actions of such men. There can be no objection to the legitimate acts of an ambitious man, in seeking advancement through the medium of politics. If he is patriotic and honest and devoted to the principles of his party, such ambition is commendable.

When men assume devotion to political organizations for personal ends, without principle, such men are the cause of the wreck of parties—national, State and municipal. We always find the selfish individual who enters politics for his own gain allying himself with the dominant party. When his true character is detected, this political pirate at once becomes a reformer and drifts into some "independent" or "people's" movement. In some localities they are called "Citizens'" parties, or "Union" or "Labor" reforms, and various other titles. It might be put down as an invariable rule that all these so-called reform elements spring from disgruntled office-seekers, and are as invariably prostituted into foisting the most dangerous and unprincipled men into the administration of the affairs of government, particularly in municipal affairs. Occasionally these elements secure control of the administration of States.

All true Republicans who have the interests of the party at heart, and who are actuated by the higher, purer motives, believe as patriots and citizens that the principles of the party are right. The party should never be used in the interest of unscrupulous men who seek to direct its policy for the gratification of personal ambition or the control of patronage for unholy purposes. There must be leaders in the nation, leaders in the States, leaders in the counties and cities. This is always recognized as necessary to a proper organization, but it does not follow that these leaders should be men who hold the honored places for selfish ends, or who barter and sell the rights to political preferment. We believe in according the workers in the ranks of the party, as well as those who head the organizations, due and proper consideration. They are entitled to a voice in the councils of the party, but not to the ownership. It is only when some individuals, who have been accorded the right to lead and direct, undertake to exercise absolute ownership over the offices and patronage, that the call of "halt" should be made by the rank and file. From such acts the disgruntled and disappointed political pirate gets his capital and stock in trade for "citizens' movements, etc. We must confess that there is frequently such stupid mismanagement on the part of the "leaders," that there is just the shadow of excuse for "new departures." In reality, there never should be sufficient cause to abandon the grand old party for these side-shows; it is strong enough and grand enough to purify itself at any and all times.

As the great national contest approaches, we are called upon to get our political house in order. It is high time the plan of organization should be put into active operation. Our "friends," the enemy, are always organized. No political party since the formation of the government has maintained such an organization as the Democratic party. On the other hand, the Republicans have, as a rule, depended upon their strength and principles without a thorough organization. While this power has carried the Republican banners to victory in many contests, it is apparent that a system of organization would insure success. It is not policy, nor politics, to wait until the bugle sounds the charge, to get our forces in line.

The Union League Club, recently organized in this city, is a step in the right direction, if carried out in the manner originally intended. It was not the purpose to make it a mere campaign or ward club. The idea that prompted the projectors of the plan was, and is, to make this League a central point, from whence information can be furnished to other organizations throughout the State. The members are expected to be patriotic, unselfish, and devoted to the cause for the sake of the cause. Let the executive committee of the League at once proceed to put the Republican house in order for the campaign of 1892.

Where is the strength and safety of a people? Is it in their multitude? Look at Europe, and behold the million the sport of the few; look at the nations and races trampled by a tithe of their numbers in the dust; look at the myriad slaves whom a thousand tyrants and taskmen scourge in the fields and camps and dungeons. The strength of a people is not alone in the multitudes. Is it in the power of revolutions and massacres?—or in the bayonets they can fling to the gleam of the sun? Did bayonets save Rome? Did they save Poland and Hungary and Germany to the people? The strength and safety of a people lie in their knowledge of their rights, and their union in defense of them. Ignorant and disunited, the greater the danger of the people; they fall upon and destroy themselves; in their hands bayonets become suicidal. Give a people a true knowledge of themselves and no power can oppose them. Liberty comes with intelligence, and the unarmed intelligent millions are stronger than ignorant armed millions. The strength of the American people lies least in the number of their cannon and most in their school-houses, newspapers and their books. These are indestructible weapons to which age adds knowledge and might; and armed with these we are safer and stronger than soils bristling with murderous steel; armed with these, millions lean together and strike mightily, but bloodlessly, as one man, through the ballot-box—

—“a weapon surer yet
And mightier than the bayonet;
A weapon that comes down as still
As snowflakes fall upon the sod,
And executes a freeman's will,
As lightnings do the will of God.”

Russia has a population of nearly 120,000,000 human beings, under the absolutely despotic control of one man—all loyally devoted to him, with the exception of a few nihilists, who would be unable to avoid military service if called upon. One-sixth of the number are capable of bearing arms and could be pressed, more or less efficiently, into the military and naval service, including reserves. To this should be added the fighting component of 40,000,000 of French people, who have a large money power, that Russia lacks, and which would be found of even greater service than the Gallic troops, money being the sinews of war. Russia could also count on effective aid from the Balkan States—Servia, Roumania and Bulgaria—making a grand total of not far below 30,000,000 persons available for fighting material. This is the hypothetical partnership to be arrayed against the Dreibund and the other nations above named. The question is whether Germany, Austria-Hungary and Italy, with the possible help of Great Britain, would be able to withstand the shock without the disintegration of one and all. Would not the consequences include a regaining by France of the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine (now Elsass and Lothringen), a sweeping of Turkey from the map of Europe following a Russian capture of Constantinople, the appropriation of Italy by France and Greece by Russia, and the abolition of England's power in North Africa, with a menace of its hold in Asia, following an absolute Muscovite control of the Mediterranean? Might not the present neutrality of Belgium be wiped out by giving to France the whole area northward down to and including Holland, with a reaching forth by Russia on the western shore of the continent, so that Spain and Portugal would present the only break in the domination of the whole seacoast line of continental Europe by Russia and France? Perhaps this is not the exact plan on which the map of that quarter of the world would be remodeled, and yet no one can say that a complete victory of the latter powers would stop short of that. And then: After the Dreibund and its allies had been laid prostrate under the dual heel of the conqueror and mangled out of recognition by their former selves, what would prevent the greater tyrant from turning upon the less and verifying the prediction of Napoleon that all Europe would be (either republican or) Cossack?

He Wasn't In It.

They built a fine church at his very door—
He wasn't in it;
They brought him a scheme for relieving the poor—
He wasn't in it.
Let them work for themselves as he had done,
They wouldn't ask help of any one
If they hadn't wasted each golden minute—
He wasn't in it.
So he passed the poor with laughly tread—
He wasn't in it.
And he scorned the good with averted head—
He wasn't in it.
When men in the halls of virtue met
He saw their goodness without regret;
Too high the mark for him to win it—
He wasn't in it.
A carriage crept down the street one day—
He was in it.
The funeral trappings made a display—
He was in it.
St. Peter received him with book and bell,
“My friend you have purchased a ticket to—well,
Your elevator goes down in a minute.”
He was in it.

—[Mrs. M. L. Rayne in Detroit Free Press.

MY BESS.

“Storms? Why, bless your heart, I was lighthouse keeper of the Galley Head. You know where that is, sir?”
“On the coast of Ireland—between Queenstown and Cape Clear?” I asked.
“Right you are, sir. Well, as I was saying, I was keeper of the Galley Head lighthouse nigh on 15 years, and if I didn't see storms during that time, the Lord protect those who do.”
“And many wrecks, of course, on such a dangerous coast?” I asked.
“Ay, and many wrecks,” he dreamily answered.
And I could see his thoughts were busy with the past.
“You must have been glad when you were able to give up your duties as lightsman and come to live in this pleasant little home,” I suggested.
“No, sir,” he replied. “I was sorry to leave the old Galley Head. You see, I felt bound to it in a sort of way, for my greatest sorrow and greatest joy had come to me while there. Perhaps, if I tell you of both, sir, you will better understand my affection for the wild, barren place.”
“When I was made keeper of the lighthouse I brought my wife and daughter there with me. Bess—that was my girl's name—was then 17, and a handsomer lass—heaven bless her!—wasn't to be seen in all the country round. She had eyes and hair as dark as night—like a raven's wing,” the artists who came occasionally to paint our scenery used to say. “Curse them!” he said, rising suddenly, while a fearful passion overspread his face. “'Twas through one of the sort that our trouble came to us.”

After a few moments he sat down again and went on more quietly:
“Bess had always been so happy and content with her mother and me till that fellow came. He wanted to take a picture of the Galley Head during a storm, and he boarded in our simple household for a week, or perhaps more; and to think that the wife and I never saw the way things were going; that he was stealing from us our treasure, the light and joy of our lives, under our very eyes! Now that I look back on it I can see the change that came over Bess during that time; how she would flush and start when spoken to; and in the evening she sat on my knee and clung round my neck like a frightened child. Once she took my breath away by bursting out crying. But at the time I only thought the girl wasn't well, and a suspicion of the real danger never entered my head. If it had, so sure as there's a sky above us, I would have killed the man there and then. But I did not think the world held a villain black enough to steal my little one from me.

“The morning when the blow fell on the poor wife and me is one that I can hardly speak of now. It was the usual thing—a little tear-stained note pinned to her pillow. She had gone with the man she loved.

“Oh, father and mother! never think kindly of me; hate me—despise me, for that is all I'm worth!”

The old man stopped, choked with tears; then brushed his hand roughly across his eyes and went on:

“That was all, sir. And when I heard it I went mad—as mad as any man in an asylum; and I swore never to lift a hand to save her or bring her back; and for three long years I lived a soured, bittered man, to whom no one hardly dared to speak. The dear wife—well, heaven alone knows what she went through with me; and her's was the hardest part to bear, for, man-like, I selfishly hugged my sorrow to myself; and, woman like, she tried to stifle her own bitter pain and comfort me.

“And so we lived, as I say, for three long years, and then came the night in February when the Firefly was lost on the rocks near the Galley Head. She was a large American ship, and it seemed as if all the demons of the storm were behind her lashing her to her doom. On she came, a dark object in the night, a helpless mass swaying and crashing at the mercy of the furious gale. We stood with the lifeboat ready to launch, we men, waiting for her to strike. And strike she did, with a crash which must have stove in her bow as if it were so much glass. Then we were off, pulling in the teeth of the worst storm we ever encountered.

“It was terrible work, and before we could reach the ship she sank with all on board.

“With a heavy heart we put the boat about, heading toward the shore again, and then something flashed past me and I grasped a woman's floating hair.

“We brought her to our little home, and there, by the light of our one small lamp, I recognized my Bess! Yes; she was my Bess again the moment I saw her—not the tired, sin stained woman, but my little baby girl, clinging with soft, chubby hands to her father's forefinger.

“How that time came back to me as I looked at her. It seemed as if her childhood was crying out to me to be kind to my baby now she was a woman and in need of her father's care. But my heart was yearning already over my girl, and between us my wife and I nursed her back to life.

“Her story of the past three years was soon told. The villain had taken her to the city and deserted her six month afterward. She had striven to make a living where the man left her, and succeeded in keeping life in herself honestly for two years and a half, and in the end had starved herself to save the price of her passage home in the Firefly.

“And where is my girl now, sir, you want to know?” the old man asked, smilingly. “Look out of that window; there comes my Bess, with her husband and two children, to spend the evening with the old folks. A happier wife and mother never lived. It you wait and take a cup of tea with us, sir, you can judge for yourself.”

Poe's weird and dreadful story of revenge, “The Cask of Amontillado,” is recalled by the murder of an unfortunate creditor at the Mexican village with the peaceful name of San Rafael. With the true virtuoso spirit of the Italian nobleman of Poe's story, the Mexican villager persuaded his victim to help him in cleaning his well, and as soon as he reached the bottom rolled stones upon him till he was buried alive. The grimness of the tale is made more ghastly still by the discovery of the murder through the innocent prattling of the murderer's little girl. “Why don't you get water from your father's well?” the neighbors asked her. “Because my papa has a man buried in the well,” was the guileless answer.

A short time ago an old negro was up before a Judge charged with some trivial offense. “Haven't you a lawyer, old man?” inquired the Judge. “No, sah.” “Can't you get one?” “No, sah.” “Don't you want one to defend you?” “No, sah, I jes tho't I'd leab de case to the ignance ob de co't.”

Dr. Nardyz, a Pittsburg physician, is at work upon an immense papier mache model of the human heart for exhibition at the World's Fair. It will be three feet in diameter.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

"Don't you think the baritone's voice has unusually fine timbre?" "Yes; some chords of it."

Prompter (rushing in excitedly)—"Wingley, the supe, has eloped this minute with all the unparalleled 'Blue Hussar' jewels, the costly set of 'Cleopatra' diamonds and King Solomon's best crown." Manager (sternly)—"It was your place to guard the jewel chest, Antonio. I shall have to deduct seven-and-six-pence from your next week's salary."—Tidbits.

Miss Sybil Sanderson still continues to add success to her operatic career. She is having immense success at Aix-les-Bains. After singing in Manon Saturday night she received a visit from the King of Greece, who expressed his sincere admiration for her talent and beauty. He remained chatting with her for over an hour. Many Americans were in Aix to hear Miss Sanderson in Manon, including the McLanes, General and Mrs. Winslow, the Bristows, Eades and Ames.

"Old Pop" Reed is dead. Theatrical people the world over will mourn his loss. He was a friend to them all. For nearly 65 years the old gentleman had been connected with the theaters of Philadelphia. Many of the greatest stars this generation has known were close friends of his, and to him many more owe their first appearance on the stage. John Roland Reed was born in Philadelphia 83 years ago, and died at his home in that city July 28th, in the presence of his family, after a long and severe illness. "Pop" Reed was veritably the "oldest inhabitant" of the theatrical world in Philadelphia, and, sure enough, a picturesque character he was, too. To hear him talk of old-time plays and players was a treat. He had a fund of knowledge, an excellent memory, and genuine wit. He entered the Walnut-street Theater in 1824, when that historic play-house was little better than a barn, and the performances given therein were much like the circus of to-day. His sole duty was to keep the whale-oil lamps in good order. Later on, about 1865, John Sleeper Clarke and Edwin Booth bought the rickety old barn-theater-circus, and transformed it into a regular play-house. John Reed was continued as captain of the supers, which position he held for nearly fifty years, taking minor parts and otherwise assisting in the performances. On January 30, 1879, he celebrated his golden wedding, and every attaché of the Walnut-street Theater and many prominent actors sent valuable tokens of esteem to the then hale and hearty old man. John S. Clarke presented him with a handsome gold medal at the expiration of his fifty-third year in the service of the Walnut street Theater. A magnificent gold cane was presented to him on his 80th birthday, on July 30, 1888, at Willamere, where he spent the day. These and many other valuable gifts had been carefully preserved by Mr. Reed, and it was one of his chief delights to show them to his friends. He had lived in the old-fashioned house, No. 257 Chester street, with his wife and family for 60 years, and would never consent to leave it. Many stories, quaint and queer, have been told of and by "Pop" Reed. He delighted to tell of Stokley, a slack-rope performer who actually hung himself nightly for a consideration of $25 a week, and of an American boy, Charley Forrester, a chum of Reed's, who outdid Stokley for half the money. One of the old gentleman's chief duties, he claimed, was to supply live babies to the Walnut-street Theater. He had thirteen of his own, and was wont to bring the whole collection to the play-house nightly, and the players took their choice. In an interview, recently, the old gentleman said: "Ned Forrest was the greatest actor of them all. The elder Booth could act when he would, but oftentimes he wouldn't. I mind one time he was starring Richard III on the road. He drank a bit too much and went away. The boys closed up the theater and instituted a hunt for him. He was found ten miles up the country chasing imaginary bull-frogs with a hammerless gun. A big fellow named Flynn got into a dispute with the actor and broke his nose. Oh! but he was an actor. Young Ned (Edwin Booth) isn't to be compared with him. Now, there was Wilkes. He was an actor, but, like the elder Booth, he was as crazy as a bedbug. He often told me he would startle the world, and he did. I often fenced with Forrester. One night I wore a new wig that nigh blinded me. I could not strike at Forrester at all. This angered him. He seized me by the throat and literally carried me to the front of the stage by the neck. I thought my last hour on earth had come; the audience thought it a great bit of acting, and nearly yelled the roof off of the house. The enraged actor flung me bodily behind the scenes, and after the act demanded an explanation. I told him of the wig. He threatened to flay me alive if ever I put foot on the stage again wearing a wig, and I never wore one." All of the old gentleman's children are or were in some way connected with the stage. His favorite child, Roland Reed, is the well-known comedian who has taken the late John T. Raymond's place on the American stage.

Book Chat.

Now Mr. Edgar Saltus will be able to write a realistic novel from experience descriptive of the sensation of having a divorce granted against him for the scriptural reason.

Sir Charles Dilke has deposited his collection of Keats relics, including books of holograph poems and notes, letters to and from, and other matter, in the Chelsea public library.

Goethe's love letters may be dear at $37,500, but plenty of American writers of this kind of literature have been compelled to pay more than this for their own love-letters, and even then did not have to die before the courts placed a high value on their effusions.

A nightingale sings nightly over the tomb of the poet Hallz. Even a poet might well be willing to die for the sake of so sweet a memorial. It is to be hoped that no enterprising tourist will try to put Persian powder on this songster's tail and sell him to a museum.

The report that Florence Nightingale refused $1,000 for a short article on hospital work will not deter a thousand or more less melodious writers from going right ahead. It will then come to pass that more than ever will the editors want information about the hospitals.

The poems of Emily Dickinson, the Amherst recluse, whom Andrew Lang calls "a poet who had constructed her own individual 'Ars Poetica,'" continue in active demand, the eighth American edition being already in preparation. An Arabic translation made in Syria has passed through several editions.

An interview with Mr. Howells concerning his own works makes him speak of "A Modern Instance" as "my best work and most artistic." This is an evidence of the inability of an author to judge of his own works correctly. The book he refers to is among his dreariest, having neither the delicate sentiment of his earliest books nor the strong grasp of modern life shown in "A Hazard of New Fortunes." Even on Mr. Howells' threadbare and barren theory that art consists of photographic accuracy of details, the story makes the blunder of sending a party of travelers from Pittsburg to Columbus down the beautiful Ohio valley immediately after leaving Pittsburg. To the ordinary author this slip would be pardonable, but for one who constantly preaches the gospel of accuracy it is fatal.

An historical novelist, with the greatness of Scott, would not search the annals of America in vain. He needs but a thin thread of history, and it is not necessary for it to be continuous. History itself is frequently old stories and fables strung together by speculative writers, or meager facts amplified and glorified. We can never know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, about any great event or great man. Within five years after the passing away of any striking figure, fact and romance are so closely blended that it is almost impossible to sever them. Stonewall Jackson has long been more legendary than historical in this country, and he has not been dead thirty years. An American could put him in a novel and use him as effectively as Scott used Claverhouse, or as Dumas used Henry IV. Time has already done that much for him. In the same manner the figure of Lincoln stands half veiled in clouds. The legends are growing around Grant, and the mythical history of Sherman will soon mingle with the real.

The burning of Sir Richard Burton's last work, which was done by his wife immediately after his death, has caused considerable comment in England. The last two years of this distinguished writer's life were spent in translating from the Arabic "The Scented Garden," devoted to the analysis of a passion which, the experience of ages has taught, it is better not to discuss. Sir Richard said of it: "I am afraid it will make a row in England because the Arabian Nights was a baby tale in comparison to it." It was completed one night, and its author retired to rest, never to wake again. He had said of it to his wife: "This is to be your jointure; its proceeds will make you a life annuity." After his death his wife, who was left practically without means, was besieged by the publishers, who offered her six thousand guineas for the manuscript—enough to afford her a competence for life. Then began the struggle with the woman's conscience. "Out of every 1,500 men who read it," she said, "15 will probably read it in the spirit of science in which it is written, the other 1,485 will read it for filth's sake, and pass it to their friends, and the harm done may be incalculable." And yet here was represented two years of her husband's best work, that on which he rested most his scholarly fame, and his friends were clamoring for its publication. Her account of the mental contest is dramatic; how, sitting in the dark before the fire, after many tears and prayers, sorrowfully, reverently, in fear and trembling, she burnt sheet after sheet, until all was consumed. How much fanaticism was mingled with her conscientiousness, it is not for the cold and skeptical public to determine.

Professional Chat.

Rudyard Kipling says: "I write all my stories upon an empty stomach." This is even more extraordinary than Rider Haggard's story about the man who tattooed his will upon the white skin of a girl's shoulder.

During the past fifteen years the Congregational denomination lost 1,261 clergymen by death. As they averaged 68 years of age it is evident that their duties were not very wearing, and that they must have been a pretty hearty body of men. Twenty of them were more than 90 years old. It may be doubted if any another profession or occupation can furnish such a record.

A lawyer noticed that the grass around his house needed cutting, so, investing in a scythe, he approached the job. In about three minutes his back gave out, and he sat down to ponder. Tom Sawyer and the whitewash job came into his mind. "I'll do it," he exclaimed under his breath. And from that time on he sat there, and every man or boy who came along was invited to try his new scythe, and "see how easy it works." Inside of two hours the job was finished.

Bismarck is said to have succeeded in keeping peace at the Berlin Conference by insisting that any statesman who made a warlike or threatening speech should by the rules of the Conference be compelled to repeat it. Ordinary exchanges of opinion were made in a low tone of voice; the first minatory departure was the signal for silence and repetition. Only those who have tried it can realize, it is said, the awkwardness of having to make such a repetition. "To repeat a speech," says Bismarck, "gives the speaker time to be sorry."

A sunstroke is not an accident. So the United States Circuit Court in Missouri has just decided. The decision is interesting because the point was raised in a suit involving an accident-insurance policy. According to the judge, a sunstroke is no more an accident than a toothache or the measles, being "a disease of the brain arising from natural and well known causes." As the sun is undeniably natural, and as something is known about it, there is no reason to expect the Circuit Court's philosophical decision to be overthrown on appeal.

L. B. Proctor, in a recently published memoir of Curran, Thomas Addis Emmet and others, gives the following description of a scene in the United States Supreme Court, in which Emmet paid a beautiful tribute to American judges. During Emmet's early practice at the American bar he found it impossible to divest himself of the manner and habits of the Irish bar. This was particularly the case in addressing the judges, whom, in conformity with the practice in his own country, he often addressed as "my lords," instead of "your honors," according to the American custom. On one occasion, in an argument before the United States Supreme Court, Chief Justice Marshall presiding, he said, "And now, my lords, I will attempt to answer the argument of my distinguished opponent." Mr. Webster, who was opposed to him, courteously said, "The eminent gentleman forgets that we have no titled aristocracy in this country, and no lords sit on the American bench." "I am happy to be thus reminded of that," said Emmet. "And yet," he continued, "all American judges before whom I have had the honor to stand, if they do not in reality have the title of 'my lords' bestowed upon them by subservience to an oppressive aristocracy, are by the sovereign power of a free and enlightened people, and their own virtues, learning, and purity made lords of the jurisprudence of a great nation"—Albany Law Journal.

If all the archives and histories of this Government for the past half century were burnt or destroyed, says the Washington Post, Senator William Stewart, of Nevada, could perhaps from the storehouse of his wonderful memory come as near rebuilding the records as any living man. Sitting at Chamberlin's last night he talked to a group of newspaper men of stirring epochs in the nation's life, of scenes in which he had played no unimportant part. He had started off with this remark, playfully made to a Democratic friend: "You anti-tariff men have been fighting from the inception of the Government, and while you have won in a few skirmish engagements, you have never to this day gained a battle of any real importance." Then he went on and rapidly but tersely sketched the struggles between the protectionists and their opponents from the very beginning, recalling dates and events of a past generation as readily as though happening yesterday. He was himself a Democrat till the civil strife opened, but became a Republican when the Union was imperilled. But there is a chapter of the Senator's career that few know. Few have heard how, after consulting with General Grant, then President-elect, Senator Stewart, with the General's approval, drafted the fifteenth amendment. He had a hard struggle to get it through, and stayed in his seat in the Senate almost continuously for forty-eight hours, but his persistence won the battle, and the famous amendment passed the Legislatures of the requisite number of States almost verbatim as it was penned by the man from Nevada.

NOTES.

The word "gall" as applied to a man with excessive nerve is out of use. The present style is to say that he has "a fireproof front."

The Republican party represents now, as heretofore, the conscience, the courage and convictions of American citizenship.—John J. Ingalls.

The anti-temperance bill before the Bundesrath seems to intimate that as America is drifting from whisky to beer, Germany is going the other way.

A man has been known to win a girl's heart for life, when she is getting gracefully out of a hammock, by simply turning his head the other way.

A citizen of Hannibal, Mo., the other day ate two pounds of Limburger cheese, and won a bet of $5. Since then his wife has compelled him to sleep in the smoke-house.

There is a striking resemblance between the party slogans in Iowa this year. That of the Republicans is "Cornstalks and victory." The Democrats merely substitute juice for the stalks.

The Egyptian dude of old had a great advantage of the species of the present day. In the older days an Egyptian was not permitted to borrow without giving to his creditor, in pledge, the body of his father. If such a law was in vogue to-day there would soon be a scarcity of men of marriageable age.

The extent or the degree of the oscillation of tall chimneys may be exactly taken by a close observation of the shadows they cast upon the ground. An instance to the point is that of a chimney 115 feet high and four feet in diameter externally at the top, near Marseilles, France, the oscillations of which were observed by the shadow during a high wind to attain a maximum of over 20 inches.

The idea that the watermelon is an unwholesome fruit is one of the mistakes of the age. There is nothing in a good ripe watermelon save the seed that cannot be partaken of by the majority, not only with impunity, but with positive benefit. There may be individuals with whom melons do not agree, but the number is comparatively small. If one listens to all the wiseacres and croakers have to say about eating, the world would have to starve, and then not be sure it was doing a safe thing.

Says the New York Sun: "The total vote of the city of New York in the presidential election of 1880 was 204,000. In the presidential election of 1884 it was 226,000. In the presidential election of 1888 it was 278,000, and there is not the slightest reason to doubt that, at the present ratio of increase of the city's population, the total vote in 1892 will exceed 300,000. At the present rate of increase, as preserved for several years past, the Democratic majority in New York city should not fall next year below 100,000, a clear third of the entire vote cast, and a total in excess of the majority given in any American community to any political party heretofore in the history of the republic." The faithful organ of Tammany Hall is inclined to take a roseate view of the strength of that organization.

At this season of the year, when there is plenty of sunshine and dry air, there is no excuse if bedding is not properly aired. The common practice of making up the beds directly after breakfast, or even before breakfast, cannot be too strongly condemned. Not only should every part of the bed be exposed to the air daily, but so far as possible, they should be exposed to the sunlight also. For this reason, as well as for others, sleeping-rooms should be on the sunny side of the house. Very few people are careful enough in putting away bed linen after ironing, to see that it has been thoroughly aired. For the damp, mouldy odor so common about linen closets there is no reason except carelessness in this particular. On clear, sunny days it is an excellent plan to hang such large pieces as sheets in the clear sunshine, because they will not otherwise be properly and thoroughly aired. They take up so much room on the clothes horse that other pieces are usually placed over them, and though they may remain there the requisite twenty-four hours, they are not fit to put away.

"Ouida," says in the North American: A few years ago nobody thought it a matter of the slightest consequence to be bitten by a healthy dog; as a veterinary surgeon has justly said, a scratch from a rusty nail or the jagged tin of a sardine box is much more truly dangerous than a dog's tooth. Yet, in the last five years the physiologists and the State, which in all countries protects them, have succeeded in so inoculating the public mind with senseless terrors that even the accidental touch of a puppy's lips or the kindly lick of his tongue throws thousands of people into an insanity of fear. Dr. Bell has justly said: "Pasteur does not cure rabies; he creates it." This is simply common sense. There is no danger in the bite of a healthy animal. Hydrophobia isn't a "terrific malady," or wouldn't be, if people would stop making a fuss about it. More people die by falling out of windows, or by stubbing their toes while out walking, or by breaking their necks on bicycles, or by choking on fish-bones at table, or by catching cold courting in the moonlight. It doesn't figure in the death reports by an appreciable percentage.

[FOR THEMIS.]

There is no isolated thing known to us in creation; everything is a part of something else. Nothing lives except by depending on some other thing. The bird eats the insect; the insect ate the leaf; the leaf fed upon the sap; the sap came from the ground; the ground drank at the clouds' lips; and so you push all things back and find that one stands on another. In this arrangement of creation we need food for every part of the body. The body was not built so that it should stay built, but so that it must be rebuilt, in part at least, every single day. The bone needs one food, the hair another, the nerve another and the muscle another; and, in analogy with this, the mind just as much demands stimulus and occupation, that should give to it the nourishment and vitality which food gives to the body. Let us see how this is in fact. We have found out one life feeds upon another. As the body feeds on nourishment of various kinds, so it is true in our experience that one soul feeds upon another. The child lives on the mother's and the father's inward life as much as upon the mother's outward. And then as children grow up they feed more broadly; they range for wider pastures; for though the sweetest food is under the parental roof, companionship begins to be sweet. And companions live on each other. They are dependent on each other for solace of feeling and flow of thought. The soul will not have solitariness; that is hunger. It loves to dwell with those congenial to it. In the ordinary and casual relations of life this is true. When men in companies interchange their thoughts, mingle their feelings, come together in social relations, they feed upon each other. Every man is rooted in somebody else; the soul is always feeling after soul. And in higher relations this, which we see is the most familiar relation, becomes yet more eminent and observable. The mind that hungers for knowledge clings to the teacher, and the pupil feeds upon the teacher's mind. The scholar seeks the scholar; they love to contrast each other's thoughts and feelings. Artists seek those who have power to kindle the artist's inward life. Every man in the higher forms of development seeks his fit companion, that his soul may feed at that companion's soul. But where natures are drawn together by affinities of disposition and by responsive affections, then this life-food, this bread which one soul is to another, becomes more apparent, for it is possible that one may find in suitable natures of thought and taste and affection and the various activities of life such a supply as shall leave nothing to be desired earthward. And it is to be remembered that the lower down upon the scale nature stands, the less it is developed, the less it is civilized, the more it seeks food for the body and from matter; while, on the other hand, the higher we rise upon the scale the more our nature is educated, the more characteristically we become men, the more we reach toward and touch the divine idea of our creation, the more do we find that our life and our life-food are in commerce with our natures; for not they are close together whose natures touch natures, but they whose thoughts clash thoughts. And this is the dividing line among men. Those whose joys are more of the senses and matter are below the middle line, while those whose joys are more of the spirit and soul are above it. And in these the supply is derived each from the other.

No Forfeitures.

People, of course, do not join a savings society with the intention of withdrawing in a few months, for every one knows that the profits are larger the longer one is in, yet a person will naturally and wisely ask how it will be if he gets sick or loses his position and is compelled to stop paying dues. In the Pacific Coast Savings Society he receives back at any time the entire monthly installments paid in, with 6 per cent. interest, and, after two years, three-fourths of all the profits credited to his shares. The withdrawal question is an all-important one. The plan as adopted by this Society is the only equitable one on the coast, as it does not discriminate against the poorer classes, or those unfortunate who, because of sickness, loss of position, or otherwise, are unable to keep up monthly installments. It is only the wealthy who can place their money beyond their reach for a year, or a term of years; consequently it is only this class who, under the forfeiture system, are benefited at the expense of those less fortunate; and this liberal feature is one of the main reasons for the large amount of Pacific Coast Saving Society stock which has been sold in the past few months.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Kaiser Wilhelm—Chilean Cruisers—The Tree Society—Summer Vacations—The New Yorkers' Inconsistency—Supper at the Seaside—Mr. Charles Proctor.

NEW YORK, August 1, 1891.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

The Emperor of Germany appears to have had a very good time in London, and to have conducted himself with stateliness, cordiality, and discretion there. Probably no other young man of the period has been so thoroughly discussed, and very few persons have coincided with the views they have taken of him. Time is on his side, however. The longer he reigns the better is the impression produced. That quality of which he has so much, known to us simple republicans as bumptiousness, is not absolutely disliked by the imperialist people over whom he rules by the claim, not of hereditary descent, but of divine right. But the real effect of the English visit remains to be seen. Already Labouchere and his fellow-liberals are making public the discontent that was felt by many people at the "absolute" way that Kaiser Wilhelm conducted himself in London, and the consequent slight to everyone not of noble birth. The question is also pertinently asked: What does France think of this visit?

The fact that the majority of the working officers of the Chilean cruisers proved to be retired officers of the British navy, when brought before the French Court of Appeals, looks as though the sympathies of England were with the presidential party in the present struggle. It is not likely that these officers would have accepted commissions under a party which the English did not favor. The fair presumption is that Great Britain, whose commercial interests in Chile are greater than those of any other nation, is desirous to see the insurrection suppressed, and to aid, as far as she can, the constitutional party, irrespective of the rights of the matter. The insurgents feel that if the presidential party is allowed to obtain aid from England and France, their cause is lost. And at present it does seem as though that aid would be forthcoming. It would be more to our interest to have the liberals win, as being more in the line of the policy enunciated by the recent Pan-American Congress.

Now and again we hear from the Tree Society declarations of confidence that the seeds they have planted will bring forth fruit—both of vegetable growth and of an intelligent public opinion. There is no doubt but that the right sentiment already exists; nobody can be found to deny that a tree by the roadside is a thing of beauty. The only question is, how shall we preserve these trees? Perhaps organized opinion may eventually accomplish something in that direction, but I should put more faith in a wise ordinance and more efficient police.

There is always plenty to bother a man who tries to enter a dissenting opinion to the orthodox mode of thought, even if it is only in the matter of a summer vacation. A friend of mine a few days ago found himself supplied with a vacation and a desire to spend it at sea. A canvas among the various steamship lines did not give much satisfaction, and he determined to engage passage on some sailing vessel—fishing boat preferred—and go back to first principles. Ballinger contained two or three pages of advertisements, each of which was just what he wanted; so with a pocketful of addresses he started out to engage passage for a week's trip. The first shipping agent he called on calmly informed him that he was not in communication with any masters of sailing vessels, notwithstanding his advertisement to that effect. The second said he would not sell a passage with a time limit of less than thirty days, to provide for calms and headwinds, although the regular duration of the passage was three days. In short, there was not a sailing master in the harbor willing to take a passenger—according to the agents. Finally the would-be sailor got "real mad" and brought pressure to bear by threatening an exposé of the matter as a false advertisement—when he found that the whole harbor was at his service. The truth of the matter lay in a nutshell: the agent is interested in preventing any direct dealings between the shipmaster and the outside world; therefore he is far from willing to have a passenger taken who might cause a diminution of his profits.

One thing that is beautifully human about New York is its inconsistency. Watch the crowd as it passes any corner not far from the City Hall. Everybody is in a hurry; men, women and boys hasten back and forth as though the affairs of the metropolis must be settled up before Lieutenant Totten's collapse of the universe takes place, in 1899. But stop! two little newsboys are climbing up a fire-escape for a penny wager. Busy men stop to look, a crowd of small boys gathers, and even the female book agent pauses in her cyclonic career. In two minutes a throng of people has gathered, and everybody is forgotten in the excitement of the climbing match. It is very evident that a great part of the burly and bustle of American life is nothing more than a bad habit.

And it is the qualification of this desire of hurry that indirectly makes the summer vacation such a necessity with us; or if not an absolute necessity, at least a good excuse. We become so heated during the day that nothing will satisfy us but a little supper at the seaside and a bath—much to the gratification of the hotel keepers. After all, one of the most "convenient" things about the city during the warm season is the nearness of such watering places as Long Branch, Rockaway, Coney Island, and the like, where it is possible to enjoy a good dinner after a hard day's work in a hot office and return home at bedtime cool and refreshed. The crowds that patronize the Manhattan and Brighton Beach hotels nightly prove how this privilege is appreciated; for, after all, there is nothing like a sea breeze to refresh a tired brain.

I recently listened to a good story about Mr. Charles Proctor, the artist. Mr. Proctor was born of rich but honest and respectable parents, and is likewise extremely clever with pencil and brush. Such a rare combination results in many orders for Mr. Proctor that do not usually fall to the lot of so young a man. He recently painted a portrait of the late lamented Mr. Fessenden that created considerable comment. The background of the picture was the face of the familiar $10 bill, reproduced with true artistic skill. The portrait was placed in the window of a Broadway store and was much admired. A couple of admirers shortly afterward called on the artist and inquired if it was really his picture. "I'm the man," said Proctor, with the hope of a big order lighting up his eye. "Then you must come with us," replied one of the gentlemen. "Where? I don't understand," stammered the artist. "We are United States detectives," replied the gentleman, "and fear your picture is a violation of the law. It is a question for the Secretary of the Treasury to decide." And then they marched the artist down to the custom-house and took the picture along. A consultation was held; then the picture was sent to Washington and another consultation was held, in which the artist's talents were recognized and discussed. It came back to New York, and a third consultation was held, with Proctor as an interested listener. Finally both were released, the former stamped "Counterfeit" in big red letters across the face of the bill. Mr. Proctor is greatly flattered by all these tributes to his genius, but will direct his efforts into other channels when he wishes to make money hereafter.

Home Decorations.

It is gratifying to observe that day by day a greater public interest is manifest in the subject of house decoration. The manufacturer may care or care not for the trivial gossip about "tying a bow on a china dog," or "how best to treat a cottage window facing the south," but the mere presence of this stuff in the daily press—waddle though it is—shows an effort to cater to the rapidly expanding public taste for things decorative. It's a pity, however, that this taste is not more logical; for many a woman is sighing to-day for whitewashed walls and pine tables, with only a few rugs on the floor, and a chair or two, simply because in her aimless gropings for the artistic she has made a junk shop of her rooms and accumulated labor that seems endless for tired hands. It is a pity that some voice cannot go forth like a thunderbolt and warn folks to have a definite object in view when "house-furnishing."

Oscar Wilde made himself the butt and ridicule of the entire press of this country when he said, about eleven years ago, that his highest ambition in life was to "live up to the sunflower;" but the idea was full of sense.

If, in furnishing, one would take only a simple flower and build up the surroundings from its color combination, one would make no mistake, for nature is infallible in her colorings.

The great trouble, though, with this "Decorative Column" business in the newspaper is that it fills a woman's head with lots of details; and by the time she has adopted a few dozen "suggestions" and picked up some "pretty cushions" and "lovely scrap-baskets" and "delightful easels" and "bric-a-brac" she has got a room that is a hodge-podge and a terror to the average servant.

In every apartment one motive should rule—repose, recreation, beauty or cheerfulness. These are prime integral qualities which should govern a room; and with the definite object of an apartment once in view the furnisher should unequivocally "live up to it."

FLASHES.

There are many very cheap people in costly garments.

Lawyers rarely ever come to blows—except from the mouth.

A calico gown often covers beauty, while silk hides deformity.

Look out for the man who smiles when he is angry; there is danger there.

A crooked and disgruntled body usually has a mind as warped and disgruntled.

There is no necessity for some people to go to the devil—he will come after them.

A little girl defines poetry to be lines which end alike, but which you don't understand.

Put life into a crucible and who can extract more innocent enjoyment out of it than a German?

A dollar placed between the eye and object sought to be obscured is often very effective—particularly in official circles.

Fashionable life is full of unrest and infelicity; idleness, luxury and opportunity are powerful enemies of domesticity.

Hot weather's conducive to bumpers of beer. It's been so since creation began, sir; For even the sun at this time of the year Is given to rushing the cancer.

The People's Banking System.

Although coöperative banks have been in operation for nearly a century they have until recently attracted the attention of the public only in a limited way; nevertheless, many of them have grown to great proportions, especially in England and Germany, and their growth is unparalleled in the history of financial operations. In the United States these societies have multiplied, until to-day there is scarcely an enterprising town of any size which has not one of them at least. Their record has been remarkable as showing a smaller percentage of failure than any class of business enterprise.

To collect from each member a fixed amount monthly; to secure these loans by first mortgage on real estate of ample value, and finally to apportion equitably between the lenders and borrowers the profits resulting from this plan of compounding monthly both interest and principal, is the mission of the true coöperative bank.

Throughout the country, and especially in the Eastern States, there are thousands of the industrial classes who save something from their monthly or weekly incomes, and thousands more who could and would do so if some investment were offered which combined safety with fair profit.

The Building and Loan and Savings Societies usually confine their operations to a single town or county; and although they have as a rule been profitable to their members, they have never for any length of time been free from one or the other of the following difficulties: A lack of funds to supply members desirous of borrowing, or a surplus of money which cannot be safely loaned. To seek and bring together these two great classes of investors and borrowers, each of which may be made to be, in the highest degree, beneficial to the other; to maintain to a nicety the equipoise between them, so that all demands for loans may be promptly satisfied, and no loss of interest incurred by idle funds, is the province of the Pacific Coast Savings Society.

The Pacific Coast Savings Society of San Francisco is organized on what is known in the Eastern States and Europe as the coöperative banking system, with all the advantages of the Permanent Building and Loan and modern Savings Bank plan combined.

The society is sound in theory and practice. Its plans are based on mathematical calculations which cannot fail, and is meeting with phenomenal success. Its officers are capable, experienced men who have in their own business been successful, and whose standing to-day is unquestionable as business men of California, and men of unimpeachable business integrity.

Scared Boarders.

Some Buffaloes who were seated at a boarding-house breakfast suddenly lost their appetite on hearing the following conversation between the landlady and the maid-of-all-work:

Maid—The canary is dead, mum.

Mistress—What did you do with it?

Maid—Threw it in the hash box.

The boarders left their hash untasted, and didn't feel easy until they learned that the new girl was English, and that she had deposited the dead bird in the receptacle intended for ashes.—N. Y. Star.

"So you proposed to her. Accepted, of course?" "Accepted! Why, she treated me like a dog." "Allow me to congratulate you, old fellow. I saw how she treated one the other day, and, by Jove, how I envied that dog?"

The Lord never makes a mistake. He made man. We must therefore take exceptions to the proverb; there are many mistakes that can be attributed to the creation of man.

THE WILD JACKASS IN YOLO.

What Is He and from Whence Did He Come?—Does He Belong in Sacramento?—Call the Roll for the Missing One.

An exchange published in the adjoining county of Yolo, of recent date, contained the following sensational article:

"Advices from Hungry Hollow to-day received report that on some several nights various farms in the Hollow were visited by some fearful and destructive animal; that he had super-animal powers of kicking; that he destroyed the porches of several farmhouses, and that he made a fierce attack upon the new winery building near Roland. Imported sheep were mercilessly slaughtered, and the seriousness of the ravages was added to by the mysteriousness of the character and movements of the midnight monster. That which added to the general terror was the fact that after he had committed his depredations he sped away at lightning speed, uttering terrifying roars. The mysterious animal was seen yesterday by James Lowry, one of our reputable citizens, in a secluded part of the Hollow. On a cautious examination he discovered it to be a wild jackass. Its hair had grown to great length, indicating that it had not been pruned for years."

In connection with this item we print the following letter that we have received from Captain Nemo, the Mayor of Gouge Eye:

"To the Editors of 'Themis': I have to advise you that Gouge Eye is in a state of terror. At 11 o'clock night before last our inhabitants were startled by several appalling crashes. Mr. Zolifer, the Eastern capitalist, who determined to erect a flouring mill here, had the foundation about completed, and that seems to have been the first point of attack. It was badly shattered. The porch of our new hotel was in great part demolished, and, strangely, a couple of Buffalo beer kegs in front of Wise's saloon were broken into slivers. When the crashes came it was presumed by most of us that we had been visited by a cyclone, but those first out of doors declared that immediately afterward they saw an animal of an unknown species fleeing from the spot and uttering most fearful noises. I immediately summoned the Gouge Eye Home Guards, six of whom promptly responded, and a council of war was had. Capt. Flaherty was in favor of immediate action and pursuit, but regretted that his sore foot would prevent his walking, and that a boil would prevent his riding. He was willing, however, that the others should act efficiently, and was content to remain and protect the women and children. Lieut. Smith thought we should proceed with caution and that military movements should not be undertaken except after careful consideration. Corporal Feil felt it would be impolitic for the guard to leave town and be away while the animal might return and destroy it. He was in favor of getting a military company from Sacramento to take the field, while the home guard could intrench themselves in the adobe building that had been erected in 1847 and ward off any danger to the town. Private Jones thought the bringing out of a military company from Sacramento too expensive, and suggested that the more economical and efficient plan would be to have Major Gett come out in his brigade uniform and to send him out alone on the track of the destructive foe. He felt that if the animal espied the major he would certainly mistake him for the Almighty and would in terror flee the country, never to return. The latter suggestion was adopted unanimously. There is a noteworthy feature connected with this matter: the damage was mainly done by kicking, and, singularly, the kicks were directed against our strongest structures. Buildings that had stood for some thirty years, and that would have succumbed by the application of a slight force, were not disturbed.

"I send you this as a matter of news; and I hope that, in view of the terrorism that now prevails in this community, you will immediately see Major Gett and have him come up. You can assure him that I, as the Mayor of Gouge Eye, will see he will be amply compensated; he will be invited to address a public meeting and will be introduced to the belle of the town."

We have carefully reflected upon the startling information, and can come to no other conclusion than that this wild jackass belongs to Sacramento. It is not at all unlikely that he was frightened out of the city by the sight of an electric street car or a wagon of the Buffalo Brewing Company; possibly he sought the localities where he is now operating because the electric lights here were too strong for his eyes. In any event, there can be no mistake that his instincts are akin to those that still remain here; the antipathy to incoming capital, to porches, to modernized buildings, and to evidences of the existence of the Buffalo Brewing Company. Add to that the wealth of shouting. We, however, are all conscious of the determination that will be manifested by the Missourians in Hungry Hollow to protect their property interests, and to resent any attack upon incipient enterprises planted in their midst. The chances are ten to one that a rifle party is now in pursuit of this wild jackass, and if overtaken he will be shot. That would be inhuman, under the peculiar circumstances that we esteem exist.

We have but one suggestion to make: that the roll of the members of our Improvement Association be called to determine if any one is missing from here.

Education.

Education is the great factor in removing prejudice and unbelief from the minds of the people. There never was, in the history of this or any other country, an idea new to them of any worth, but what has been met with hostility from all who were not posted. Look at Edison. He was scoffed at when he said that he proposed to invent an instrument that would unite one whole city or State, at one general office; that any town connected with the central office could call up any town or city, find the desired person, and talk with him at the distance of one hundred miles as well as if he were sitting in the same room. These things are now facts; no doubt is now expressed upon the topic of modern invention. Why? The people, by example and education, have learned to realize the truth. All great movements only attain success by constant energy, and are laying the foundation upon facts.

The great coöperative banking movement is at the present time attracting wide-spread attention. These societies have stood the test with great credit to themselves, however, and are constantly educating the people to the great benefits that are to be derived by the people for whom they are intended. We who have studied it, and intend to make it a life-long business, know the justice and good results that are sure to follow coöperative banking.

Read, study and investigate the plan of the Pacific Coast Savings Society, and when you have done so we feel confident that you will say it is one of the greatest movements of the day—one that will put the poor man in a position to protect his home, family, and those who are held dear to him by the ties of nature; educate him to save and get a home of his own.

How to Help Your Town.

Talk about it.

Write about it.

Beautify your streets.

Be friendly to everybody.

Elect good men to offices.

Keep your sidewalks in good repair.

Sell all you can and buy all you can at home.

If you are rich invest in something; employ somebody.

Be courteous to strangers who come among you, so that they will go away with good impressions.

Always cheer the men who go in for public improvements. Your portion of the cost will be nothing.

Don't kick at any proposed improvement because it is not at your own door, or for fear that your taxes will be raised 50 cents.

TO HURT YOUR TOWN.

Oppose improvements.

Mistrust its public men.

Run it down to strangers.

Go to some other town to trade.

Refuse to advertise in your home paper.

Do not invest a cent; lay your money out somewhere else.

Be careful to discredit the motives of public-spirited men.

Lengthen your face when a stranger speaks of locating in your place.

If a man wishes to buy your property charge him two prices for it.

If he wants anybody else's, interfere and discourage him.

Refuse to see merit in any scheme that does not directly benefit you.—Central Californian.

A Delicious Soup.

A recipe for a delicious new soup comes from England. It is called "Battenburg soup" in honor of Princess Beatrice's husband. It owes its excellence to the addition of a calf's foot to the soup meat at the beginning. This gives a smooth, slightly gelatinous thickening to the soup. To make it, take three pounds of clean, lean beef from the round; cut it in small pieces, freeing it from fat; add a calf's foot, split, and cover the whole with three and a half quarts of cold water. Let the soup boil gently for three hours, then add two small, new carrots, three spring onions, each stuck with a clove, a piece of soup celery, three pieces of parsley, a bay leaf and a sprig of thyme, and finally a blade of mace, and salt and pepper. Chop the vegetables, and fry them in a little butter before adding them to the soup. Let it simmer an hour longer, after adding the vegetables, herbs, spices and other seasonings. Then remove the foot, wash it, cut it up in small pieces, straining a little of the soup over it, and set it aside by itself. Strain the remainder of the soup into a stone crock, and let it stand till the next day, when any grease that has risen should be removed from the top. Heat up the soup, thicken it with two tablespoonfuls of flour and a teacup of cream; let it boil ten minutes longer, stirring it constantly, then add a wineglass of sherry and serve at once.

Purposes and Plans.

The Pacific Coast Saving Society is a mutual coöperative saving society, in which every shareholder is a partner, entitled to full knowledge of all facts relating to the business set forth by the plainest and simplest methods possible.

The purpose of this Society is to encourage industry and frugality, and to promote thrift and economy among its shareholders, by providing a medium through which their earnings may be invested so as to yield the largest returns consistent with absolute safety; to aid its shareholders in acquiring real estate, building houses, and making improvements thereon, and devoting the money ordinarily paid for rent to buying homes for themselves and families.

What She Had to Say.

A retail dry goods man had died, and at the funeral services in the church a good deacon rose and remarked:

"If there are any friends of the deceased who have anything to say, we shall take a mournful pleasure in listening."

No one responded for two or three minutes, and then the widow got up.

"I haven't much to say on this sad occasion," she said, "but I would like to announce that business will be carried on at the old stand by the heart-broken widow of the deceased; and our spring stock of goods can't be excelled in price or quality in this neck of the woods; and I hope you'll not forget the widow or the fatherless. Amen."—Judge.

Three rubies of unusual size were sold at auction in London recently. They were the property of the Burmah Ruby Mine Company, Limited. The first, weighing 1,185 carats, irregular in form and deep red in color, sold for £400; the second, yellowish-red in color, weighed 302 carats and sold for £65; the third weighed 231 carats, was dull red in color and brought £33 12s.

FOR SALE.

SECOND-HAND REMINGTON TYPE-WRITER for sale. Inquire at 1714 M street.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET.

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B. PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL o LOAN o OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and $\frac{1}{100}$ Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for \$1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.
W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

Fine Table Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

A True Picture.

Laugh, and the world laughs with you;
Weep, and you weep alone;
For the sad old earth must borrow its mirth,
But has trouble enough of its own.
Sing, and the hills will answer;
Sigh, it is lost to the air.
The echoes bound to a joyful sound,
But shrink from voicing care.

Rejoice, and men will seek you;
Grieve, and they turn and go;
They want full measure of all your pleasure,
But they do not need your woe.
Be glad, and your friends are many;
Be sad, and you lose them all—
There are none to decline your nectar'd wine,
But alone you must drink life's gall.

Feast, and your halls are crowded;
Fast, and the world goes by.
Succeed and give and it helps you live,
But no man can help you die.
There is room in the halls of pleasure
For a large and lordly train,
But one by one we must all file on Through the narrow aisles of pain.

—Eliza Wheeler Wilcox.

The Dying Huanaco.

It is well known that at the southern extremity of Patagonia the huanacos have a dying place—a spot to which all the individuals inhabiting the surrounding plains repair at the approach of death to deposit their bones. Darwin and Fitzroy first recorded this strange instinct in their personal narratives, and their observations have since been fully confirmed by others. The best known of these dying or burial places are on the banks of the Santa Cruz and Gallegos rivers, where the river valleys are covered with dense primeval thickets of bushes and trees of stunted growth, says a writer in Longman's Magazine. There the ground is covered with the bones of countless dead generations. "The animals," says Darwin, "in most cases, must have crawled, before dying, beneath and under the bushes." A strange instinct in a creature so pre-eminently social in its habits, a dweller all its life long on the open, barren plateaus and mountain sides.

What a subject for a painter! The gray wilderness of dwarf thorn trees, aged and grotesque and scanty-leaved, nourished for a thousand years on the bones that whitened the stony ground at their roots, the interior lit faintly with the rays of the departing sun, chill and gray and silent and motionless—the huanaco's Golgotha. In the long centuries stretching back into a dim, immeasurable past, so many of this race have journeyed hither from the mountain and the plain to suffer the pang of death, that, to the imagination, something of it all seems to have passed into that hushed and mournful nature. And now one more, the latest pilgrim, has come, all his little strength spent in his struggle to penetrate the close thicket, looking old and gaunt and ghostly in the twilight, with long, ragged hair, staring into the gloom out of death doomed, sunken eyes. One artist we have who might show it to us on canvas, who would be able to catch the feeling of such a scene—of that mysterious, passionless tragedy of nature—the painter, I mean, of "The Prodigal" and "The Lioness Defending Her Cubs."

To this account of the animals' dying place and instinct, Darwin adds: "I do not at all understand the reason of this, but I may observe that the wounded huanacos at the Santa Cruz invariably walked toward the river."

Working Girls as Readers.

Have you ever noticed how many girls who work in shops, factories, and offices carry books to and from their work?

If you are fortunate enough to be an early riser, just walk down on the business streets at an early hour and notice how many of the hurrying young ladies you see have copies of authors in their hands. You will see quite a few.

There is a mistaken impression afloat that our factory and shop girls are not intelligent. The average factory girl has as much genuine common sense or more than her more fortunate sisters. These girls use their spare moments in reading a line or two of their book. Many a shop girl spends her dinner hour by reading.

"What class of girls patronize the public libraries most?" was asked a librarian.

"Working girls," was answered readily. "I find them an intelligent lot of readers. They do not read nearly as much fiction as school or society girls. Their reading books are usually such as give them practical knowledge."

The girl behind the counter can often be seen with a book in her hands. In her spare moments the typewriter girl will draw out a book from a drawer and steal a thought or two.

Working girls are generally intelligent, and, although circumstances have been against them, have a greater general knowledge than they are generally credited with.

Alexandre de Beauharnais, husband of Empress Josephine, guillotined, 1794.
Bloomer costume introduced, 1851.
"Paradise Lost" published, 1667.

First crusade ends, 1099.

The Colonel Was Excused.

The Confederate soldier had his fun, with his short rations and pay in inflated currency, says the Chattanooga Times, and the "Yank" was not always the subject. The writer of "Four Years in Rebel Capitals," graphically illustrates the point:

Refreshed inwardly and outwardly, the men would march down the street, answering the waving handkerchiefs at every window with wild cheers. Nor did they spare any amount of chaff to those luckless stay-at-homes encountered on the streets.

"Come out'r that black coat!" "I know ye're a conscrip! Don't you want'er go for a sojer?" "Yere's yer chance to git yer subtertoot!"

These and similar shouts, leveled at the head of some unlucky wight, brought roars of laughter from the soldiers, and from the victim's unsympathetic friends.

At one house a pale, boyish-looking youth was noted at a window with a lady. Both energetically waived handkerchiefs, and the men answered with a yell; but the opportunity was too good to lose.

"Come right along, sonny!" was the cry. "The lady'll spare yer! Here's a little mus-kit fur ye!"

"All right, boys!" cheerily responded the youth, rising from his seat. "Have you got a leg for me, too?" and Colonel F— stuck the shortest of stumps on the window seat.

With one impulse the battalion halted, faced to the window, and came to "Present" as their cheers rattled the windows of that block. That chord had been touched by which the roughest soldier is ever moved.

An Hour's Stroll.

Have you ever thought of the distance you travel while you are out on an hour's stroll? Possibly you walk three miles within the hour, but that does not by any means represent the distance you travel. The earth turns on its axis every twenty-four hours. For the sake of round figures we will call the earth's circumference 24,000 miles, and so you must have traveled, during your hour's stroll, 1,000 miles in the axial turn of the earth.

But that is not all. The earth makes a journey around the sun every year, and a long but rapid trip it is. The distance of our planet from the sun we will put at 92,000,000. This is the radius of the earth's orbit—half the diameter of the circle, as we call it. The whole diameter is therefore 184,000,000 miles, and the circumference being the diameter multiplied by 3.1416, is about 578,000,000. This amazing distance the earth travels in its yearly journey, and dividing it by 365 we find the daily speed about 1,586,000. Then to get the distance you rode around the sun during your hour's walk, divide again by 24, and the result is about 66,000 miles. But even this is not the end of your hour's trip. The sun, with his entire brood of planets, is moving in space at the rate of 160,000,000 miles a year. That is at the rate of a little more than 438,000 miles a day, or 18,250 miles an hour.

So, adding your three miles of leg travel to the hour's axial movement of the earth, this to the earth's orbital journey and that again to the earth's excursion with the sun, and you find you have traveled, in the hour, 85,253 miles — Toledo Blade.

A Subterranean City.

It is reported from Bokhara that a subterranean city has been found on the bank of the river Amoo Daria, near the town of Karki. Silver coins and inscriptions of the time of Gopora I have been found in the place, which stretches over a distance of about half a mile, with streets, lanes and squares. "In some places the ground on the top has caved in, but the largest part of the city can be passed through without the least difficulty. By the light of the miner's lamp the place presents a quaint, fantastic appearance. There are houses in perfect construction, one or two stories high, with a pretense of architectural elegance, and filled with furniture and various domestic utensils. The ceiling, or upper covering, of the streets is constructed of blocks of alabaster granites. The natives of Bokhara knew of the place long ago, and carried away many silver and gold coins, ornaments and utensils, of great intrinsic value and of still greater archeological importance. The Russian authorities of Bokhara have made arrangements to take care of the antiquities of the place, and sent notice of its discovery to the Archeological Society of Moscow. The society has sent a commission of experts to make explorations during the summer."

The First Ring.

There are two precious stones that tend to make the hand look extremely white, and these are the emerald and the sapphire. Women more than ever are wearing rings on their fingers. How many know where the first ring came from. Straight from fairyland. A merry sprite who loved a little fairy danced with her on the green until he was drunk with moonshine, and he lost his ring. It was found by a peasant girl and she gave it to her lover, and these two were happy ever after. That's the story of the first ring. One hopes it will be the story of every ring that is given for dear love's sake.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND

SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO

OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

J. M. MORRISON,

Southeast Cor. Twelfth and E Streets,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

General Merchandise.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and original. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEERCAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than J. SLAUGHTER, Sixth and M streets.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice,

SACRAMENTO.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar
Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.

410 J STREET.

—ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED—

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON

CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

B. Ruhl Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET.

SACRAMENTO.

Mr. Jones, of Duluth.

There were five or six of us talking in a hotel office a day or two ago, and one of the group had been telling a story in which his friend "Frank" figured conspicuously, when a frigid-looking old chap, who had been listening closely, turned and asked:

"What day and date did this happen on?"

"It was on Tuesday, June 3, 1888," replied the other.

"Sure of that?"

"Of course I am."

"I'll bet you $50 to $100 it wasn't," quietly said the stranger as he produced a roll of bills.

"You—you will?"

"Yes, sir. What is your friend's full name?"

"Frank Williams."

"I'll bet you $50 to $100 it isn't."

"What do you take me for?" slowly inquired the other.

"No matter. Prove to me that your friend is really Frank Williams and you can take my money."

"I think I ought to know the name of a man I've traveled with fifteen years."

"Certainly; but you don't. We think we know lots of things, but we are mistaken; for instance, you board at—"

"No. — West Twenty-third street."

"The number of your room is—"

"No. 27."

"I'll bet you an even $50 that it isn't!" said the stranger.

"Don't you suppose I know the number of a room I have occupied for four years?"

"You ought to, but you daren't bet on it. Come now, put up your cash."

"Perhaps I don't know the landlady?"

"I'm sure you don't. You call her by a certain name. Is she really the person she claims to be? I'll go you $100 to $50 you can't prove it."

Everybody began to look at the man in a queer way, and presently he continued:

"You gentlemen all appear to know each other, but when it comes right down to facts you are way off. I've heard you refer to this gentleman here as White. Is that really his name?"

"Of course it is," answered three or four in chorus.

"Bet you $100 to $25," said the stranger. "I'll take that," said one of the crowd, as he went down for the stake.

"Very well, sir. You are to prove to me by a legal birth register that such a name was given him, and by other legal papers that he has continued to be known by that name."

"I might not be able to do that."

"Oh! Well, I've heard you called Mr. Green. Are you Mr. Green or not?"

"Certainly."

"Bet you the same—$100 to $25—you can't legally prove it."

"Are you trying to make out that nobody but you knows anything?" demanded one of the gentlemen.

"No, sir. I don't claim to know more than enough to dodge a street car. I am simply willing to bet that the majority of men don't know what they think they know. All of us take too much for granted. I call myself Jones—Marshall Jones. I live in Duluth. I have so registered at this hotel. The clerks know me as Jones, of Duluth. I buy goods here as Jones, of Duluth. I pay for them as Jones, of Duluth. And yet, if I was asked to legally prove my identity as Jones, of Duluth, I don't believe I could do it."

"Mr. Jones, of Duluth, we are about to have a drink. Will you join us?" asked one of the group.

"With great pleasure."

We all walked up to the bar, and Mr. Jones was thirstily eyeing a cut-glass decanter just opposite him, when we all fell back and the young man said:

"Mr. Jones, of Duluth, you felt sure you were about to wet your whistle at our expense; bet you $100 to $10 you are mistaken. Good-day, sir."

And as we walked away Mr. Jones looked like a man who thought he had heard something drop, but wouldn't dare bet that he had.

M. QUAD.

She may be so frail and delicate that, leaning on your arm,

You would break your neck in sympathy to keep her out of harm;

Yet she'll wield her little slipper, though it numbers only two,

On a rebel urchin's trousers till she beats him black and blue.

She can do more with a hairpin than a man with all his tools;

She can make the smartest statesmen act like animated fools;

She can argue without reason on some notion in her head

Till a man with sound intelligence will wish that he was dead.

Some people in this world were born fault finders. They are not happy unless they can pick a flaw in their surroundings. Should they succeed in reaching heaven they will complain about the celestial music, and find fault with the harp strings.

Tolstoi eats a raw onion on rising. He says it's better than a cocktail as an eye-opener.

Bashful Bob Burdette.

I heard a good and altogether new story of Bob Burdette and the late Thomas A. Hendricks, says a writer in the Kansas City Times. Several years ago, while the lamented Indian was touring the West, Burdette was the funny man of the Burlington Hawkeye. In that capacity he wrote a great many satirical verses concerning Mr. Hendricks. One day Burdette was at a railroad hotel at Iowa City when the proprietor called him.

"See here, Bob," said the Boniface, "there's a man in the dining-room whom you're just dying to meet. Come along."

"Who is it?" asked the humorist, hanging back.

"O, come on; it's all right," said the hotel man, and with that Burdette was hustled into the eating-room.

"Mr. Hendricks—Mr. Burdette," said the proprietor, whereupon a handsome, smiling man arose from a table, and, extending his hand to the man from Burlington, said:

"And so this is Mr. Burdette, is it?"

"Y—yes," returned the now quaking humorist.

"You're the man who wrote 'The Bad Man From Injanny,' are you?"

"I did, but that was only in—"

"Let me see," went on the statesman, smiling. "It ran like this, didn't it?"

And Mr. Hendricks proceeded to recite the whole poem. Then he recalled another and another, reciting, before he was through, half a dozen of the satirical outbursts in rhyme that had been directed against him.

"I never felt really bashful before," said the genial humorist, now of Brooklyn, "but that was the time when I would have welcomed an earthquake that would have swallowed me up."

In Time of Trouble.

I don't know of anything easier than to theorize about other folks' troubles. How feelingly we can wipe away our neighbor's tears when her baby dies! What! mourn a bud transplanted, a blossom borne to sunnier gardens, a lamb lifted in tender arms above snow, wind and loss? So we talk until one day death lifts our own latchstring, and away flies our own singing bird to heaven! Are we not dumb then? Do we waste breath then on poetic metaphors or songful platitudes? When the Lord sends along an experience that sears the soul as with a hot iron, or stamps it for eternity with the mint mark of sorrow, we find no help in beautifully turned sentences of comfort, nor in poems, nor philosophies, nor any such thing. The slow processes of time alone bring healing, and even the passage of years can never efface the scar nor cure its secret bleeding. As well go out and say to the raincloud, "Shed no rain," or to the night wind, "Make no moan," as counsel eyes which grief has touched with the dark chasm of woe to cease their weeping, or hearts which despair has entered to hush the clamor of their pitiful unrest.

Mrs. Jumpuppe—"He has stayed out so late that I have a notion to fix an electric current to the keyhole so as to give him a shock when he comes."

Bridget—"That won't be no use, mum; he won't be able to find the keyhole."

The costliest dresses in the world are worn by the women of Sumatra. They are made of pure gold and silver. After the metal is mined and smelted it is formed into fine wire, which is woven into cloth and afterwards made into dresses.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,

Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

	Assets.
Aetna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

SADDLE ROCK

Restaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

JUST RECEIVED.

A NEW AND COMPLETE LINE OF PURSES AND CARD CASES, OF THE LATEST DESIGNS.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Kiebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

WINE ROOMS,

FRANK VAN GUELDER, Proprietor.

614 J Street, bet. 6th and 7th, Sacramento.

FINE LUNCH. Reading Rooms Attached.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint. In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between 1 and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff.

WENT T. CROWELL & CO.

Real Estate and General

AUCTIONEERS

Salesroom: 817 J Street.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

PANTS to ORDER

$3.50 to $13.50

SUITS TO ORDER

$15.00 to $50.00

1000 Patterns to Select from.

GABEL the TAILOR

426 J STREET.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON. ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON, LAWYERS.

504 J street. Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

627 J Street. Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR., ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, LAWYERS,

Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 418 J street. up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, LAWYER,

Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, LAWYER,

920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY, ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,

630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW

Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney), ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Manufacture of Watch Crystals.

In the manufacture of watch glasses the workman gathers with the blowing tube several kilograms of glass. Softening this by holding it to the door of the furnace, he puts the end of the tube into communication with a reservoir of compressed air, and a big sphere is blown. It is, of course, necessary to get the exact proportion of materials at the commencement of the operation, accompanied by a peculiar twist of the hand and an amazing skillfulness.

The sphere ought to be produced without rents, and in such dimensions that it is of the requisite thickness. Out of these balls the workman cuts convex disks of the required size. This is a delicate operation. A "tournette," a kind of compass furnished with a diamond in one of its branches, is used. The diamond having traced the circle, the glass is struck on the interior and exterior sides with a stick, and the piece is detached. The disks, which are afterward traced, are obtained very easily. They are seized by the thumb, passed through the aperture already made and detached by the pressure of two fingers. An able workman will cut 6,000 glasses a day.

Carrying Heavy Loads.

There are few modern shop appliances that have effected such a saving in labor as has resulted from the introduction of overhead traveling cranes in machine shops and foundries. All of the best equipped shops in the country now make free use of these devices, and their high first cost is many times saved in the economy of labor and time which results. In the steel foundry department of one of the largest machinery works in Pittsburgh there is a very interesting application of the traveling crane. At one end of the foundry are two open-hearth steel furnaces, the roof of each being a huge cast-iron dome, lined with fire-brick and weighing several tons. In charging one of these furnaces, the top is removed by a traveling crane and carried to one side, while another similar crane brings from the other end of the building a load of scrap and pig-iron, and gently deposits it in the open furnace. The cover, which is meanwhile held suspended in the air, is brought back to the furnace and lowered into place, the entire operation taking only a few minutes, and requiring the services of only the two men who travel upon the cranes and direct their movements.

Bachelor Life in Singapore.

Many of the white men in Singapore keep bachelor quarters, and one description of a bachelor's bungalow will suffice for all. Two young Englishmen have a one story, rambling house among some coconut palms, covering a lot of ground and open on every side. Enter in and sit; leave your pith helmet at the door, and one of the bachelors says: "Now, wouldn't you take a gin fizz? Its very nice." And before the visitor can answer, he calls out "Boy," when from some unforeseen screen or crack a China boy appears and gets the order.

In a few minutes he returns with a long glass filled with "gin fizz" and powdered ice, and then the host goes on and asks the guests to take champagne and port and sherry and cognac and a julep. This is hospitality in the orient. There are sixteen servants for these two white boys, and such attendance and obsequiousness spoils them, let alone the question of ruining their stomachs by so many liquor concoctions.

Origin of Railway Mail Service.

Most persons do not know that the present railway mail service, like a number of other things, was an outgrowth of the war, and was first placed in operation upon the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, between Chicago, Ill., and Clinton, Ia., in June, 1864. The material drawn upon for the work was to a great extent the ex soldiers of the war of the rebellion, and it is now acknowledged that without them the service could not have reached its high standard of efficiency. They were inured to hardships, accustomed to discipline, industrious, faithful, and as obedient at long range as under the eyes of their officers. They were also found to be full of resources in emergencies, capable of seeing where improvements were desirable, and of intelligently making valuable suggestions. — Indianapolis Journal.

A simple and excellent plan to preserve and strengthen the eyes is this: Every morning pour some cold water into your washing bowl; at the bottom of the bowl place a silver coin or some other bright object; then put your face into the water with your eyes open and fixed on the object at the bottom; move your head from side to side gently, and you will find that this morning bath will make your eyes brighter and stronger, and preserve them beyond the ordinary allotted time.

The world judges you by what you do; not what you are going to do. The man who does nothing but dream is worth nothing to this bustling old work-a-day world of ours. Words are cheap and mean nothing; it is works and good deeds of action that count.

The New York Sun says that it wants some one to chain up all of the fools in the Democratic party till 1892.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

SACRAMENTO, CAL.
San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

Imperial
GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,
Between Fourth and Fifth,
SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,
Book and Job Printers,
410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Southern Pacific Company PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.40 A
4.35 P	Doming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knights Landing and Oroville	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
11.50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5.25 A
3.00 P	Ogden and East	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.05 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamers	26.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.10 P
3.05 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.10 P
3.05 P	Vallejo	8.10 P
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*5.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted.
A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen'l Traffic Manager
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:
PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDGOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED K. COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:
C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Ridgout
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox.
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON.

San Francisco and Sacramento,
Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

(CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE EMERSON

CALIFORNIA
STATE LIBRARY

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1891.

No. 26.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Sacramento is particularly honored on the Supreme bench of the State. Chief Justice W. H. Beatty, and associate Justice T. B. McFarland, are the talented and able members of the Supreme Court from the capital city. We feel a just pride in the two distinguished jurists. We are also rejoiced that Sacramento is likely to be favored by the selection of one of her citizens, and a talented jurist, to a place on the Federal bench. There is every probability that Hon. W. C. Van Fleet, present Superior Judge, will be promoted to the United States District Judgeship. No better appointment could be made. Judge Van Fleet is fitted by nature for the judiciary. Calm, deliberate, studious, and above all irreproachable, he possesses the elements of an able judge. On the bench of this county for over six years, he has made a record that places him among the distinguished judges of the land. About the only criticism we have ever heard of Judge Van Fleet is, that under no circumstances will he permit either client or counsel to approach him regarding pending litigation. While it might seem that a judge could not be affected by listening to facts outside of the court-room, Judge Van Fleet will not permit the mention of any facts connected with pending litigation, except on the trial of the case in the due course of procedure. This is one of his inflexible rules, and he thereby averts any possible undue influence in his determination of litigation. We have known Judge Van Fleet from his student days to the present. He began the study of law with the firm of H. O. Beatty and S. C. Denson, in this city, Judge Beatty being his uncle. In 1873 Judge Van Fleet, after a brilliant examination, was admitted to the bar. For a short time he practiced law at Elko Nevada, but returned to Sacramento, where he has ever since resided. In 1880 he was elected a member of the Assembly, and is the author of some of the important legislation of the session. In 1883 he was appointed a State Prison Director, which position he resigned, having been elected Superior Judge in 1884. He served the full term, and last year was re-elected without any opposition. As a judge, he stands preëminent and is noted for his firm and impartial disposition of litigation. We think that Judge Van Fleet will honor himself and the position of United States District Judge.

Leisure is sweet to those who have earned it, but burdensome to those who get it for nothing. Rest is one of the inexorable laws of physics as well as humanity. There is no machinery that does not require rest after a period of continuous use. The barber will tell you that his razors need a rest. The carpenter knows that his edged tools work better after a rest. We poor human machines work until our eyes grow dim and lusterless, and the machinery of our bodies creak and halt before it dawns upon us that a rest is necessary. A rest and change from the hard work of the mind and body is demanded by the law of nature. The brain that guides the pen and directs the work of the professional and literary being must have a respite, else it wears and wastes untimely. Some of the intricate parts of the brain under a constant strain and use must give way. We may try to cheat ourselves into the belief that rest is not needed, and that our powers are sufficient to withstand all demands, but sooner or later these exactions break the machinery, and leave us mental as well as physical wrecks. The Pittsburg Dispatch man has let his fancy wander on this matter of "vacations," which cannot fail to recall a responsive thought from all: And as the days drove you onward and upward—drove you out of the school into the world, chased you from the flowers to the forest, pushed you from play to work, the old vacation days came back again, with the longing for them over again intensified. The task has taken the place of the lesson, of course; and over it the brain throbs, and the heart beats, and the hand trembles; and you sigh for the clover-spotted meadow, the swash of the sea, the ripple of the stream, the shade of the wood—the change, the rest. Perhaps you will get your vacation, perhaps not. In childhood it was a certainty; in manhood it's too often a dream—a memory. But if you don't, sigh not. Let the pleasures of the fortunates come in upon you like the music of the musician you cannot see but whose sweet strains you hear. Rest will come to you by turning over life's leaves backward and scanning the sunny page. But it will not come when you shut out the sounds of the merry throngs, close your ears to the laughter, blind your eyes to the procession of happy faces, begrudge others what you cannot enjoy yourself. Perhaps, after all, the shadow is better than the substance. Who can tell?

The death of Judge Ogden Hoffman removes one of the most distinguished jurists from the bench. Over forty years he occupied the Federal bench in San Francisco. He has been an important factor in the great landed litigation of this State. Many fraudulent land titles have been defeated through the clear and brilliant mind of the learned judge. The infamous "Limantour grants," which would have absorbed the city of San Francisco, were detected and exposed by Judge Hoffman. The famous "Alameda mine" decision is another monument to his great legal ability. He was a brilliant man and learned judge. His whole life was occupied on the bench, and few judges have such a clear and honorable record. Judge Hoffman was not a family man, having early in life adopted a club existence. His leisure hours were spent in the club with genial companions; but he was always the able, dignified and brilliant jurist.

If the city authorities should display any considerable portion of the energy that is evolved in the prosecution of those citizens who are questioning the validity of the license ordinance, in the defense of the people's interests on the vital matters pertaining to the city's welfare, it would be much more commendable. The Trustees evince great fear of a few dollars costs to protect the waterworks from the greed and rapacity of the bondholders, and have a holy horror of any litigation that would protect the city from the unjust exactions against the treasury, yet can authorize hundreds of suits against its own citizens for the purpose of vexing, annoying, and the exaction of large costs and counsel fees. It is now apparent that the object of the multitudinous suits against the liquor dealers is for the sole purpose of exacting $2,000 or $3,000 fees and costs. If this is not the object, then there is no reason for this persecution. One or two suits would determine the question of the validity or non-validity of the ordinance, without making this vast amount of trouble, and great costs. Our city authorities cannot afford to inflict this great injustice on the citizens.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A Trip Into the Sierras—The Donner Party—Truckee—Deer Park Mineral Springs.

At this season of the year one would hardly be in style did he not arrange for an outing—the remark applying particularly to the people of the Sacramento valley. From the city alone it is nigh impossible to calculate the numbers that are visiting at the sea coast or in the mountains. We confess to a feeling of relief when the hour came for us to take the train for the mountains, at the Sacramento depot. There was also a feeling of fond anticipation of mountain pleasures, fresh air, pure water, bracing climate, appetite and—trout.

However it may be at the coast, the mountain resorts are, as a rule, crowded. Summit Soda Springs has, we understand, as many guests as can be reasonably accommodated, and the lake resorts are well filled. Anticipating embarrassment in the matter of securing accommodation on short notice, we went direct to Truckee, to be at the central point, where information could be the more easily obtained. Truckee is the station from which most of the mountain resorts in the Sierras are reached, and quite near it are many places of interest. Notably attractive is Donner Lake, some three miles distant, a sheet of water, the beauties of which have been too often described to need repetition. At the farther end of the lake from Truckee much destruction has been caused to the meadow lands by the raising of the waters of the lake. A Nevada State irrigation company constructed a dam at the eastern end of the lake, and the result was as stated. The dam has been removed, however, and the water level of the lake is lower now than ever before known.

Near the bank of the lake a large white cross stands, a mournful marker of the spot where the cabins of the ill-fated Donner party of 1846 were located. Concerning the Donner tragedy very much has been written, and our readers are doubtless familiar with the details of the occurrence. We were, however, struck with the thought that, if the party had pushed on from the outset, they could have made their way below the snow belt and saved themselves. There is also to be considered that they were passing through an unknown country, and perhaps what little knowledge they had of localities had been gained from the reports of the expeditions of Fremont.

Truckee is noted particularly for two things: General antipathy to the Chinese, and the free and easy way in which some of its inhabitants conduct themselves. There is here a spirit of accommodation, and a man can get most anything he wants, from a trout breakfast to a faro game. Leaving Truckee, we took the stage for Deer Park Mineral Springs, Placer county, some thirteen miles distant. The evening before our departure a party of young lady teachers from Sacramento came up. They had made preparations to establish themselves in a house on the bank of Donner Lake, to cook for themselves, and to scorn the assistance and protection of man. For defense they brought up a rifle; whether, however, if emergency arises—if a mouse shall find its way into the castle—it will avail, is of question.

Deer Park Springs are off from the Tahoe road about two miles. The Tahoe road passes along the Truckee river, through a picturesque country, and the drive is not at all fatiguing. Along the road the many fine stumps, and the discarded log-shoots down the mountain sides into the river, evidence the immense amount of lumber that has been taken out. The present cuttings are being made about seven miles from Truckee, and at the ends of the shoots at the road-side are the ominous warning signs "Look out for the logs." From the appearance of things one had better look out. In some cases immense dressed logs have come down the shoot, shot across the river, and plowed deep into the bank on the other side. A few hundred rods above the fork of the Tahoe and Deer Park roads, the Von Schmidt dam lies. At stated times it is closed, and when opened the flood of waters suddenly released, sweeps the logs down the stream.

Along the road are many evidences of the excessive snow-fall. Hardly a cabin remains standing; they have been absolutely crushed to the earth. We are told this resulted from the severe winter two years ago, when the fall was unprecedented. The seasons here must present striking contrasts. Now everything is attractive; flora and fauna show to their best advantage; in winter there is desolation and the stillness of death, save the whistling of the winds through the branches of the pines. Arriving at Deer Park Springs, we were agreeably surprised to find its proprietor an old resident of Sacramento county—J. B. Scott, of the Slough House. Mr. Scott has for years owned a winter stock range in Squaw valley, near here, and knew of the existence of the mineral springs on Bear creek. He tested their qualities and found them efficacious, located them, and for several seasons they were resorted to by parties, mainly from Sacramento, it might be said, informally. Two years ago suitable lodging houses, cabins, and a large dining-room and kitchen were constructed, and this season has witnessed additions. The buildings are located on a picturesque spot on the bank of Bear creek, a feeder of the Truckee. On either side of the valley are mountain ranges, covered with pines and under-growth. The range to the north divides the water sheds of the Truckee and the American rivers. Directly to the south is a peak that towers far above its fellows, and to which has been applied the designation, "Atkinson's Peak," after Prof. E. C. Atkinson of Sacramento. There are three mineral springs the waters of which are palatable, and of them the guests speak highly, so far as their medicinal qualities are concerned. Certain it is this bracing air, at an elevation of 6,300 feet above the sea, or the waters, or their combination, have given us an appetite such as we have not had since boyhood days. There is one advantage much appreciated—the large dairy of Mr. Scott. The dairy house is a short distance up the cañon, and there is no end to cold milk, cream, butter-milk and butter. Meats, chickens and eggs are also produced right here. Two miles down the road takes one to the Truckee river, where the brook trout makes his home. Such of the guests as are disciples of Isaac Walton find much sport in hooking them.

Of the Sacramento contingent, Prof. Atkinson of the Business College, with his wife and son Arthur, occupy a two-storied cottage. Mrs. B. R. Crocker and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene E. Smith are domiciled in an extensive and well arranged cottage to the north of the Professor's. M. S. Hammer, wife and daughter are cosily located in a cottage a little way down the stream. At the hotel at present are Mrs. C. G. Pearl and son, Mrs. John R. Brown, E. S. Brown, William Rider and family, and W. J. Davis and wife.

Dr. Hammer and Mr. Moore, of Stockton, have put in some of their time trapping chipmunks, and have some twenty now in custody. Aside from fishing, the Sacramentans seem not inclined to field sports, and the pursuit of land game is indulged in only by some gentlemen from other localities. It is not, however, to be understood that the pilgrims from the Capital find no enjoyment. Almost daily parties are made up and driven to Lake Tahoe, or down to the log-shoots; and there is plenty to attract on walks.

Among the guests are Prof. H. H. Howe and son, of Carson. We were reminded of old times at meeting the Professor; it recalled the days when he was Principal of the old Franklin Grammar school at Sixth and L streets, and we were a member of the graduating class of 1870 with P. E. Platt, Col. C. F. Crocker, William Rider (now stopping here), William W. Mason, Jr., Edw. W. Norris, E. B. Cushman, Arthur Jelly, A. G. Folger, V. S. McClatchy, and others. Reasons of chivalry prompt us not to name the ladies—1870 may furnish a key to ages.

It seems a peculiarity that at every gathering of out-ers there happens along a man of science. At the sea coast his hobby is usually shells; in the mountains it is geology or botany, or some such line. We had a visitation of a geological enthusiast, and from him gained a fund of information. His collection of specimens was extensive, and his explanations elaborate. "Here," said he, "is the most remarkable specimen of conglomerate I have yet encountered." And he showed a flat, round substance something over two inches across, three-quarters of an inch thick, flattened on the wide sides and rounded on the edge. He said, "I am unable to determine its composition or origin. I did chip away a piece and ground it in a mortar, and it had no grit, and I was inclined to think it sedimentary, but look at this flat side—there are unquestionable evidences of the action of fire. I found that back of a house near Donner Lake, and, strangely, I have found no other specimens in the mountains. It is a prize." We said it not, but can we be mistaken? It had been designed for a bisquit. It might be in order for the Truckee colony of Sacramento schoolmarms to explain how that wonderful specimen was found just back of their kitchen. Ten to one they will lay it on to the Donner party, and argue it has lain there since 1846, and became petrified. D.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government was Established from Chaos.

PART XX.

The government of the city of Sacramento, at the time of which we speak (December, 1849, and January, 1850), was in rapid transition from its embryonic condition to that of a city fully organized and equipped under a constitution and laws which fully prescribed the limits of its power and the duties of its officers. P. B. Cornwall, who had thus far largely assisted in shaping the affairs of the city, on the 15th of December, 1849, took his seat in the Assembly as a member from Sacramento District.

On Thursday, December 20, 1849, he gave notice that on the Monday then next he would introduce a bill for an Act to incorporate the city of Sacramento. On the 24th of the same month Mr. Cornwall introduced such a bill in the Assembly. It was read a first time, and a motion to suspend the rules and read it a second time was lost. So the bill took its place on the calendar for a second reading.

Tuesday, December 28th, the bill was reached and read a second time by its title; thereupon Dr. T. J. White offered a substitute as an amendment, and moved the adoption of a resolution that the original bill, the substitute, a petition of the citizens of Sacramento, and all other papers and communications in reference to the bill be referred to the Committee on Corporations, with instructions to inquire into the propriety of establishing a general law on the subject of incorporated cities and villages.

Thus was first raised a question with which our lawmakers and judges have ever since been wrestling: How can we make a general law to govern all municipal corporations, however variant in population and other conditions? This committee was composed of Assemblymen Hope, Bidwell, Vermuele, Vallejo, and Crittenden.

On December 29th Mr. Cornwall introduced another bill with the same title, and it was referred to the same committee.

Monday, January 9, 1850, Mr. Crittenden, from the Committee on Corporations, reported back a bill to incorporate the city of Sacramento, which was read a first and second time by title, and, on January 12th, on motion of G. B. Tingley, the bill was referred to the delegation from the district of Sacramento.

On the 14th of January Mr. Tingley, from the Sacramento delegation, reported to the Assembly that the committee had amended the bill by striking out Section 24 thereof and inserting as such section: "The Mayor, Recorder and Common Council of Sacramento city, created under the provisions of this Act, may, in their discretion, allow in whole or in part any or all debts incurred by the Mayor and Common Council of the city under and by virtue of a charter adopted by the people on the 13th day of October, 1849, and provide for the payment of such debts or claims as may thus be allowed in such manner as said Council may order and direct." In committee this clause was amended to read: "All debts contracted by the President and City Council of Sacramento City, under the charter adopted by the people of said city on the 30th day of October, 1849, shall be presented for allowance to the Common Council created by this charter, and if said council shall be satisfied of the justice of such claim, it shall allow and audit it, and make provision for its speedy payment. If any claim be rejected the party offering it shall have the right to bring suit thereon against the corporation in any court of competent jurisdiction, and if adjudged to be just and equitable in said court, the corporation shall pay the same with the right to either party to appeal as in ordinary cases."

The bill, with the amendment, was laid on the table—ayes, 17; noes, 8—and when the bill was taken from the table it was passed without the amendment; and thus was saved to the city an amount of debt which might have been indefinitely enlarged if the amendment had prevailed.

The bill went from the Assembly to the Senate, and by that body was, on the 24th day of January, 1850, passed, and sent to Governor Burnett for his signature at a later day.

On Thursday, February 21, 1850, the Governor returned the bill to the Assembly without his signature, giving his reasons therefor in extenso. They may be condensed as follows:

1. It is inexpedient to pass a bill incorporating a single city, when a general law might be made to cover all cities.
2. It is unconstitutional.
3. It gives unlimited power of taxation.

This message came on for consideration February 27th, and the bill was passed notwithstanding the veto, and the next day the Senate also passed it. And thus the city of Sacramento took its place among the municipalities, and thenceforward its powers were recognized as fully established.

In some respects the provisions of the new charter corresponded with the one adopted by the people. It had the same boundaries—Sacramento river on the west, Y street on the south, Thirty-first street on the east, and the American Fork river on the north. The officers named were a Mayor, Recorder, and Council of nine members. The style of the corporate name was the Mayor, Recorder and Common Council of Sacramento City. By that name it was to sue and be sued and do its business. Its other offices were a City Marshal, City Attorney, Assessor and Treasurer.

The election for city officers was to be held on the thirtieth day after the passage of the Act.

By the provisions of the charter the common council was required to fix the salaries of the Mayor and other city officers, and a tariff of fees for officers whose compensations were the fees for services.

The Mayor had a veto on the passage of ordinances, which could be overruled by a two-thirds vote of the council. The Recorder was the Police Judge of the city.

The Common Council had the power to create and fix compensation for City Collector, Harbor Master, "and such other officers as they deemed necessary."

One provision of that charter would have prevented the city officers from incurring an enormous debt which now hangs over us like a pall, crushing out enterprise and requiring oppressive taxation, if our city government had not disregarded it. Section 6 provided that "the City Council shall have power to borrow money and pledge the faith of the city thereupon; provided the aggregate amount of debts of the city shall never exceed its annual estimated revenue."

This clause did not meet with the approval of the officers elected to put that charter into effect. The times were flush, prices high, salaries must be made to correspond, and the annual revenues did not suffice to meet inflated salaries of numerous officers, not to mention enormous bills ordered paid to favorites who were anxious to get close to the city treasury.

We shall see, in a subsequent number of this series, what came of these provisions, and how much of our debt came from the former government of the city, under the charter adopted in October 1840. But we may say here that the claims allowed under those provisions were quite small, and no action was brought on a rejected claim.

"Writing much poetry nowadays?" asked a reporter of a poet, and one can imagine the involuntary distaste with which the latter shrunk from this bluff attack. "I suppose you are doing a good deal of literary work?" said a visitor to a well-known writer of short stories, to whom she wished to make herself agreeable. "Nothing to speak of," was the gentle reply. A week later the same acquaintance appeared again. "Now, really and truly, aren't you writing anything?" she asked, with an engaging frankness which seemed to challenge an equal candor. "Nothing to speak of," was the courteous answer, and with that she was forced to be content; but it was not long before she returned to the charge. "How could you tell me you were not writing anything?" she asked, reproachfully. "Yesterday I heard your mother say that you were too busy with a book of translations to do anything for the fair." "Excuse me," said the victim, goaded into explanation. "I merely said, 'Nothing to speak of.' I meant that I am never doing anything in connection with literature of which I have anything to say." The popular idea of the labor which goes to the making of books is often an amusing one. A literary woman who had urged as a reason for shortening her call on a dear old lady the fact that she had some work to do when she got home, was confronted with the question: "Don't you want a sheet of paper and a pencil right now?" "What for?" was her astonished query. "Why, to write something!"

We constantly hear of the collapse of some of those wild-cat institutions which flourish for a brief time under some high-sounding title as "benefit orders." It is one of the strange foibles of humanity to be humbugged and swindled. There is a fascination about all these enterprises that entraps even those who are skilled in the world's affairs. They fondly dream that, by some mysterious manner, they may obtain wealth through the medium of these tempting schemes, which should teach a thoughtful person that by no process can be obtained something from nothing.

Justice Field is the scholar of the Supreme bench. Besides his Greek and Latin, he is thoroughly versed in modern Greek and Turkish, and can converse fluently in French and Italian. His library is one of the finest in Washington, and he himself is probably the most interesting man in public life at the capital. His extensive travels, combined with his long experience of life and his wide reading, make him a most agreeable and entertaining companion. In personal appearance he is tall, with a somewhat stooping figure and a large head that looks like Shakespeare's.

A plan for the establishment of a theater into which only persons in full dress will be admitted is said to have been perfected in Chicago. It is not unlikely that the sheriff will some day visit the place in his every-day suit.

The Stage.

(Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.)

W. J. Florence, the comedian, was born in Albany, N. Y., July 29, 1831. He made his first appearance on the stage at Richmond in 1849, as Peter, in the Stranger.

A New York dentist who has a rich tenor voice sings nursery rhymes and operatic snatches while drawing the teeth of his patients. It is said that his vocal efforts are charged extra in the bill.

Max Eliot says the much discussed comic opera, Miss Helyett, has less music in it even than most comic operas have, and that Maxime Boucheron's libretto is almost as broad as it is long, even in French.

Farce-comedy writers and players ask for the introduction of more words into the new dictionaries. New play names are wanted. Thackeray said he was afraid to invent new words until he was master of the old.

Eva Hamilton is being advertised by the manager, previous to going upon the stage, as "the most famous woman in the world." Make it "infamous," and the whole world will accept the statement rather than read up on the evidence.

That the famous singer, Christine Nilsen, is free from the weakness of snobbery is illustrated by this incident. She was once at the house of a retired millionaire. A distinguished company had been invited to meet her at dinner. On entering the dining-room she, hurrying in amazement to the stately young butler, seized him effusively by the hand and engaged him in conversation, while the other guests stood waiting, and the entertainer looked on in astonishment. "That man," she explained to the group who were seated, "is the son of a kind old nobleman on whose estate my father worked as a day laborer when we were children. Fortune has smiled on me, while it has frowned on my old playmate, whom I find under such changed circumstances."

The actors have a new association. A number of them are reported to have met recently in an up-town hotel and to have organized themselves into the Ancient Order of Divorced and Discarded Husbands. At present there is a great deal of mystery in connection with the society, but its objects and purposes are told by the name. It is the intention to have all the unsuccessful married men in the profession banded together for offensive and defensive purposes. No single men will be allowed to join, and those actors who belong to the order and break the rules by recognizing wives who have dropped them from the cast, are to be instantly expelled. The main design of the scheme is humorous, and is probably based on the old idea of the Alimony Club, which created no end of fun in its time.—N. Y. Dramatic News.

The most curious of all the agencies is certainly the ballet girls' agency, Perier's, No. 20 Boulevard St. Denis. There come all the dancers of the Continent, and from thence they are shipped off all over the world. The ballet is considered to be in its decadence, but that is a great mistake. There have never been so many dancers as there are to-day. Perier has 3,000 addresses on his list. The agency is an odd sight when the engagements are being made. The rooms themselves are on the ground floor, three wee closets into which scarcely a score of people could be crammed; but the court-yard is large, and into that there crowd some sixty or eighty ballet girls, jolly, noisy creatures, full of fun and mischief, teasing any unhappy man who may fall into their mischievous clutches. They tickle him, they pull his hat over his eyes, and generally make his life a burden to him. No one can control the turbulent band but Perier himself, who, with an Olympian frown and a stern and resonant cry of "Silence!" contrives occasionally to bring the impish lot into comparative order.

W. S. Gilbert—who has been made a justice of the piece—no, no; of the peace, has produced at the Vaudeville Theater, London, his fun burlesque of Hamlet, under the title of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. The funniest part of it is that in which the young gentlemen, who are not titled young gentlemen, set by the queen, interfere with the soliloquizing propensities of the prince. The ruffians' rude remarks play havoc with the "To be or not be" deliverance, and Hamlet, with patience exhausted, cries out.

It must be patent to the merest dunce
That they cannot soliloquize at once.

Hamlet is described by the fair Ophelia as "idiotically sane with lucid intervals of lunacy." He discovers that the king has written a very bad five-act tragedy. For this horrible crime the majesty of Denmark is filled with remorse; yet Hamlet piles up the agony by engaging the players to play the tragedy before the assembled court. Of course, he wants to give advice to the players, but they belong to the profession, and don't require instruction from a raw amateur. In the end, Hamlet is ordered to quit the palace and to find a shop at the Lyceum.

Book Chat.

Andrew Lang is declared to write best in a rose garden; Tolstoi sits on his bed and puts the inkstand on his ruffled pillow; Dumas fils uses an ebony desk, while Mary Anderson-Navarro's is mother of pearl.

There are eight articles by women in the current number of the Arena, and they are all good ones, too. A sex that can help to mold public opinion through review articles ought to be able to help shape public policy through the ballot.

Mr. Sydney Colvin's edition of the "Letters of Keats" is published by Macmillan. The book is an event to Keats lovers. In England, where it has already appeared, Mr. Colvin's work of editing is highly praised, and the "Letters" are said to be the most valuable contribution to Keatsiana yet made.

Coningsby Ralph Disraeli, the great British statesman's nephew, is said to have inherited with his uncle's wealth a great deal of his talent. He is a clever politician, rather a good speaker, and writes interesting newspaper and magazine articles. In dress he is as much of a dandy as the elder Disraeli was. His clothing is ultra-fashionable in cut, he lives luxuriously and is a member of half a dozen London clubs. He is twenty-four years old.

Andrew Lang compares reviewing with the pastime of snowballing, and wonders why people mind and do not rather enjoy it. Mr. Lang can hardly judge quite fairly by his own case. It is one thing to receive a few snowballs when you are snowballing yourself, and quite another to get a blow from behind, or a freezing mass down the back of the neck, from a street gamin when you are walking soberly and inoffensively about your business. Judging from Mr. Lang's own reviews, however, reviewing is even more fun than snowballing.

Bjornsterne Bjornson, who is now nearly 60, says that he has "still lots of work to do and not much time to do it in." And he adds: "My work is my life, music is my amusement, and when I have plenty of both I am always happy." He has lately finished the text of a modern oratorio for which the distinguished composer Grieg is writing the music. It is the first time either has essayed oratorio. It is said of Bjornson's penmanship that he writes so abominably that no one but his wife can ever read his untidy manuscript. She copies everything he writes, and recopies after his alterations, until sometimes she writes the whole of a book three or four times. He walks up and down alone, thinking out a chapter, a poem or an act of a play, and not until he has decided on almost every detail does he take a pen in hand.

The careful lover of books has originated the idea now that linen picture frames are the style of making linen covers to put upon the books lent to friends and relatives. They are daintily etched in floral designs and have pertinent mottoes, perhaps adaptable to the borrower. If the person is noted for never returning a book, or for keeping it an exasperating long time, a pleasant little motto relative to the virtue of returning books and so forth meets her eye every time she happens to see the one she has borrowed.

Fear not nor soil not,
Read all, but spoil not,

is a cordial invitation to the reader to enjoy the book with dainty, clean-fingered appreciation.

If anyone should borrow me,
Don't bother to keep my cover clean,
For I am made of linen cloth,
And can be washed again.

This gives the borrower carte blanche to leave the book on the grass, or munch candy while she is reading it, or to use it for a writing tablet while penning answers to various invitations brought by hurrying messenger boys.

The seven sacred books of the world are the Koran of the Mohammedans, the Tri Pitikes of the Buddhists, the Five Kings of the Chinese, the Three Vedas of the Hindoos, the Zendvesta of the Persians, the Eddas of the Scandinavians and the Scriptures of the Christians. The Koran is the most recent of all, dating from about the seventh century after Christ. It is a compound of quotations from both the Old and New Testaments and from the Talmud. The Tri Pitikes contains sublime morals and pure aspirations. The author lived and died in the sixth century before Christ. The sacred writings of the Chinese called the Five Kings contain wise sayings from the sages on the duties of life, but they cannot be traced back further than the eleventh century before our era. The Vedas are the most ancient writings in the history of the Hindoos, but they do not, according to the late commentators, date prior to the twelfth century before the Christian era. The Zendvesta of the Persians, next to our Bible, is reckoned among scholars as being the greatest and most learned of these writings. Zoroaster, whose sayings it contains, lived and worked in the twelfth century before Christ. Moses lived and wrote the Pentateuch 1,500 years before the birth of Christ; therefore that portion of our Bible is at least 300 years older than the most ancient of the other sacred writings.

Professional Chat.

With a nice discrimination Bishop Brooks alludes to one of the reverend gentlemen who took delight in opposing his confirmation as that "dear moth-eaten angel."

Assistant District Attorney Mallowny is very polite and accommodating to witnesses, says the Washington Post, and when a Chinaman or other foreigner is placed on the stand, he always asks how he wishes to be sworn. A few days ago a Chinaman appeared as a witness. "You know the nature of an oath?" asked Mr. Mallowny. There was an affirmative reply, and then he was asked how he wanted the oath administered. "Me no care. Allee same me swear. Suny-schoole bookee no difference." The old-fashioned oath was administered, and One Lung didn't seem to know why everybody laughed.

During the English campaign of 1847, during which Disraeli led the conservatives, there was a good deal of rough-and-tumble interruptions and intellectual scuffling. Some one having howled about "free trade," Disraeli said: "I think it would be a better security for human happiness and for political success that there should be a free trade in knowledge and in argument, which you have not permitted to-day, when your most brilliant argument was a howl and your happiest repartee was a hiss." Some one having yelled, "speak quick!" he said: "Speak quick! It is very easy for you to speak quick when you only utter a stupid monosyllable; but when I speak I must measure my words. I have to open your great thick head. If I bawl like you, you will leave this place as ignorant as you entered it."

John A. Cockerill tells the Cincinnati Enquirer the following story of John Chamberlin: After Mr. Harrison's election to the Presidency he one day called on a neighbor who lives close by Chamberlin's Washington hotel. As he was coming away John met him. He had often had the pleasure of entertaining Mr. Harrison in the Senatorial form, and they chatted like a pair of old friends. "I understand," said Mr. Harrison, good-naturedly, "that you opposed me pretty bitterly during the late campaign. Hazen tells me that you were a red-hot Cleveland man." "I'll tell you, Mr. President," said John, with a twinkle in his eye, "just how it was. I was for Cleveland first and you next, and you see I got a place." It is presumed that Mr. Harrison knows enough of the lingo of the race-course to catch the humor of John's explanation.

Fifty-thousand-dollar fees are common, says the New York Morning Journal. They are often paid by big corporations for legal advice, the correctness or faultiness of which means a gain or loss of millions. No lawyer will give his advice in an affair involving enormous sums of money or the existence of a great corporation, without receiving remuneration in proportion to the amount or interest involved. The personal liberty of a wealthy man is often worth $50,000 to him, and a first-class criminal lawyer, who succeeds in securing to a wealthy client his personal liberty, or his acquittal on a grave charge, expects remuneration in proportion to the wealth of his client. He gets it, too. There are several instances of $250,000 having been paid to lawyers as a single fee. The most startling case was that in which ex-Senator W. H. Evarts, of Evarts, Choate & Beaman, received a quarter of a million dollars for an opinion on a ticklish legal point. A great corporation sought his advice. The lawyer stated the case, and added that the opinion of Senator Evarts would be final with them, and that they would adopt their future course according to his advice. He then put a question, to which the ex-Senator answered simply: "Yes." His bill was $250,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for just one word! Yes, and cheap at that price. Had the corporation gone to a less reliable lawyer and received "no" for an answer it would have cost them many millions. There is another unique feature of this instance. It is the only case on record in which ex-Senator Evarts is known to have said simply "yes." His sentences are usually long and involved, but in this case one word sufficed, and he earned his enormous fee. Another fee of $250,000 was that paid by the sugar trust to John E. Parsons for drawing up the agreement under which they reorganized under the laws of the State of New Jersey. This was also a case that needed a lawyer who could not make a mistake. The smallest error would have been fatal to the trust. It may have been an easy matter for Mr. Parsons to draw up that agreement, or it may not; but, supposing that it was, the long years of tedious training and study which were necessary before he arrived at the state of proficiency which enabled him to draw up a document that was fire-proof in every way, must be taken into consideration in computing the value of his services. That the agreement was cheap at the price was abundantly demonstrated by the futile efforts of the Senate investigating committee to gain any more information about the trust's affairs than the officers of the trust saw fit to give them. An agreement of that sort is worth paying well for.

NOTES.

The Chinese government seems to protect our missionaries in very much the same fashion as we protect the celestials in this country.

Essence of cinnamon has been tried as a spray in hospital wards, and it is said to have proven more useful than eucalyptus in cases of malaria.

The crackling sound of freshly ignited wood or coal is caused by the air or liquid contained in the pores expanding by heat and bursting the cover in which it is confined.

It is reported that the Wyoming Legislature which recently imposed a tax of $2 on bachelors was elected by woman's suffrage. Any of these voting ladies who hereafter refuses the hand of a man ought to be regarded as pariceps criminis and made to bear half the fine.

Senator Pepper, the "whiskers" of the Senate, representing the Kansas Alliance, advocates the loaning of money by the Government direct to the farmers at 2 per cent. In a recent speech he said that if the State of Kansas were to be put up at auction it would not bring enough to pay its indebtedness; and the question naturally arises: What security would the Kansas Alliance give for those 2-per-cent. loans?

It would occur to a thoughtful person, that the city authorities are exercising great and undue, if not unlawful, haste in levying attachments on the saloon keepers for failure to pay for a license in advance. If the ordinance is a police regulation, there certainly can be no obligation which will warrant the suits and attachments until the quarter has past. In other words, there can be no debt to the city until the parties have conducted their business for the quarter named, for the very reason that this ordinance is only a police regulation.

A New York judge has rendered a decision to the effect that "a nuisance is anything that is hurtful and vexatious; that disturbs happiness and impairs and prevents enjoyment; and that causes displeasure, gives pain or produces unpleasant sensations." From this definition, the affairs of life are pretty much made up of nuisances. We might call our wives and children nuisances. The tilts at the bar, and many of the transactions of a mercantile career, would come under that head. In fact, we are constituted of nuisances.

Connecticut has a severe attack of Sabbatarianism, under the influence of which a few of the restless zealots in various cities of the State are making themselves ridiculous and rendering many other people very uncomfortable. In contemplating these strange retrocessions to the evil days of intolerance, the philosophical mind is sometimes led to question whether, after all, the knowledge of and regard for true liberty has increased in New England since the misty years when wicked witches were burned and unlucky Quakers' ears were nailed to the town pump.

It is a well-known fact among women that dresses, trimmings, household adornments—anything that has color and becomes faded, if put away in the dark for awhile, will come out as fresh and bright as if just from the hands of the cleaner or dyer. This principle has always been recognized in the vegetable kingdom, trees and plants of all kinds going into a death like trance during the winter months, to come forth in the spring with renewed vigor and beauty. The application of these ideas to insensate things, to the products of the mineral kingdom, is, however, a later and more original proposition.

Men who are to represent the United States abroad should be of more than average education, obtained in American schools, free from snobbery or confidence in riches, and should have given some evidence by their work at home of their public spirit and patriotism, and of a thoroughly trustworthy character. Finally, the more independent a man is of what is called "society" in America the better fitted will he be to faithfully represent the American people abroad; because it must be confessed with humiliation that there is very little that is truly American in American society, and particularly in that portion of it which spends a good deal of its time in Europe.

The Farmers' Alliance may have a practical demonstration of their financial schemes by studying the methods that prevail in the sadly battered-up republic of Chili. Every fruit at Iquique, the seat of war, is issuing its own currency, and pill-box lids are the medium of circulation. A round lid is worth 25 cents; an oval lid passes for 50 cents. They are stamped with the promise of the firm to redeem them in gold in the sweet by and by. The government has issued paper currency until a dollar of it is worth but 25 cents in gold. The inflationists should include pill-box lids in their scheme. They would be as handy to carry around as a poker chip.

Our colleague and senior editor is having a grand outing way up in the Sierras. He says he is in a place where he can get rich and, of course, this suits him. The chances for this wealth are, however, of a somewhat negative kind—there is "no bar, no store, nothing but pure water and grub," and this our senior gives as a source of wealth, because there is no way to spend money. Friend Win, just look around among the visitors and get up a little sitting on the great American game of "draw," and perhaps you will find a way to get rid of your vast accumulations. If there is no such thing as a little "draw" at this resort, then, indeed, is the case a hopeless one, and you had better return to civilization. By the way, our colleague says that he has board to pay; well, in that event, there is no occasion for uneasiness, for he will soon return. Laudlords have a way of getting rid of patrons without the wherewith, and our senior has been there two weeks and must have reached his financial limit.

It is well known that colors have great influence on the moods of some persons, especially those of sensitive temperament. Insane persons are exceptionally susceptible to the effect of color, and a record which has just been made of experiments in this direction by the directors of the Milan insane asylum is most interesting. A melancholy patient was placed in a flood of rosy light, and in twelve hours he improved perceptibly; in twenty-four hours he called for food, although for many preceding days he had refused nourishment, which had to be given him by force. Green and blue were found to be the most quieting, rose the most cheering and red the most exciting to patients generally. The results obtained were so uniform and so satisfactory that the authorities of the asylum have decided to adopt a systematic course of color treatment for the inmates of the asylum. In future every apartment in the building will be furnished in colors specially calculated to improve the condition of the patient.

We visited the Olympic Club rooms at San Francisco, in company with Jos. Mansfield, one afternoon last week, and witnessed several members leisurely exercising. Never on the stage, or in the ring have we seen such splendid horizontal bar feats as those performed by a young man by the name of Robert Leando. Another young man, John Stack, a pupil of the former, is destined to make a superior bar performer and general athlete. There are many very fine all-round athletes in this club. It is a pleasure to inspect the perfect manner in which the Olympic Club rooms are constructed. Every possible contrivance is there, by which every part of the body and muscles can be exercised and strengthened. The Olympic Club boys can well be proud of their club arrangements, as well as their membership, which now exceeds 2,000. In our younger days we had some ideas that we were an athlete, but when we looked on this club, and the proficiency of its members, we concluded that we were indeed a back number. So interested were we in the exercises, that it was with difficulty that Joe Mansfield could get us to leave the boys. We will go again, however.

That brilliant poet, essayist and diplomatic statesman, James Russell Lowell, has passed to the dark unknown. Genius, character and brains were the composition of this great American. His ideas and works were American in the broad and comprehensive sense. They went straight to the American heart. All the weaknesses of our nation were brought out under his stinging satire. Genuine patriotism was an attribute of his best efforts in the literary world. No man has done more to elevate the American character in the minds of our English neighbors. Mr. Lowell, for the greater part of his life, took part in politics only as an advocate of the grand principles of republicanism. In 1876, however, he was a presidential elector, and the year following was appointed by President Hayes Minister to Spain, where, at the Court of Madrid, his splendid attainments made him a favorite. In 1880 he was transferred to the Court of St. James, where his graceful oratory and poetic power became the admiration of our British cousins. While there were no great international questions for his consideration, he conducted our diplomatic relations so as to earn the plaudits of our people, and the warm admiration of the Court of St. James. In 1885 President Cleveland recalled Mr. Lowell, and since that time he has devoted himself to literature, and resumed his lectures at Cambridge, interspersing his labors by travel on the continent. The following is a list of his literary labors: "Class Poem," "A Year Life," "Poems," "The Vision of Sir Launfal," "Conversations on Some of the Old Poets," "Poems" (1848), "The Biglow Papers," "A Fable for Critics," "Life of Keats," "Poetical Works" (1858), "Mason and Slidell, a Yankee Idyl," "The President's Policy," "Ode, Living and Dead Soldiers," "Under the Willows," "Among My Books," "The Courtin'," "Three Memorial Poems," "Democracy," "The Literary World." His late works have been principally lectures.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Our Navy and the New Naval Militia Drills—Coney Island and its Attractions.

NEW YORK, August 8, 1891.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

The half dozen vessels of our new navy that lay at anchor in the Hudson river off west Twenty-fourth street attracted a good deal of attention, even from such a non-demonstrative people as the New Yorkers. Compared with the old type of war ships that have visited New York harbor on various occasions, they present a formidable appearance, and plainly indicate that the days of "scientific warfare" have swept away the traditional appliances on the sea if not on land. They also serve to remind us that at last we have the nucleus of a modern navy. While its present strength may not be so great as to cause any special apprehension on the part of the great European powers, yet third and fourth class nations, who have been accustomed to view with contempt our antiquated navy, which, until recently, constituted the only means of extraneous warfare at the command of this country, and the only protection of our citizens in foreign lands, are already beginning to display that increased respect which is always awarded to a superior power. The drills of the new naval militia have also proved quite a number of things that were undreamt of in the past generation. At the beginning, old salts as well as landsmen were apt to smile in a superior way when the idea of "citizen sailors" was broached, the very name, one of these linguistic anomalies that are the result of nineteenth-century revolution of ideas, was ridiculed as a contradiction of terms. But the drills have demonstrated the fact that the modern man-o-war's man is a soldier, pure and simple, and that the true "sailors" of the ship are to be found in the engine-room. The new army is composed of men who are neither rough in manner nor in looks, and their speech is that of gentlemen, but for all that, Uncle Sam's men found that they were wonderfully apt learners, and in no wise merited the ridicule that was heaped upon them when they first presented themselves on board the squadron of evolution. Of course, there were plenty of mistakes at first, but somehow the better education of the recruits enabled them to grasp the underlying principles of the work with an ease that made them rivals of the trained regulars. The target practice with ship's guns at Fisher's Island was a complete surprise to the officers of the squadron, and the reserves covered themselves with powder-smut and glory to their hearts' content.

It being more blessed to abuse than to be abused, isn't it about time we heard something from the other side regarding the present management of the navy department? We have all been so fully occupied in praising the advances made in the construction of modern war ships that little or no attention has been paid to their employment. It seems to me that there is something radically wrong in the way our new navy is distributed. The squadron of evolution absorbs a goodly number of the best—from half a dozen to a dozen vessels. The Mediterranean squadron has several more on stations when there is no absolute necessity for heavy vessels. The North Atlantic squadron has a few, and that these are well placed there can be no doubt. But the Pacific squadron has but two or three vessels of a serviceable type, while the Gulf squadron is entirely made up of antiquated hulks totally unfit to represent American interests; and that, too, in a part of the world where the interests of the United States are of paramount importance. Surely our vessels are not sent to European waters to make a show of our power, yet the best of them are on those stations, when they are absolutely unnecessary. On the other hand, Spanish America—fronting on two oceans, and consisting of some twenty nations, not always at peace with each other, and in which American interests are the largest and most important, is patrolled by a few old vessels that are wholly unable to offer protection to American citizens resident in these ports. In times of difficulty it is the habit of the Americans to appeal to the English for protection. It is lucky that on the whole Spanish-Americans are extremely well disposed to their North American cousins. But couldn't Secretary Tracy give us a better safeguard than an uncertain popular feeling?

I suppose that the polite term for that class of people who habitually assert that the old times were so much better than the new is to call them conservatives; but in one place not far from New York they call them "old fogies"—and that is down on Coney Island. They may recall the day when the beach was a romantic waste, and when modern enterprise had not improved the effect of remoteness and solitude out of the place. But when cornered, the conservative is usually forced to admit that, as a resort, the modern island is a vast improvement on the original home of coney. And, by-the-by, these little animals must have moved out very early in the history of the island, for there are no legends even of their presence among the sand dunes. For one thing, transportation facilities are somewhat better than they were twenty years ago. Then, a favorite way to Coney Island was by the shore road toward Fort Hamilton. You drove down, calling at Bath for your dinner, and then had a long drive before you could get your fill of sand and sea air. One half the island claims Austin Corbin as its founder. Some twenty years ago he was staying at Suedekin's Oceanic Hotel for the purpose of eating claims and recuperating his health by absolute rest—the only things to be had. With wonderful foresight, as some say, or by a lucky return for his speculative mania, according to others, he bought the eastern half of the island and proceeded to develop it by a railroad, two mammoth hotels (the Manhattan and Oriental), Gilmore's Band, a fireworks enclosure capable of seating 5,000 people, and in various ways investing something like $3,500,000. The stockholders of the company have drawn out three dollars for every one they invested, however. The great attraction of this end of the island is not its fine hotels or its excellent facilities as the perfect order that is preserved. There is no doubt but that Americans will patronize good amusements liberally if they can be assured that the peace will be preserved. That is Mr. Corbin's theory, and the result proves that he is right. But it must not be supposed that all Coney Island is like Manhattan Beach. There is another side to the island, which lies to the west of the creek separating Brighton and Manhattan. Down in the west end "everything goes," as they will calmly tell you. This is the home of the merry-go-round, the Frankfurter sausage, the patent swing and the famous Coney Island beer glass—warranted four to the pint. A stroll through the Island "Bowery" of a Saturday evening is equal to an education in the ways of a certain class of society most often met with in the police courts. The original Bowery of the city isn't in it with its island namesake, either for brilliancy of its dance-halls or the calm manner in which they swindle the unsuspecting stranger. There is a well authenticated story of a man who complained that a dish ordered and served after the usual delay was not fit to eat. The waiter looked at it a moment and then, as he turned superciliously away, shouted over his shoulder: "Dat's all right. Don't yez know dis is Coney Island?"

A "first night" has rarely brought together so many newspaper men and actors as gathered to-night in the Madison Square Theater to witness the first performance of Jane. This piece, drawn originally from the French, enjoyed a long run in London, but this was its first production in America. It is a farce comedy in three acts, and is exceedingly funny in some of its situations. It may be expected to repeat here, in some measure at least, its London success. As a whole it was very well acted, and the performance will improve with repetition. "Jane" is a servant in the employ of "Charles Shakelton," who, having swindled his distant uncle out of money on the representation that he was married, was under the necessity of producing the wife when his uncle unexpectedly paid him a visit. He, therefore, induces "Jane," for a consideration, to pass herself off as his wife, which she does to the satisfaction of everybody except her husband, another servant, whom she had married the very day the action opens. It is needless to say that "Jane" is the central figure of the comedy. The part was cleverly taken by Miss Johnstone Bennett, who, however, might improve her interpretation by not making so complete a change in transforming herself from a servant into a lady. The production of Jane opens the theatrical season in New York, and it is a play adapted for the summer, being light, airy, and without the necessity of much thought on the part of the auditors.

Many loans are made in Wall street now with a clause providing for payment in gold. There does not appear to be any general discrimination of interest in gold and currency loans, but in one case it is said that a loan was made at 5 per cent. with a gold clause rather than at 6 per cent. without the gold clause. There is also a disposition on the part of some to insert the gold clause in mortgages. This instance on gold payments is, however, special, not general. Most of the large concerns make no discrimination whatever.

The earliest Connecticut patent found on record was granted in October, 1717, to Edward Hinman, of Stratford, for the exclusive right and liberty of making molasses from the stalks of Indian corn, in Fairfield county, for ten years, which grant ended with the words: "Always provided the said Hinman makes as good molasses, and makes it as cheap, as comes from the West Indies."

FLASHES.

Old age tells—so does youth, often.

Those who get ahead fast usually have the big head.

This weather is too hot to make lovers affectionate.

A man who knows he is wrong is always a coward at heart.

Doctors can, as a rule, take life easy; some of them do—at times.

A man that is popular with a large number of women rarely makes a good husband.

We may preach from the housetops, but the devil will be climbing in by the basement windows.

Long engagements between lovers are not good; they are apt to find out too much about each other.

The Old Boys Are In It.

A large number of California Pioneers of "49" met at Nahant, Mass., on July 30, and indulged in a regular old time picnic. The following is from the Boston News, July 31:

Visitors at Nahant yesterday were puzzled at a peculiar flag that floated over the Bass Point House. At about 3 o'clock the mystery was solved by the arrival of about fifty members of the New England Association of California Pioneers, accompanied by their ladies and invited guests, who, after spending an hour in rambling around the rocks and grounds, sat down to an excellent fish dinner.

President Samuel Snow called the assemblage to order and introduced Francis D. Clark, of New York, President of the Territorial Society of Pioneers of New York. He gave some interesting reminiscences of society and mining experiences in California in its earlier days.

Among those present were: President Samuel Snow, Secretary George G. Spurr, Warren Fletcher, John Adams, James H. Bennett of Boston, Isaiah Graves of Lynn, Marshall Russell of Brookline, Stephen A. Cornell of Springfield, Joseph Holmes of Milton, Dr. Charles H. Johnson of Chelsea and others. The entire affair was informal, but all who participated enjoyed themselves.

Ball of Courtland Parlor.

Parlor No. 106, N. S. G. W., will give a grand dedication ball at Courtland August 21, in Houston's new hall. There will be a moonlight excursion from this city and return to enable the Sacramentans to attend the entertainment. The fare for the round trip has been fixed at $1. Steamer leaves K street landing at 6 P. M. The "natives" expect to have a glorious time.

Accumulate a Fortune.

"Some people are born to riches; some acquire riches, and some have riches thrust upon them." But among all classes of people, the world over, only about two of every hundred acquire and attain a competency beyond their old age of usefulness as producers of capital. Few give this matter serious thought. Like Macawber they are expecting "something to turn up," which will suddenly place them in positions of affluence, and beyond the necessity of earning their daily bread by hard labor in their old age. People, therefore, use up their money as fast as they get it, scarcely giving a thought to the future, until it is too late.

There are many thousands of people whose income from their labors are larger than is necessary to feed and clothe them, and who would put aside a part of each week's income for future use if they had a well defined system to follow in doing so. There are few men (and statistics show there are two in every hundred) who are wise enough to develop certain plans, and to follow them persistently through life. Having these plans they are inspired by visions of comfort and plenty which are sure to result from their closely following the system they have mapped out. Having followed the system for a time, and finding the occupation but pleasant and profitable, the inspiration is lightened by their having a constantly increasing bank account with which to further increase their income.

It is possible for every able-bodied man or woman to accumulate a fortune. There are no "ifs" or "ands" about it. It is possible for every wage-earner to put himself on an even footing with his employer in the matter of income. He may not employ exactly the same means, but that matters little, the results may be the same or better.

Lord Wolseley tells of a curious relic in the possession of the wife of the American consul at Maderia. It is only a simple paper knife, but it would be difficult to find anything more interesting than it. On one side is written: "I broke this, D. D. Porter." On the reverse is inscribed: "I mended it, W. T. Sherman." The owner met these two great Americans at Gibraltar, and remembers them with great pleasure.

A single white rose is laid each day on the grave of Gambetta. His greatest eulogy is the fact that the French republic survives his loss.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Russell's Comedians will give The City Directory (up to date) on August 24th. There has been a reconstruction of this farce comedy since its last production in this city. We witnessed the performance of the present company at the California Theater last week, and pronounce the combination excellent. Willis P. Sweatnam is the detective, and does some clever comedy business. Dan Daly, "Stage Manager of the Gaiety," is simply immense. Burt Haverly, Luke Schoolcraft, Jos. Miron, and Chas. Seamon are the very best in their specialties. Miss Bessie Cleveland makes a superb "Nanon," while the three "Rosebuds" by Misses Kelso, Uart and Weller in song and high kicking dances are clever. Miss Amelia Glover is the genuine "high kicker." Julius P. Witmark is a good balladist. All in all, the company excels its predecessor.

Daniel Frohman's Lyceum Company, famous for its excellence, will, on Monday night, present for the first time in this city, The Charity Ball, written by Belasco and DeMille. It is one of the strongest plays on the stage, and in the hands of Herbert Kelsey, Nelson Wheatcroft, W. J. LeMoyné, Chas. Walcott, Fritz Williams, Miss Georgia Cayvan, Miss Henrietta Crosman, Miss Effie Shannon, all the splendid emotions and sensations, as well as the comedy elements are brought out in striking reality. Herbert Kelsey's rendition of the young Rector of St. Mildreds is a masterpiece of art. Miss Georgia Cayvan, as Ann Conger, does great art work, and her emotion is realistic, particularly when she discovers Phyllis Lee's (Miss Henrietta Crosman) relations with Dick Van Buren (Nelson Wheatcroft) the brother of the Rector. Miss Crosman's strongest scene is in the rectory the night after the charity ball, when she comes to confess with her spiritual adviser. Effie Shannon is a remarkably clever little actress, and with Fritz Williams comes the comedy role with spirit. Mr. LeMoyné, as Judge Knox, is perfectly at home, and his courtship of the widow De Peyster (Mrs. Chas. Walcott) has many humorous situations. In fact, it is necessary to witness the play as presented by this great company to have a full appreciation of its merit and the merit of the artists.

Distinguished Jurist Dead.

Hon. C. G. W. French, for many years a resident of this county, and prominent as an attorney at law, died at San Francisco yesterday. Judge French was a thorough classical scholar, and devoted to literature as an adjunct to his profession. He served one term as a member of the Assembly from this county, and shortly after the adjournment was appointed Chief Justice of the Territory of Arizona, which position he held for eight years. The learned Judge, after the expiration of his two terms as Chief Justice, took up his residence in Washington, D. C., where he practiced in the Federal Courts. Old age creeping on him, brought him back to the scenes of his former life, and a couple of years ago he made this city his home for his declining days. A short time ago he was taken ill and went to San Francisco for medical treatment, and the result of that illness was his death. Judge French was a peculiar and exclusive man, having only few close friends, and they among the lovers of literature. Judge A. P. Catlin received the first information of his death by telegraph yesterday morning, and at once proceeded to San Francisco to attend the last rites of his old-time friend.

The Value of Saving.

Savings societies are the foes of monopoly and of the undue accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few. How is this? It is easily understood, if one pauses to think it over.

So long as the mass of the people do not save anything out of their earnings, just so long will their spendings go into the hands of those who do save; and those are the capitalists; and it remains and grows in the hands of those who keep it. That is why the few own the house and the many pay the rent.

The full scope and significance of savings societies are realized by very few. Properly conducted, there is no more efficient agent for improving the temporal condition of the man of small means. His savings, if alone, would be too insignificant to loan, and therefore useless as an interest-earner. But the savings of 500 or 5,000 men, say even of 60 cents a month (which is the usual amount paid in on each share in these associations) is important and available; only, to be made of active use, these savings must be loaned. It is essential that they be loaned securely, for insecurity and want of confidence are deadly foes to saving. What is the use of frugality and "laying by for a rainy day," if some rascal is to run off with the fruits of our self-denial?

It is this feeling that has operated in many cases against "saving up." Savings societies take care to place their money securely. They also loan it so as to carry out the principles of the organizations and to promote continued savings.

Piazza Conversations.

One of these inspiring conversations, to be heard every day at all the seaside resorts, is something as follows:

"Where is Mrs. Lilac?"
"I don't know."
"Neither do I."
"Anybody know?"
"No."
Silence and rocking.
"Oh, here's Mrs. Lilac!"
"Oh, yes! here she is."
"Just speaking of you, Mrs. Lilac."
"Yes; I didn't know where you were."
"Neither did I."
"Nor I."
"Oh, isn't that pretty! What is it?"
"Oh, yes, indeed; do tell us; I never saw one before."
"Neither did I."
"Nor I."
"Where did you get it?"
"Whitney's?"
"Stearns's?"
"Decorative Art?"
"How can you do such fancy work in summer?"
"I know it; how can you?"
"I can't."
"Neither can I."
"Nor I."
"But, then, it must be such satisfaction to look at in the winter."
"Yes; mustn't it be?"
"Yes, indeed."
"I should think so."
"See the surf this morning?"
"Yes, indeed. Grand!"
"Lovely!"
"Never saw anything like it."
"Neither did I."
"Nor I."
"Do you bathe?"
"No; doesn't agree with me."
"How funny. Doesn't with me."
"Nor me, either."
"Nor me."
"Lots of work to get all your clothes off."
"And your boots."
"And hair."
"And so sticky you have to really take two baths."
"That's so; you do."
"That's a fact."
"Awful bother."
"So I think."
"Don't you think it is a very sleepy atmosphere here?"
"Just what I was saying to my husband the other day."
"Why, so was I."
"I can't seem to do anything at all."
"Nor accomplished anything."
"Not a thing."
All yawn.
"Do you suppose they'll have blueberry cakes for supper?"
"I hope so. I love them."
"With sirup?"
"No, sugar."
"Lovely!"
"Delicious!"
"Ever eat any browse?"
"What's browse?"
"Never heard of it."
"Neither did I."
"Nor I."
"Why, it's green huckleberries."
"Oh, is that all."

And so on, and so on, and so on, for one solid hour.—Boston Saturday Gazette.

Solid Institutions.

Capital, in large or small sums, is ever seeking investment where the profit is large and the security unquestionable.

The prudent man, whether capitalist, business man, clerk or mechanic, will invest where the security offered is free from speculation. It is important, therefore, to inquire into the nature of savings societies. There are no financial institutions in the world which are more solid than these societies, and there are no institutions which have been so uniformly successful. Why? Because they cannot speculate; they do not ask or give credit; they loan their money to members only, on first mortgage security on real estate. Such mortgages are the best security known, and are much safer than ordinary mortgages, as the borrower commences to pay his loan at once, both principal, premium, and interest in small monthly payments; and as most of the loans are made to mechanics and salaried men who want to pay for homes, they rarely make a default.

The result is, that it is a rare thing for one of these societies to foreclose a mortgage, and when a foreclosure does occur, it is not often that the society is a loser thereby.

An opportunity to invest any sum, from $3 to $10,000, is offered under the mutual system (where each member is a partner) by the Pacific Coast Savings Society. Sacramento office, 1007 Fourth street.

Never before was the study of warfare pursued with so much scientific method as now. Every art and every science is brought under tribute to it, and the most splendid rewards await the men who make important contributions to the business of killing. In no department of human enterprise is invention so steadily and so zealously engaged. Warfare is more of a profession than ever before.

More thought and more energy and enthusiasm are expended on it than even for the propagation of religion. The cost of the churches and of missionary agencies, of all education, is far less than the expense of the military establishments of Christendom. In the laboratory, the foundry and the target-field, investigations and experiments in its behalf proceed without cessation. The philosopher's stone was not hunted after so eagerly. Machine guns, improvements in arms of precision, the abstruse and secret study of explosives, new devices of destruction, are receiving the earnest attention of the most acute and best-trained scientific and mechanical genius of civilization.

S. A. WOLFE,

Photographic Art Parlors

426½ J Street, Sacramento.

Capital Coffee House

J. H. BRUNING, Proprietor.

509 K STREET,

Between Fifth and Sixth, SACRAMENTO.

Fine Coffee, Tea or Milk, { with Pie or Cake, } 10 Cents.

JUST AT HAND

The latest New York styles in Note Paper, Visiting and Correspondence Cards, Card Envelopes, Mourning Cards and Paper.
Tinted Note Paper and Correspondence Cards are now the rage. All the latest tints in stock.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

THE STATE FAIR OCCURS AT SACRAMENTO
SEPT. 7TH TO 19TH 1891
THE EVENT OF THE YEAR.
DON'T FAIL TO EXHIBIT.
WRITE THE SECRETARY
FOR INFORMATION.
FRED K. COX,
PRESIDENT.
EDWIN F. SMITH,
SECRETARY.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 18th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated August 13th, 1891.
JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

Fine Table Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

Our Own.

If I had known in the morning
How wearily all the day
The words unkind
Would trouble my mind
I said when you went away—
I had been more careful, darling,
Nor given you needless pain;
But we vex "our own"
With look and tone
We might never take back again.

For though in the quiet evening
You may give me a kiss of peace,
Yet it might be
That never for me
The pain of the heart should cease.
How many go forth at morning
That never come home at night,
And hearts have been broken
For harsh words spoken,
That sorrow can ne'er set right.

We have careful thoughts of the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest,
But oft for "our own"
The bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best,
Ah! lips with curve impatient,
Ah! brow with that look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate
Were the night too late
To undo the work of the morn.

—Margaret E. Sangster.

Won by a Kiss.

"Is she dead, doctor, or has she only fainted?"

Without answering the question of the frightened groom, "Doctor" Hugh Liscome bent down above the prostrate form upon the grass and placed his hand over her heart, while his own was throbbing.

Presently the look of terror faded from his own face, and glancing up he said: "Her heart is beating regularly. She is not dead, nor do I think she is injured seriously. Perhaps, however, you had better get a carriage, for she may be unable to reach the hall by walking."

The groom hurried away and Dr. Liscome resumed his examination. Pretty soon he uttered an exclamation as he discovered a dislocated wrist.

"It's too bad!" he muttered.

He was a very young man for a doctor, and it was no wonder he was deeply moved, for Mabel Ringwood, the daughter of him of the hall, was very beautiful. Hugh Liscome thought he could gaze on such loveliness forever without getting tired of the employment.

After awhile he stooped and kissed her. Almost immediately she opened her eyes. He shrank back appalled; but the look of anguish upon her face, and the whiteness about her lips, recalled him to himself.

"Where am I and what has happened?" she feebly asked.

"Your horse ran away, Miss Ringwood. You were finally thrown to the ground, and I think your wrist is dislocated."

"Ah, yes; I remember. Sultana got frightened at the train, and you tried to stop her, but I was thrown to the ground. Were you not hurt, Dr. Liscome?"

"Oh, nothing to speak of. The horse's foot came down on my boot once, but that is nothing."

"And you risked your life to save me? How can I ever thank you enough?" Mabel exclaimed gratefully.

"By never speaking of the matter again. It was merely an act of duty, and, as it was you, a pleasure. Forget it, Miss Ringwood."

"Can you set my wrist?" she demanded, changing the subject.

"I can if you wish it; but the pain will be most terrible during the operation."

"It will have to be set some time, will it not?"

"Certainly."

"And the pain will be no greater now than at another time. You may set it now, if you please."

And closing her pearly teeth tightly together, Mabel waited in silence.

Twice Hugh felt along her wrist before he could gain the requisite courage, but at last he compressed his fingers and the joint sprang back with a snap.

"Did it hurt you very severely?" he asked when it was over.

But she did not open her eyes or answer, and he thought that she had fainted again. He could not resist the temptation to give her another kiss. The color flowed into her cheeks and she opened her eyes rather suddenly.

"Was that in lieu of the usual fee?" she asked mischievously.

Fortunately the carriage from the hall arrived at this particular juncture, with old Mr. Ringwood half frightened to death by the groom.

On learning the exact state of the case, he proffered the doctor 20 guineas.

"I cannot accept that," said Hugh. "My professional fee for setting Miss Ringwood's wrist is one guinea."

"That or nothing!" roared old Ringwood excitedly. "You saved her life, and if you do not take the 20 I'll be your mortal enemy."

But the doctor drew back, and the old gentleman, springing into the carriage with as much agility as his great weight would permit, gave orders to drive off, and Hugh went home to dream of Mabel's blue eyes. Old Mr. Ringwood got over his huff next morning, and before noon he had invited his daughter's preserver to dine at the hall in the evening.

"Excuse me, doctor," he heartily said, "for my thoughtless boorishness in asking you to take money for such an inestimable service. I had classed you with the common herd of humanity, but I see you are possessed of a different spirit, and you would have done the same thing had it been a poor girl instead of the young lady of Ringwood. That is the spirit I like to see, Dr. Hugh. I honor you for it."

He spoke so earnestly that Hugh was charmed, and when the solicitations of Mabel had been added to his, the young doctor agreed to become a frequent visitor there.

And a frequent visitor he soon became. And not only a visitor, but a most welcome one, as was evinced by the color that dawned on Mabel's beautiful cheek at his approach, and the constant smile by which her father greeted him. Altogether, everything appeared in a roseate light, and he was congratulating himself that his prospects were greatly improving, when, all of a sudden, he found that he loved Mabel.

Then the silly young man, afraid of the wealth of the Ringwoods, allowed concealment to prey upon his frame and he became thin as a shadow.

After a time he ceased to visit his friends, and Mabel grew thin as a shadow, too. But the doctor, whose practice had rapidly grown extensive, drove by each day like Jehu, the son of Nimshi, and never looked toward the house. And Mabel would sit by the window and cry. But when her father would ask what troubled her she would not tell him.

Old Mr. Ringwood was sorely puzzled. He liked the doctor and wondered what ailed him, and wondered why he stayed away so perversely. And he loved Mabel and wondered why she was growing so terribly pale and thin. But for all his study the riddle remained unread.

One day a thought like an inspiration flashed into his mind. He would send for the doctor to come to Mabel. No sooner decided upon than done, and Hugh came over in haste, believing she was very ill. The servant was not explicit.

"Where is she?" he cried, "and how long has she been ill?"

The old gentleman saw that he was intensely excited, and he got another inspiration.

"She isn't so very ill," he muttered. "I think that she's only pining for you."

Poor Dr. Hugh! He turned all sorts of colors and grasped a chair for support.

"If you love her, my boy, go in and win," said the old gentleman warmly. "I've not the slightest objection, provided that your love is reciprocal, and shall feel proud to have you my son-in-law. Don't mind the money, my boy, but only think that human nature is human nature for all the tinsel of wealth."

And he slipped from the room just as Mabel entered it by another door.

"Hugh!"

"Mabel!"

Do you think, kind reader, that we would intrude on a scene of private love-making? We shall not do it; so you will be disappointed, perhaps.

"But I did think," said Mabel afterward, "that you might have been brave enough to ask me whether I loved you or not, instead of running away from me."

"Then you were conscious," said Dr. Hugh. "You might have rebuked me."

"I have seen your face, remember, and I rather liked to be killed by you."

And that is all that needs to be said.

The Key of Death.

About the year 1600 a stranger named Tebaldo established himself as a merchant in Venice. Soon becoming infatuated with the daughter of one of the most ancient and wealthy families, he asked her hand and was rejected, the young lady being already affianced. Half crazed and thoroughly enraged, he planned revenge. Being an excellent mechanic he soon evolved a most formidable looking key. The handle of this unique weapon could be easily turned. Being turned it disclosed a spring with a missile in the shape of a needle of exquisite fineness. With this weapon Tebaldo waited at the church door until the maiden he loved passed in on the morning of her marriage. When the bridegroom appeared the desperate lover, unperceived, sent the slender poisoned needle into his rival's breast, and within an hour he was dead of a "strange, baffling disease." Again Tebaldo demanded the hand of the maiden, but was refused. Within a few days both her parents had died in a very mysterious manner. Suspicion being excited, examination was made, and the small steel instruments found in the flesh in both cases. One day the maiden allowed Tebaldo an audience, but told him that she would never be his bride. Within an hour she was a corpse. Tebaldo was suspected, the key discovered, and the culprit hanged. The celebrated "key of death" is still shown to the curious visitor of the Venice Museum.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL

HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND

SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO

OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than

J. SLAUGHTER,

Sixth and M streets.

Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Pine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars.
ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL LOAN OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar Floors, Fence Copping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS.

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & CO.
410 J STREET.

—ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED—

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON

CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

A Clever Crow.

Sardis J. Bacon, of Chestnut Ridge, owns a tame crow that talks, writes a correspondent of the New York Sun. His name is Eb, and he is a yearling bird. When Mr. Bacon had got Eb well tamed last summer, he split his tongue and began to teach him how to utter a few common words. By fall Eb could call the cows and the dog and the pigs, and yell out words that made the tails of the cats get big.

A few days ago Mr. Bacon got Eb to show off his accomplishments to a couple of strangers who had never seen the clever bird before. It was two hours before sunset, and Mr. Bacon told the crowd to go and call the cows. Eb instantly sailed over to a stake in the roadside fence, pointed his bill toward a pasture lot on a hillock several rods away and sang out: "Co' bos! co' bos!" a number of times. At the sound of the crow's voice the cows pricked up their ears, looked down toward the farm a moment, and then went to grazing again.

"Call them louder, Eb!" said Mr. Bacon, and the crow stretched out his neck, pitched his voice a tone or two higher, and rattled off "Co' bos!" as loud as he could yell, at least a dozen times. Again the whole herd raised their heads and gazed at the crow, but they evidently knew that it wasn't late enough for them to come home and get milked, and in a few seconds they lowered their noses into the rank herbage once more.

"Maybe you'd better get the dog to help you, Eb," Mr. Bacon remarked, and immediately the crow flew around as though he was in a great hurry, and sang out: "Come, Con! come, Con! Get the cows! get the cows!"

The dog was lying under the porch, but he roused up the moment Eb began to call him, hustled out into the yard and started for the pasture in a canter. Mr. Bacon told Con to come back, whereat the crow, who had sailed after the dog, turned about, alighted on the stake and set up a cackle of delight. He was laughing, Mr. Bacon said, at the way the dog had been fooled.

A little after sundown the owner of the place called the crow from his perch on a tamarack tree in the yard and told him to call the cows again. The herd were grazing along the base of a knoll, and Eb flew to the fence and sang out "Co' bos!" several times in a low tone. On the instant all the cows pointed for the bars, and Eb, as soon as he saw them moving all right, stopped his noise and sailed along the lane to meet them. One of the boys let down the bars, and the crowd rode to the barnyard on the back of his favorite cow.

While the milking was going on, Eb sat on the peak of the barn, and when the cows were ready to be driven back to the pasture he called the dog. Con came promptly, got the cows in line and drove them to the lot, Eb sailing along behind to see that it was done properly. It was nearly dark when the dog and crow returned to the farmhouse, and in a short time Eb sought his perch in the tamarack tree, tucked his head under his left wing and went to sleep.

The Difficulty in Acquiring Idioms.

Those who think the idioms in foreign languages hard to master and understand do not always realize that the English idioms are even more trying to the people of other nationalities than theirs are to us.

"But no," sighed a poor young French woman who was struggling to "acquire" our language by living for six months with an American family, "I cannot understand you. I am entirely confuse!"

"What is the trouble to-day?" asked the young lady of the family, who was the special instructor of the foreigner.

"Last week when you return from the concert you say that you think Mlle. Gould, who sing, cannot 'make up' so as to look well."

"Early this morning," this she said dolefully, "Margaret, your little sister, came into my room and said that yesterday she and the little Albert, her playfellow, had a quarrel, but to-day she had the intention to 'make up' with him. And this afternoon when I have asked you to walk with me you said: 'I must study to 'make up' what I lost last week.'"

"And now this evening," she concluded, with a comical grimace of despair, "you come to me and say: 'Tell me what I shall wear to the concert, for I cannot make up my mind.' What does it mean, this 'make up'?"

"If you try to explain," put in Frank, the irrepressible boy of the family, "she'll say that the whole 'make up' of the English language is wrong!"

Arab Proverbs.

Men are four.

He who knows not, and knows not he knows not. He is a fool; shun him.

He who knows not, and knows he knows not. He is simple; teach him.

He who knows, and knows not he knows. He is asleep; wake him.

He who knows, and knows he knows. He is wise; follow him.

There is only one cure for indolence—effort. The only cure for selfishness—sacrifice. The only cure for timidity—to plunge into duty before the shiver comes on.

Hogan's Wonderful Dog.

"I s'pose my father has got the smartest dog in the country," said John Hogan, the news agent in the Erie depot. "The dog is a water spaniel, and there's a good many men who don't know half as much as he does. One thing he has learned to do is buying the meat for the family. He'll take a quarter in his mouth and go down to the meat shop and get a pound of shoulder steak, give up the quarter, but wait till he gets ten cents change."

"But why don't your father give him just the 15 cents, so he won't have to bother with waiting for change?" interrupted the Evening Chronicle reporter.

"Well, my father did that once," said Hogan, "and the dog dropped a nickel out of his mouth, and he would never go to the meat shop again with more than one piece of money, so they have to let him take a quarter."

"One day the meat market man tried to put off on the dog a ten-cent piece with a hole in it, but the cute old fellow spit it out on the floor, and wouldn't stir a step till he got a good dime. They used to try all sorts of ways to fool him, but finally the market man thought he'd try him on the short change racket, and one day give him a nickel instead of a dime. They had been fooling with the dog so much that he had lost all patience, and so when he found that they were trying to beat him out of five cents what do you think he did?"

"Took the butcher by the neck, I s'pose," said the reporter.

"Naw," exclaimed Hogan. "He ain't none of your common biting dogs! What he did was this. He walked right out of the shop, stopped a policeman on the street, took him by the coat and led him into the shop, right straight up to the man who had tried to cheat him out of his right change, as much as to say, 'Here, I want you to arrest this fellow!' The butcher understood what he meant in a second, and gave the dog his right change, and the smart old chap marched home with his meat and his dime, with an air that said as plain as words that you couldn't fool him. There ain't anything can beat that dog!"—Corning Evening Chronicle.

Superstitions About Insects.

In Germany, where crickets are seldom seen, its cry is thought to be a death warning. Tapuaya Indians of South America believe that the evil spirit assumes the form of a fly when bent on mischief.

The Spaniards of the sixteenth century believed that an unusual number of spiders in a mountainous region indicated that gold in abundance could be found at that point.

Notwithstanding the fact that the beetle was the sacred insect among the Egyptians, it has been mentioned but few times in folklore.

In Germany stag beetles are held to be in league with the devil. In Ireland they are thoroughly hated; why, no one seems to know.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

	Assets.
Etna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

SADDLE ROCKRestaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET,

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B. PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

FOR SALE.

SECOND-HAND REMINGTON TYPE-WRITER for sale. Inquire at 1714 M street.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Grubler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and $\frac{1}{10}$ Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for \$1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jyt8-st

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting:

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. je27-9t

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

PANTS to ORDER

$3.50 to $13.50

SUITS TO ORDER

$15.00 to $50.00

1000 Patterns to Select from.

GABEL the TAILOR

426 J STREET.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON. ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 604 J Street,

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

LAWYERS,

Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER.

Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,

920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,

630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW

Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

N.W. corner Sixth and K.

The Dress Reform Movement.

The new dress reform crusade is to be conducted on the following lines: To learn to stand well, to walk well, to breathe correctly, and thus to control the vital points of physical being. These are first principles of the science of true living. The work, then, will begin with the study of anatomy, the relation of the vital organs to each other, and the correct size and proportion of members of the body relatively, after which will follow the study of the famous statues of antiquity.

Mrs. Frank Stuart Parker, in speaking of the matter, said: "A great demand is being made to-day upon woman's strength and the public character, so to speak, of her work. She is coming into direct competition with men, and she finds that in order to keep up with her stronger brother she cannot hamper herself unduly. She cannot run the race with her male competitors with a handicap of twenty pounds extra weight; and so, because her clothes do impede her action—because she sees that they are so many barriers to her success, custom goes to the wall and innovations are coming thick and fast. In looking through a book of costumes of the twelfth century I found a great similarity between the dress of the women and men. In fact, I could not tell a man's dress from a woman's without looking at the label beneath the picture. I looked through the book and found that by and by changes began to creep into the men's dress, while the women's dress remained the same. The skirts began to shorten, the sleeves began to grow less voluminous, lace, ruffles, necklaces and bonneted plumes began to disappear; in fact, the whole dress became more and more sensible; a dress that one could work in better, that interfered less and less with the ordinary pursuits of a useful being.

"Precisely the same experience is coming to women to-day. They are broadening their sphere so rapidly that instinctively they are dropping all hindrances. In the book of costumes mentioned, the first radical change was a shortening of the skirt. It is a remarkable coincidence that about the first change advocated in our dress improvement was a shortening of the skirt. Our first and strongest point is the appeal to the aesthetic, and the endeavor to educate women as to what ought to be. We next call their attention to the manufacture of undergarments, working for two points: First, that garments should be manufactured so that we could buy them as a man buys his garments, and not be troubled by having them individually made at home. And then we endeavor to have garments that will more nearly follow the outlines of the human figure, because garments which deform the body, departing radically from its peculiar lines, really demand padding out in some other part to balance the deformity; besides, hoops, the ridiculous balloon sleeves of the past, that emphasize the hour-glass forms, are illustrations of this.

"We have influenced the business centers of Chicago to such an extent that a whole line of goods is kept by leading dry goods houses to meet the demands of the trade." The liveliest interest is manifested at Chautauqua in the movement. The Delsarte teacher, Mrs. Bishop, of Washington, showed a big audience of ladies recently how, under the new system, they could gracefully perform the small physical acts, such as sitting down and rising, standing, walking, resting, yawning, etc.

That is a serious time of life when you begin to realize that the man you are is not the man you hope to become, but the man you have shown yourself to be; a definite quantity with precise limitations, and not a great one. We all compare ourselves at greater or less distances with people in books and in history. There is a time when it is a delightful reassurance to learn from the lives of Keats, Pitt, Hamilton, or Henry Clay that we are not too young to be famous, and that men no older than we have immortalized themselves as poets or as statesmen. Again there comes a time when we go to books for reassurances of another sort, and pluck up our fainting hopes as we read how Grant, Sherman, Cromwell and Nathaniel Hawthorne reached our time of life without distinguishing themselves beyond common, and yet lived to take rank among the immortals. There may be hope for us, we feel, for all of our forty odd years.—Scribner's.

At a fashionable gathering a gentleman made several attempts to start the conversation, but owing to the stupidity of those present he failed completely. After a painful pause he finally remarked: "Now let us be silent on some other subject."

It is currently stated that over 200,000 girls in English factories earn no more than $1.50 a week. How long will womanhood, with all its splendid moral strength, be able to remain unsullied under those starvation wages?

Women are excluded from the galleries of the Japanese parliament because, as a Japanese newspaper says, "they might be moved by the debates there to further political agitation in the empire."

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St. SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Imperial GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,
Between Fourth and Fifth,
SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6:50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11:05 A
3:05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8:10 P
12:50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4:20 A
4:30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7:00 P
7:00 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7:40 A
10:50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9:35 A
11:50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2:25 A
11:00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5:25 A
3:00 P	Oroville	10:30 A
3:00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10:30 A
10:35 A	Redding via Willows	4:00 P
2:50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11:25 A
4:35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12:30 A
6:50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11:05 A
5:40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10:40 P
3:05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8:10 P
*10:00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	26:00 A
10:50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2:50 P
10:50 A	San Jose	2:50 P
4:30 P	Santa Barbara	9:35 A
6:50 A	Santa Rosa	11:05 A
3:05 P	Santa Rosa	8:10 P
8:50 A	Stockton and Galt	7:00 P
4:30 P	Stockton and Galt	9:35 A
11:50 A	Truckee and Reno	2:25 A
11:00 P	Truckee and Reno	5:25 A
6:30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2:30 P
6:50 A	Vallejo	8:10 P
3:05 P	Vallejo	8:10 P
*8:20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2:40 P
*12:15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10:20 A
*4:45 P	Folsom	*8:00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR
a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE FRANKS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1891.

No. 27.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

It is mainly due the exertions of Senator Frederick Cox and Assemblymen C. T. Jones and Win. J. Davis that the State exposition was permanently located in this city. These gentlemen, while members of the State Legislature (Cox in the Senate and Jones and Davis in the Assembly), secured the appropriation to construct the present exposition building, thus fixing the locality for all State exhibitions under the auspices of the State Board of Agriculture. Mr. Cox has devoted his valuable time in the interest of the people of this city, as well as the State, by serving on the board of directors and, latterly, as president thereof. The citizens of Sacramento owe it to themselves and the directory to assist in making the exhibition a success. Every business man in the city should make himself a committee to add to the exhibition. It should not require importuning, or even asking, to inspire our citizens to take an active part and interest in making a full exhibit, from this city particularly. We understand that the leading enterprises and industries of San Francisco are active and zealous in adding to the attraction of the State Fair. It is time our people became alive to the necessities of showing Sacramento to a good advantage. The managers are doing their duty toward us, and it is in order for our people to not be laggards in aiding them.

Our annual exhibition of the resources, industries, arts and sciences is the chief attraction in this State and on the coast. In abundance and variety there is nothing in any country can surpass the products of the Golden State. This year there will be new and attractive features of the exhibition. It will be an exhaustive panorama of enterprise, industry, art and science, including the rich products of the richest soil on earth. It is such expositions as ours that give a stimulus to enterprise. The Eastern tourists, very many of whom will be sojourning on this coast during our great festival, will have a rare opportunity to judge of our inexhaustible resources, and can carry the news to the Atlantic side of the continent. These great occasions are noted, too, for the splendid amusements and trials of speed of the finest stock in the world. No stables can exhibit such elegant horseflesh, rare indeed for speed as well as beauty. The prosperous condition of the grain-growers, as well as the fruit interests, will be the means of adding life, energy and success to the endeavors of the directory of the State exhibition. No men are more entitled to honor and credit than the Directors and officers of the State Board of Agriculture, who have, by long experience and purely unselfish efforts, reduced the conduct of these great exhibitions to a science so perfect in its workings that there is little or no friction from any source.

The custom of fairs is of great antiquity. From the time of Dagobert, king of the Franks "for the glory of God and the honor of St. Denys," fairs have been part of the government of all civilized countries. The importance attached to the old fairs may be better understood from the inducements which, in the 14th century, Charles IV held out to traders visiting the great fair of Frankfort-on-the-Main. The charter declared that, both during the continuance of the fair and for eighteen days before and after it, merchants would be exempt from imperial taxation, from arrest for debt, or civil process of any sort, except such as might arise from the transactions of the market itself and within its precincts. Under the rule of Henry III of England, the fair of St. Giles, the authorities of Winchester on these occasions surrendered the keys of the city, and the civil government, to the bishop who had the control of the fair. We refer to this scrap of ancient history regarding fairs, with a view of suggesting that, in some particulars, the city authorities might do well to give the absolute jurisdiction of the city civil government into the hands of the able and efficient management of the directory of the fair with profit to the entire community. While this might be "looking backward," there would be at least the virtue of relieving the people from the vicious and injurious action of those ill-natured cranks that are eternally trying to keep visitors from the fair, and to drive away those that come to patronize our great State institution. We are not convinced against the policy of adopting the old-time custom, and sometimes argue to ourselves that during the continuance of our State exhibition there would be much more systematic government, and less lawlessness, if the whole power and authority to administer the laws were in the hands of the directory; and that all peace officers and magistrates should be under this rule. As a matter of fact, there would then be a uniform system at least.

We believe there is a partial adherence to this old-time law in the great fairs in France. A couple of years ago, at Paris, our fellow-citizen, H. Weinstock, and Rabbi Kranskopf (we think) were called before a fair court to determine some dispute. The fair courts were called by Chitty the Pie Powder Courts, the lowest and most expeditious courts of the kingdom, and are of very ancient origin. The Conqueror's law De Emporiis shows their preëxistence in Normandy, and the name was derived from pied puldreux, Norman for peddler. The lord of the fair, or his representative, was the presiding judge, and usually he was assisted by a jury of traders on the spot. The jurisdiction was limited by the legal time and precincts of the fair, disputes about contracts, "slander of wares," and the preservation of peace and good order. We think Chris Green, Fred Cox, H. M. LaRue, Geo. Hancock and Ed. Smith would make a tribunal that would set things about right during the great State exposition.

The older residents of this city will remember those vile publications under the names of Muzeppa and Varieties, wherein appeared the most indecent references to many respectable residents of the important cities of this State through the medium of so-called correspondents. So infamous became these assaults upon private character that as a result several tragedies occurred. One in particular in this city which served to call a halt by the vile assassins of character, and put a stop to the publications. The experience of the past has, until recently, deterred this vicious class of libels. But it seems that a weekly publication in San Francisco, under the guise of a journal devoted to society, music, sport, books, pictures, and "a merry life," has prostituted its columns to a system of infamy, on a level with those former publications mentioned above. It is a mystery to a thoughtful person, what satisfaction can arise from these malignant and vicious assaults upon the characters of inoffensive citizens. What is most dastardly, the filthy libels are principally directed against respectable ladies, young and middle aged.

Week after week there appears in this alleged "society" journal correspondence from the principal cities and towns on the coast, and the correspondents vie with each other in trying to cast infamy upon individuals, by insinuations and innuendoes. In most instances only initials are given, but used in such a manner and under such circumstances as to impart the knowledge of whom it is intended to traduce. Some of our most honored and respected people, those given to charity and good deeds, are made the victims of these indecent innuendoes. As an illustration: "Miss F—, daughter of a prominent citizen, was seen entering a certain house on Ninth street with P —." Now, the insinuation made, and the idea intended to be conveyed is that the parties were bent on evil. While it is true that there are very many certain houses on the two miles of Ninth street, the writer wanted it understood that some certain house was disreputable, and the purpose was to cast reflections of an immoral character upon the parties. So all through the list of these villainous references, which appear weekly from the leading cities and towns of the State, we find the one object only—injury to character and reputation, by the dirty scavengers who pen the articles. There will be an awakening some of these days, and the wretches who are perpetrating these infamous libels may merit their deserved fate at the hands of the injured. For such assaults upon private character there is but one redress.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Life at the Mountain Springs—Comfort of Old Clothes—Sacramento as Viewed Through Foreign Eyes—Proposed Change in the City Seal—Man's Inhumanity to Other Animals.

The more of leisure the less the disposition to work. At Deer Park Springs each day is one of rest, save for those who climb the mountain sides for ferns, or go a-fishing at the Truckee river. We care little for ferns, and it is apparent from experimentation our personal appearance is against us, or we are so insufferably awkward, that the fish avoid our fly; hence a hammock, a light novel and ennui. So long as one is able to pay the landlord, and for his return fare, he can feel that indolence is for kings and toil for slaves. It is manifest there must be a making up for lost time when home will be reached, but there is a feeling that after a rest there will be a compensation; that more will be accomplished in less time. We do not propose to array our opinion against that of the great majority that think otherwise, but we are impressed that to enjoy an outing business cares should be severely left at home; and one should leave behind his good clothes and meet nature, not precisely full way, but in a garb primitive in large degree.

There are very many things in the world that are comfortable and agreeable; some are so credited, others are not. We are not aware of having read a defense of old clothes. As a rule, the antiquated trousers that have been an efficient shield and day companion to a man throughout their life, suffer the humiliation of being cut up into clothing for the small boy, or are relegated to an "old clo'" store, where they are hung out for sale to someone of an economical turn; or are given to a tramp as pay for carrying in wood. The coat that from faithful service has become shiny on back and elbows falls lower and lower in the social scale and eventually, perchance, its threadbare remnants add to the squalor of the mendicant who supplicates for a morsel at the kitchen door. So short a time since the same coat set off the proud form that rang the front door-bell and was ushered into a parlor of luxury! But the silk hat: Made for adornment; perhaps the article of apparel most suggestive of pride, dignity and fine breeding; as much petted as a bride, and as sensitive, treacherous in that it serves as a tell-tale crown to the gentleman when in his cups; it brings upon him ridicule; at the last, battered and ruffled, it hopelessly strives to add gentility to an old suit of clothes; succeeds in forming a striking contrast to its more modern and shiny fellows. We have, however, diverted from our thread. What we proposed was to pen a defense of old clothes, barring the silk hat, for of that its fate is but merited. Pride must have its fall, and deservedly. In the mountains the old-time elegance and comfort of cast-off clothes come back; they again have the mastery; and satisfaction it is that, as they go the way of all worldly things, their last days are characterized with usefulness; they are respected.

To give advice is one thing; to practice it another. We have advised that on trips of rest business should be left behind. Good advice; we know it in that we practice it. Here there are no courts; we have no occasion to puzzle over cold shorthand writing; there is no occasion to get mad that our debtors do not respond, and that they take less interest in our finances than do our creditors. Above all that conduces to serenity, very few newspapers find their way up here. For a time we did miss that, but, after all, it may bring to us pleasing surprises. May it not be that when we return we shall find a harmonious and progressive Board of Trustees; the inauguration of a common-sense system of sewerage; Leitch and the president of the liquor association settling their differences over glasses of Buffalo; the swimming baths intact; the Stevens pump repaired; the bonded indebtedness not augmented; new electric roads projected; the escapement of Dr. Nichols from assassination; the smoke rolling from the stack of the new brewery, and harmony in the grand old Republican party? Should these things come to pass, traveling Sacramentans will have to talk on general subjects, and they will not be drawn to answer the questions of the curious as to what manner of government the city has; is it not extremely unhealthy in Sacramento; is it not intolerably hot; are the taxes not oppressive; does not the city's main dependence come from the railroad shops and the State Capitol; is not the city a cesspool of political corruption, and, generally, is there any inducement for a man to move there. We must confess Sacramentans generally are accustomed to view their immediate surroundings through colored glasses, but, as remarked to us by a gentleman from the East, who had passed but a few hours in the city, "You will find it impossible to convince people from abroad that you have the advantages you claim. An intelligent stranger will estimate your city in an hour, and if prudent will move on." It is apparent, if we would progress through the aid of outside capital, we must put our house in order and act rather than talk; our own people must manifest the confidence they seem to expect of strangers. It is rather a set-back that an in-comer, pointing from the cars to the ruins of the woolen mills, is informed that after the fire our people had not sufficient push to rebuild it, but would lend any amount of encouragement in the way of speech and writing to anyone from abroad who would undertake the enterprise. And so it has gone all along the line.

It would seem the seal of our city should be remodeled; the central figure should be eliminated and substituted by the word "IF" prominently engraved. It is now "if we had better levees;" "if we had a modern sewerage system;" "if taxation was not so burdensome;" "if there could be an intelligent adjustment of the bonded indebtedness;" "if we had a Board of Trustees that would transact business, rise above the control of petty politicians, not waste their time in boyish wrangles, and of such breadth of mind that they would not use the same heavy handspike to overturn a chip that they would employ to roll a saw-log." "If there could be a migration of some of our population—of the cranks say—to the cemeteries;" "if it were that the rule could be changed that so many of our prominent business firms would not remove to San Francisco;" "if there would be none of the senseless tirade against enterprises that are about to be set on foot." These "ifs" have unquestionably retarded the progress and prosperity of the city. To some extent they savor of jealousy. They are the outgrowth of a very general apathy on the part of the mass of the people, the absurd and windy enthusiasm of the self-constituted leaders of public thought, and the stubborn and idiotic antagonism of the narrow-minded. We are, as it were, the spectators of a panorama of our own. There comes the painted scene of figures. It pictures that the bonded indebtedness will be "paid off, every dollar, in seven years." Pretty it is to look upon, yet the figures do belie; and while the mass of the people are conscious they see but painted canvas, there are some who see upon it apparent reality. Its shifting brings along the representation of a sewerage system that will compare with favor with that of prosperous cities elsewhere. It fades and dies away. There remains the stench of decomposition; the graveled streets are worn away by the wheels of doctors' phaetons and funereal hearses. There comes next a scene depicting manufactories of varied description; large buildings with huge smoke stacks; swarms of busy workmen; steamers and cars loading with finished goods—enough seemingly to supply the State and much for foreign exportation; but it is all paint. A birdseye view represents the streets gridironed with electric roads, over which are swiftly passing loaded cars. It is, however, fancy. Other scenes are presented: the Trustees in council—men of brains and push; the catacombs peopled by the cranks; the jails filled with criminals whom juries have justly condemned; an election conducted with decency and without corruption; and so on. That some of our people look upon these things as of future reality is perhaps pardonable, in that they have been persistently "drummed in." But in what light are they regarded by the outside world?

To recur to the subject more appropriate in a letter from the mountains. A day or two wears off the feeling of loneliness consequent on a transition from the city to the sparsely settled mountain resort. While at the outset time passed slowly, there came the period when the hours from noon till bedtime pass by with amazing swiftness, and one looks with regret to the day of departure. The ladies find much pleasure in climbing the hill sides in quest of pretty ferns and flowers; men and women fish for brook trout. The business of trapping chipmunks was first engaged in by the boys, and their success inspired the men to try their luck. It would be presumed the man would know more than the boy. Generally that is true, but the reverse is the rule in the trapping of chipmunks. It is one of the things in life where one is apparently dealing with a "dead thing" when, after the animal is captured he is to be transferred from the trap into the cage. It looks easy enough, but it is evident, in many instances, that the squirrel does not fall in the category of "still life." You have him and you have him not. A large number have been caged, and many have been shipped to San Francisco, Sacramento and Stockton. We have captured some, but the woods are yet full of them. "Man's inhumanity to man" is a pleasing sentiment; there is, however, much fiction about it. Superlatively it should be rendered "Man's inhumanity to the balance of the animal creation." With our species of animals there are broad constitutions that guarantee to us protection of life, liberty and property. Were we to seize a man, even for the commission of a palpable crime, the chances are we would not be able to get him out of this county (Placer) without running the gauntlet of a writ of habeas corpus. If we reached Sacramento with him he would not be permanently deprived of his liberty until after a legal battle in court, wherein he would have the advantage of the sacred guarantees the law throws around him, and those guarantees magnified through the dense brains of a jury. Not so with the poor chipmunk. Dreaming not of the trap that has been laid for him, he finds a tempting bait in a box. Seemingly some kind hand had placed it for his benefit. A touch, the terrible crash of the spring door, and the little fellow is instantly transformed into what we term in law "personal property;" he is deprived of his liberty forever; torn from his family and his friends, and exiled to a foreign land. To him the constitutional guarantee of liberty is a mockery; the writ of habeas corpus a sham. Condemned he is without a hearing to life-long confinement and slavery. It does seem his little eyes are full of reproach as he looks through the bars of his prison at his captor, and feels the sentiment of the canary bird in the song of our school boy days: "My palace is a prison." Would it be had he the might and man the weakness, he would so cruelly exercise it?

The rambles over the hills frequently report traces of bears—of a species, however, that are not dangerous. We have no disposition to ascertain if they are savage or not. With most people a bear is a bear, and their general reputation is that they lack in politeness, and are given to a rugged kind of sociability. There is the story of a man who, being pursued by a bear, climbed a tree, and the bear followed him. The man crawled out on a small limb, and the bear started to follow him, when the man warningly cried out: "You darned old fool, don't you see if you come out on this limb it will break down and both of us will be killed!" The many stories that have been told us by Billy Hamilton of bears have created an unfavorable impression, and upon hearsay we would not be a favorable witness as to their character for peace, quietness, and politeness. D.

Uncle Sam Must Furnish Whisky.

In a certain popular restaurant in this city, says the Washington Post, there hangs a picture of Andrew Jackson—"Old Hickory" in his old age, when he had become the sage of the Hermitage. It is interesting because it differs somewhat from the accepted representations of him, and is evidently and undoubtedly authentic. Jackson has always been a popular hero because he was so human—a "human volcano" one writer calls him. When he became President old General Solomon Van Rensselaer was postmaster at Albany, N. Y., under an original appointment from President Monroe.

Van Rensselaer was one of the heroes of the war of 1812 on the Northern frontier. In politics, however, he sided with the Federalists, or, as they had come to be known, the "National Republicans." He was a great friend and admirer of General William Henry Harrison, and always claimed that he was the real hero of the war of 1812, as perhaps he was on the Northern frontier. When Jackson became President an effort was made to have Van Rensselaer retired from the post office.

Two different delegations with the same object in view left Albany in the same month. They came to this city and told "Old Hickory" how Solomon Van Rensselaer would load his clay pipe, and then, sitting out on the public veranda of the only hotel in Albany, the capital of New York State, would puff tobacco and denounce Jackson and all the works of his administration. When "Old Hickory" heard all this he took from his mouth his own clay pipe and said:

"Gentlemen, Solomon Van Rensselaer was the first man in New York in 1812 to raise men to fight the enemy, and he led his own men. Now, by the eternal, he has gained the right to abuse me if he wants to, and he can do so as much as he d—d pleases."

Van Rensselaer held his office until finally removed by Van Buren. He was reinstated by President William Henry Harrison, though disappointed in not being called to the Cabinet as Secretary of War.

General Jackson on another occasion, when complaint was made that Major George Groghan, whose defense of the fort at Lower Sandusky against a force of 1,000 British and Indians was one of the most memorable exploits of the war of 1812, and made the whole country ring with his fame, had fallen into dissipated habits, and should be dismissed from the army, replied:

"Major Groghan has earned the right to get drunk every day of his life if he wants to, and, by the eternal, the United States should pay for the whisky."

A traveler writes from Spitzbergen "that when a violin was played on board a vessel a numerous audience of seals would often assemble and follow the vessel for miles." Sir Walter Scott mentions this taste in the lines—

Rude Heiskar's seals, through surges dark,
Would oft pursue the minstrel's bark.

And it is said that when the bell of the church on the island of Hoy rang, the seals within hearing swam to the shore, and remained looking about them as long as it was tolled. After remarking how interesting it would be to make some musical experiments in the Zoological Gardens, a writer in a London paper relates his own experience in this direction. "The only occasion when he attempted this led to such strong suspicions of his insanity among the visitors that, in the face of a caution addressed by an elderly nurse to her charges—'Don't go near 'im; he ain't right in 'is ead'—he had not the courage to continue his researches. Who knows what useful discoveries have been arrested by this untoward incident!"

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

No matter how prompt actors may be at rehearsal, there is always one man who is prompter.

Poor old Tragedicus was quite cast down.

I straightway asked him the cause of it.

He heaved a sigh, and answered, with a frown,
"I lost a hundred on my benefit."

The widow of the Italian poet and playwright, Giacometti (who wrote several historical plays, notably Maria Antonietta for Ristori) has died at Milan. The Signora Giacometti was both a poetess and a painter of decided talent.

Miss Rose Coghlan will begin her regular season at the Park Theater, New York, on August 24, in Dorothy's Dilemma, by Leopold Jordan. A feature of the play will be the introduction of a horse, which Miss Coghlan will ride astride at a gallop.

Mr. Reeder—Don't you find much enjoyment in reading Shakespeare, Mrs. Shadmind? Mrs. Shadmind—To a certain extent, yes. I think, though, he would have made his works of much more interest to us if he had introduced some of our great Americans in his plays.

Marie Gordon, once an actress of note, a handsome woman, and the first wife of John T. Raymond, died in London recently. She was born in New Orleans, and first appeared on the stage at the Holiday Street Theater, Baltimore, in 1864. About 1882 she procured a divorce from Raymond, who subsequently married Rose Eyting's daughter, Courtney Barnes. Miss Gordon of late had resided abroad. She was rather a tall blonde, with a finely rounded figure, brilliant eyes, and a small, shapely head.

Colonel Jack Haverly, after a meteoric career as a theatrical manager, left New York five or six years ago to see whether he could not gather a fresh streak of luck out west. He was broke when he went away. He returned a couple of weeks ago with a gripsack full of money. He says he has been down in Mexico, where he struck a silver mine, not a big bonanza, but a mine that is calculated to make the hearts of its owners pretty light during the rest of their lives. He is as chipper as ever, and is full to the brim with big theatrical schemes.

Amid a multitude we sat alone,

By friendly half-lights screened from wondering gaze;

Hand clasped in hand we watched the stage ablaze

With rainbow fires—saw Richard to his throne

Stride through his kinsmen's blood, to lose at last Throne, life and soul. What tragic forces swayed

This world in counterfeits! Yet undismayed,

Half in a dream we saw the scenes shift past;

And when the curtain fell upon the strife

We turned and smiled into each other's eyes

With unchecked love—as under broader skies,

When this strange pageantry which we call life

Has fitted by, somewhere we two shall sit

Together, smiling at the close of it.

As in the arts of painting and sculpture, so in the drama and on the stage a strong reaction is taking place against the stilted conventionalism and elaborate artifice of the past generation. Such plays as the Nina Sforza of Mr. Troughton, the Legend of Florence of Leigh Hunt, and the Blot in the Scutcheon, and Colombe's Birthday of Mr. Browning, are vigorous protests against the feeble pretensions and artificial tragedies of the previous century. The poems and plays of Mr. Browning breathe a new life; and if as yet they have only found "fit audiences though few," they are stimulating the best thought of this age, and slowly infusing a new life and spirit into it. But the traditions of the stage are very strong in England, and are not easily to be rooted out. The English public has become accustomed to certain traditional and conventional modes of acting, which interfere with the freedom of the actor, and cramp his genius within artificial forms. There is almost no attempt on the English stage to represent life as it really is. Tradition and convention stand in the stead of nature. From the moment an actor puts his foot on the stage he is taught to mouth and declaim. He studies rather to make telling points than to give a consistent whole to the character he represents. His utterances and actions are false and "stagey." In quiet scenes he is pompous and stilted; in tragic scenes, ranting and violent. He never forgets his audience, but, standing before the footlights, constantly addresses himself to them as if they were personages in the play. Habit at last becomes a second nature; his taste becomes corrupted, and he ceases to strive to be simple and natural. Still, it is plain that a strong reaction against this bigoted admiration of tradition and conventional forms is now perceptible. The facilities of travel and intercourse with other nations have engendered new notions and modified old ones. It is impossible to compare the French and Italian stage with the English, and not perceive the vast inferiority of the latter. In the one we see nature, simplicity, and life; in the other, the galvanism of artificial convention.—W. W. Story.

Book Chat.

Bret Harte says he can get three times better pay for his writings from English than American publishers.

Mona Caird's "Romance of the Moors" is the first English novel to be copyrighted in this country under the new law.

Marion Harland is a large woman, of matronly appearance, somewhat above medium height. She has a brown complexion, black hair that is beginning to turn gray, and a broad forehead. She began to write stories when a child of six.

Forty-niners who climbed the mountain peaks in search of gold will appreciate a recent volume of legendary poems descriptive of the Sierra Nevada. The poems are called "The Vision of Misery Hill," and Miles Payson is the author.

Paul du Chaillu, who is an original American and noted as the discoverer of the gorilla, is preparing a novel on the "Land of the Midnight Sun." The scenes will be from ancient Scandinavia, and the description of the character and customs of the old Norseman will be very accurate, as Du Chaillu has spent several years in painstaking investigation.

William Morris, the English poet, artist and socialist, affects a singularly shabby and unpicturesque attire. He may be seen on Oxford street, in London, wearing an old, black slouch hat, an ancient sack-coat, baggy trousers and a blue flannel shirt. The necktie is usually missing, and sometimes he wears no collar. But his flowing white hair and beard make him an object of interest to every passer-by.

Amélie Rives was named by her grandfather, William Cabel Rives, Minister to the Court of Louis Philippe, after the Queen of France. She is now only twenty-eight years old, and at fifteen wrote a sonnet which has since appeared in the Century. It is to be observed that sonnets by fifteen-year-old geniuses do not appear in the magazines as a rule until after some other exponent has made public the genius's literary existence.

"Masters and Men; a Romance of our Times." By Eugene Hall.—To "American employers and workmen, this book is affectionately inscribed by the author with the hope that it may help to strengthen and cement the amicable relations existing between capital and labor, upon which the commercial prosperity of our country rests." The book is illustrated throughout with what are evidently pictures of actors and actresses, whence the conclusion may be drawn, as well as from internal evidence, that this novel is based upon some melodrama that has been more or less successful.

There have been in modern years few more remarkable books written than "Black Beauty." Its author, a young English woman, by name Anna Sewell, lived just long enough to see the gentle gospel she had preached spread itself around the world, and died in the full hope that she had accomplished something in the way of ameliorating the suffering of the dumb faithful companion of man. The book is the autobiography of a horse—just a plain story plainly told; but in the lesson that it teaches it is inexpressibly touching. "The merciful man is merciful to his beast." The quotation is as old as civilization, and yet how little does man regard it. Perhaps it is a fact that association with horses brutalizes men as it elevates the brutes, but there is no good reason why it should be so. The horse, under man the noblest of animals, is amenable to kind treatment and appreciates it. This has been proven so often that it must be accepted as the fact. Kicks and curses, blows and profanity, are not needed in the successful management of dumb brutes. They can be taught by kindness much more readily and the lesson is remembered longer. Viciousness in a horse is more often than not the result of handling by vicious grooms; and many a horse has been cured of vice by kind treatment from a new master. It is, however, hard to reach the present generation of handlers of dumb brutes. Vicious men are seldom healed of their vices. It is with the coming generation we must work, for children can be trained in ways of gentleness; and it is precisely in this line that the book "Black Beauty" can be used to greatest advantage. A child can understand its lessons, and in the hands of children it will direct their thoughts to tenderness and mercy. It has been made a supplemental reader already in the schools of Oakland, of San Francisco and of many Eastern cities. It should be so made everywhere, and it should be, besides, in every home in this broad land. A good supplemental reader in the hands of the teacher, so it would supplement well the mother's gentle lessons to her little ones.—Oakland Times.

"And so you think she no longer loves you?" "I know it. She used to let me help her on with her ribbon gloves, and lately she has worn nothing but the one-button kind. Oh, I can take a hint."

Professional Chat.

Chief Justice Lucas, of West Virginia, is said to be the smallest man in the State. He is only four feet high.

The time may come when successful criminal lawyers will advertise: "Black eyes painted in for effect on the jury."

"When T. DeWitt Talmage was in Colorado," said Lew Dockstader, the minstrel king, while in Omaha the other day, "the eminent divine was shown the wonders of a mineral exchange. The making of ice was a startlingly new feature to the man of cloth, and he inspected the machinery with the minutest care. In the midst of his investigations he looked around and saw an Indian of the Sioux nation standing near him in open-mouthed astonishment. He was watching the process with intensest interest. After a protracted silence, the Indian said to Talmage: 'Uh! Heap great! white man bigger than God; God make ice in winter, white man make ice in summer.' And this is one of Talmage's great stories on the lecture platform."

A struggling sculptor, reduced almost to starvation, had finished what to him represented the aim of his existence. It was a plaster cast of a very beautiful woman, and the poor fellow hoped it would mark the turning point in his existence. The weather was bitterly cold, and the sculptor, shivering in his Parisian garret, became alarmed for the safety of his work, for it is well known that frost is a deadly enemy to plaster. Tenderly and lovingly he draped the figure in the worn coat he took from his own ill clad shoulders, and lying down beside it, fell asleep. The morning broke, and the frosty sun shone upon the two figures, both inanimate. The artist had sacrificed himself to his art, for he was frozen dead. His brethren, stirred by his untoward fate, raised sufficient money to have the figure cast in bronze with an inscription let into the base of the pedestal, describing how he gave his life—all he had to give—for his beloved art.

A writer in the Indianapolis News once asked Col. Ingersoll what was the greatest compliment he ever received. He thought a moment and said: "I will tell you. I was strolling about the lobby of the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago one evening after supper, smoking a cigar and waiting for some friends with whom I was going out to spend the evening. I saw a vacant chair and sat down in it. Presently I was accosted by a man sitting near who was trying to smoke, but was pretty drunk. I noticed that he was crying. He said: 'Stranger, did you ever read that?' pointing to a poster six feet long and three and one-half wide, hanging against the wall of the Grand Pacific office giving the 'dream' or 'vision' portion of my speech at the soldiers' reunion at Indianapolis only a short time before. 'Yes,' I replied, 'I have read it.' The fellow sobbed away for a few moments longer and continued: 'Stranger, do you know what I think?' 'No; what do you think?' 'Well, sir; I have a copy of that bill hanging in my store at Tuscola, Ill., and I watch every man that comes in read it, and I tell you any man that can read that through and not cry is blankety, blank, blank, and I would not trust him any further than I could throw a male bovine by the tail. I tell you, his heart is not in the right place.' Now," said Col. Ingersoll, "if that man did not know who I was, and I have no idea that he did, that is the greatest compliment I ever had paid me."

The late lamented Bishop Cavanaugh, of the Methodist church, who was as ugly as eloquent and as jolly as good, says the Galveston News, never tired of telling stories about his distinguished, but unfortunate friend, Tom Marshall, of Kentucky. The two men were warm personal friends, notwithstanding the striking antithesis of character, and the not less striking difference in personal appearance. Marshall was handsome and commanding. The Bishop was anything but handsome; he was about as trim as a barrel and as graceful as a sack of salt. This explanation is necessary for a proper appreciation of what follows, but when the great divine used to tell the story he would bring out the application by incidentally stroking the wealth of shapelessness that hung to his person like the ill-fitting garments he wore. One calm June evening the Bishop was disturbed by a noise in the direction of the barn. He groped his way thither and found Marshall in the hay-loft, where he had sought shelter and lodging. Tenderly the son of misfortune was escorted to the best room in the Bishop's house and induced to go to bed in civilized fashion. Between prodigious efforts to get off his clothes his brain and tongue partially recovered their cunning, and he said: "Kav, do you know why you and I make a good illustration of bible history?" The Bishop replied as he would to a questioning child: "No, Tom. Why?" "Well," said Marshall, reverently and pathetically, "the Savior was without where to lay his head. That's me. Then in the beginning the Bible says the world was without form and void." And surveying critically the Bishop's pudgy stature he finished with more vehemence than romance: "By the gods, that's you!"

NOTES.

New York Recorder: Shopgirls' pay averages from $2.50 to $4 weekly. Harvard graduates hired to run soda fountains receive from $4 to $6.

Dr. F. F. Tebbitts has been elected President of the State Board of Dental Examiners. It is a remarkably chilly day when our genial doctor gets left.

It makes us laugh to hear these fellows shout: "The spoils system in politics has had its day!" When there are no spoils to fight for, you'll see very little politics.

Forty millions of humming birds, sun-birds, orioles, gulls, sea birds, wax-wings, birds-of-paradise, and fly-catchers are annually used in decorating women's hats.

Vossische Zeitung takes a very gloomy view of the economic situation of Germany. There is great destitution among the lower classes on account of the high price of provisions.

The most precious life in the world is that of Viscount Dudley, who has just been insured for £1,200,000. The Prince of Wales cannot get his life insured for more than £650,000.

J. B. Harris, one of the city editors of the See, after a spell of severe illness is at his usual post of duty. The complacent and able news gatherer has many friends who are rejoiced at his recovery.

The biggest doctor's fee of the age is the 2,000,000 marks paid by Herr von Donner, a Hamburg merchant, for Dr. Michelsen's cure of his wife. The money wasn't given to the famous Wiesbaden practitioner, however, but, at his wish, to found a hospital in Hamburg.

It is quite a fixed belief among the Russian peasantry that throwing the dead body of a drunkard into the river is sure to bring rain. If this scheme could be utilized here, we could make a good use of some of our hoodlum element.

A flexible sandstone is found in the mountains of the southwestern section of North Carolina. When cut in a thin piece like a whetstone it can be bent considerably without breaking, and will resume its shape when the pressure ceases.

The Koreans are the greatest eaters known. Their stomachs are generally abnormal in size, and the one possessing the largest is considered the richest. If that rule obtained in this country we know of several who would be considered rich.

A Chicago man has come forward with a novel suggestion for the World's Fair. Instead of trying to build a lofty structure, he says the thing to do is to dig the deepest hole in the ground on record and take people in an elevator to the bottom.

A drill sergeant in the British army was recently ordered to ascertain the religious views of some recruits, and this is how he did it: "Fall in!—Church of England men on the right, Roman Catholics on the left, all fancy religions to the rear!"

A Milwaukee man who failed to catch the train and missed seeing a game of ball sued the company for $100. An American who places no greater value than that on the noble game is unworthy of being a citizen of this great and glorious country.

An English inventor has constructed a novel device to do away with the enormous pressure of water against the bows of ocean steamers. It consists of one or more screws on each side of the bow, which throws the water aside and creates a dry well in front of the vessel.

According to Roman Catholic historians, 253 popes have occupied St. Peter's chair up to the present time. Of these, 197 were Italians, 15 were Frenchmen, 14 were Greeks, 8 Syrians, 6 Germans, 5 Spaniards, 2 Austrians, 2 Africans, 1 Portuguese, 1 Swiss, 1 Dutchman and 1 Englishman.

The queen of the Belgians, who learned sleight-of-hand from Hermann (the European, not the American) is fond of traveling incog. Not long ago she and Princess Clementine were run out of a railway compartment, near Ostend, by a fat woman, who declared she didn't believe "such plain people had first-class tickets anyhow."

It is doubtful if the record of early expenditures of any great man begins with a more creditable disbursement than that of Webster while a pedagogue at Fryeburg, Me., which is preserved there as a memento. The first charge set down is "for soap, one sixpence," on January 9, 1802. The items that follow are not unworthy of this beginning. They are: "A comb, sixpence;" "quills, one and sixpence;" "pencil, sevenpence;" and "a book, four and sixpence." The items, "a ring, five shillings," and "one pair of silk hose, fourteen and sixpence," might have given ground for a suspicion of extravagance, to be afterwards justified.

All seasons are proper to record a heroic act. The heroic act of Burt J. McDonald, on Sunday, in recovering three souls from a watery grave, is entitled to the plaudits of the whole community. Such acts are deserving of more than a mere passing reference. This brave man deserves a gold medal as a remembrance of the brave and unselfish act.

In their abundant crops the Kansas farmers are finding a more effective means of lifting their land mortgages than could be had afforded them by the sub-treasury schemes of Government warehouses for corn and Government loans of inconvertible paper at a nominal rate of interest. Bounteous nature and deep plowing legislate much more wisely than the Peffers and Simpsons.

Of course, nobody believes that the Shah of Persia punished an embezzling tax collector by having him boiled alive; but such unbelief is unfortunate. Nothing would give a greater sense of security to bank depositors, taxpayers, stockholders and all the category of creditors than the knowledge that persons in positions of trust stood in wholesome fear of being boiled alive for stealing.

The Ancient Order of Foresters has made some important changes in its constitution, chief of which is a provision that the officers of the High Court shall hereafter be chosen without regard to the State in which the court may be sitting. Heretofore the officers have been selected from the State where the court sat. Brooklyn is said to be one of the centers of Forestry, and Chicago and San Francisco stand next to it. Within a radius of 400 miles from Brooklyn there are 56,000 members of the order.

There is considerable sensation in the orthodox religious world concerning the identity of the coat of the Saviour Jesus Christ. It is claimed by different factions that each has the identical coat worn by the Saviour, and called the "holy coat." The Simon pure holy coat is said to be at Treves, but the Rector at the church at Argenteuil, in France, who possess the rival coat, has arrived there with two friends. He declares that the holy coat of Treves is not seamless, as has been represented, and as the description in the New Testament requires the coat should be, and moreover that it is a long cloak, falling from the shoulders to the feet, which Jesus, being a mere craftsman, could never have worn. The French Rector's presence is likely to cause trouble, as his remarks have stirred up much indignation among the faithful there. We cannot see what difference it makes which coat he wore, or whether he had a coat at all. From accounts of the lowly condition of the Saviour, it is fair to presume he had no coat. Our orthodox brothers must have something to fight about however.

Kentucky has ratified a new Constitution to supersede that of 1849. The old instrument provided that seven years must elapse from the passage of an Act proposing a change, and its ratification by the people. Hence it was for a quarter of a century the people have vainly endeavored to reform their Constitution to adjust it to the changed condition that has naturally come about with time. The old Constitution provided for viva voce voting; that has been done away with, and all elections will be hereafter conducted by secret ballot. Kentucky was the last State to abolish the system of open ballot. The evil against which the Constitutional Convention of Kentucky directed their chief efforts was the growth of corruption of politics. The instrument which they framed abounds in preventive and punitive provisions aimed at this evil. Any person who has obtained a nomination or secured an election by the unlawful use of money, bribery or intimidation, or any other corrupt practice, shall be deprived of his office. Any corporation which is shown to have used money, or intimidation, or corrupt practices to promote its own schemes shall forfeit its charter. Any official who accepts free passes on railroads or steamboats shall forfeit his office. These provisions are generally in the present Constitution of this State, and they are supplemented by stringent statute laws, yet they have not been effective, and it is doubtful if the Kentucky Constitution will attain the reform designed. However, the tendency of modern legislation is to curb corruption in politics, and while all that could be desired has not been attained, much good has resulted, and there is hope of more in the future. Concerning the matter generally of a prominent evil in politics, the Baltimore Sun pointedly remarks: "It is a most significant as well as encouraging sign of the times that popular attention everywhere is being awakened and directed to that overshadowing curse of American politics—the power of the local political manager or boss. It is an evil that has grown enormously with the growth of our great cities, and with the gradual formation of the class of professional politicians of a low type, who follow politics as a trade and simply for the sake of the money that is in it."

NEW YORK LETTER.

Building Improvements and Street Obstructions—The New Union Depot—The Ocean Racers—"On the Avenue."

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, August 15, 1891.

At this particular season of the year one can scarcely walk three blocks in any direction in the city without coming across a pile of wretched buildings in the course of demolition, with their accompanying unsightly piles of brick and lumber. The worst places in town are down town, of course. The whole eastern side of Church street, between Cortlandt and Dey for instance, has been torn down; the entire street presenting a scene distressing to look upon, and, worse still, absolutely blockaded to all traffic, both of trucks and on foot. Of course there is a reason for all this; there is probably no city in the New World which presents the same obstacles to the erection of massive buildings as New York. In some sections boulders of the toughest kind of rock are found only a few feet beneath the surface, which necessitate extensive drilling and blasting, while in other portions quicksands imperil the safety of the most solid foundations. The modern building engineer has, however, reached such a degree of skill that he is able to erect immense structures on foundations that would give to an ordinary man but little encouragement in their promises of support. The huge building of the Coal and Iron Exchange, for instance, is built on a foundation composed of piles driven into the earth close together, and thickly covered over with concrete. It is fifteen years and more since this building was erected, and yet there has not been any indication of a lack of security in its supports. The present excavations are on the opposite corner, where it is intended to erect another large building. As the same difficulties are encountered in the effort to find a natural support for the new structure, it is but natural that similar means should be employed as were adopted in the case of the former building.

Another beautiful example of the total disregard for the convenience of the public and the demand of business, is furnished in the snail-like manner in which the work of laying the new stone pavement on Twenty-third street is conducted. About a month ago the granite blocks for the pavement were unloaded upon the sidewalk on both sides of the street from Fifth avenue to Tenth avenue, and shortly afterward workmen began tearing up the street. The old pavement was removed, and the street excavated to the depth of about three feet, but not a stone of the new pavement was laid. Merchants have appealed to the city officials for relief, but their appeals were not listened to; at last the abuse became so flagrant that the fire department had to notify the street commissioners that the state of the street in question was a menace to the safety of the city. The commissioners replied that they were hampered by troubles and disagreements among the laborers employed in laying the pavement, and then began work in a half-hearted way. Judging by the present rate of progress winter will be here with snow and slush to complete the discomforts of the situation before the pavement is laid on the westerly end of this street. The only apparent reason for this trespass on the rights of property owners and pedestrians, is the convenience of the contractors who have charge of the work, and the indifference of city officials, popularly supposed to be the servants of the people.

For some time the plan of a union depot, situated somewhere about Thirty-ninth street and Broadway, has been agitated. Some of the newspapers talk with suspicious enthusiasm, but there is no real reason for believing in its probable erection. Once in a while we are flooded with a series of articles, illustrated with cuts, which go to show that we will shortly have an enormous suspension bridge over the Hudson, anywhere from eight to twenty tracks, and about 750 trains a day landing in the heart of New York. If the scheme goes through it will have the effect of changing the whole character of New York. The proposed station is to be at Thirty-ninth street and Broadway, extending over two blocks to Eighth avenue, and covering about four times as much ground as the Grand Central depot. In imitation of the St. Pancras station of London, of course. This would place the Metropolitan Opera House next door to the railroad station, and, of course, ruin it as a home of music and art. The Casino would be across the way and the Broadway Theater two blocks distant; the Hotel Marlborough and the Normandie would face the structure. All these buildings would be ruined and rendered valueless, except as store-houses. This has been the experience of the enormous stations of London, Paris and Berlin. Wherever there is a great railroad station the neighborhood is gradually absorbed to commercial uses, or turned into cheap hotels for transient guests. Furthermore, as Broadway is none too wide at Thirty-eighth street, and the different side streets are narrower still, it would be necessary before long to tear down some of the most imposing buildings in that neighborhood to make room for the railroad. This may be thought advisable fifty years hence, but just now would be a real detriment to the city.

It is not so very long ago that I had occasion to remark that the record of the European passage had been broken by a steamer of the Hamburg-American company. Just to keep abreast of the times, I would like to mention that even this record has been beaten by the White Star steamer Majestic. But there I intend to stop. Life is too short to spend it following up the doings of the ocean racers, unless one has nothing else to occupy his time. I should very much dislike to fall behind the procession of progress, but must none the less surrender the keeping a "racing guide" into the hands of some one with a mania for statistics—and nothing else to do.

What funny things we do see in a day's walk on "the avenue," for instance. A handsome young woman in deep black, with very red lips, sauntering along, and dropping her visiting card every block or so with charming unconsciousness. And then there are the politicians around the big hotels that face on Madison square, who actually think that at least one man in ten knows them, and worships their greatness. And, funniest of all, the city fathers who think they are the equals of "society" because they have been elected by the "people"—that is to say, by the heelers.

One of the luckiest of European rulers is the King of Denmark. His son is King of Greece; one of his daughters is the Princess of Wales, and another is the Czarina of Russia. The only reason why he cannot claim connection with the other royal houses of Europe is that the supply of marriageable children has fallen short. He proposes to have a family reunion next month, and the event will doubtless be a pleasant one. House cleaning has been going on for some time in the palace; there will be a great deal of baking and brewing, and the thrifty burghers of Copenhagen are delighted with the prospect of such an influx of royalty. As a successful matchmaker old Christian could give points to the most scheming dowager to be met with at the popular summer resorts.

Another scientific observer publishes a pamphlet to show that the European jaw is narrowing through the lesser severity of its labors that accompanies civilized food. The lower jaws of the later English are smaller than those of ancient Britons, or even of Australians. The jaw of the modern woman remains intact, which can be demonstrated without resorting to scientific principles. Just oppose a woman in some pet scheme, and the practical illustration will become manifest.

Let every person who earns money and is desirous of saving a few dollars a week or month, call on the General Agent and join the P. C. S. S. The Society will issue to you a certificate of its stock, and a pass book, same as you get at a bank, and then you can run in to the local collector every Saturday, Monday, or pay day, and deposit what you can spare.

The P. C. S. S. furnishes homes to the people upon terms so easy as to place it within the reach of every man to own his own home. No man permanently employed and earning good wages should be content to live in a rented house, but should join this Society and pay his rent toward the purchase of a home of his own.

Five hundred dollars at 7 per cent. compound interest will double itself in ten years; but you must get the $500. Six dollars a month in the P. C. S. S., or say $500 in seven years, will also double itself, or nearly so. And you can raise the $6 a month.

Rent paid into a landlord's coffers yields no return, except probably 4 per cent. bonds for his lordship. Rent paid into the P. C. S. S. is refunded to you in several years in the form of a deed to the property.

The P. C. S. S. receives extra payments from shareholders as deposits, which are subject to sight check at any time. The Society pays 5 per cent. annual interest on any deposits which remain with the Society for three months or more.

One of the bridesmaids was softly crying during the ceremony, and her escort, nudging her, whispered: "What are you crying for? It isn't your wedding." "That's why I'm crying," she said.

The P. C. S. S. offers the safest and most profitable form of investment known to modern finance.

The plan of the P. C. S. S. is just, reliable, equitable, mutual and coöperative.

FLASHES.

The wealthy boor is a social nuisance.

The song of the Alliance farmers: Give us some offices.

A fresh face on a young lady is uicer than a fresh tongue.

Nearly all the fish liars have returned from their outing.

Misery and the society girl are alike—they both love company.

Some men of elegant leisure would have a better standing if they worked.

The usual college courses in these days are the racecourse and watercourse.

Poverty is not a crime, but it is devilish inconvenient when we want to have a vacation.

We could all be great men if we could be measured by the great things we intend to do to-morrow.

We all have axes to grind, but none are willing to turn the grindstone; we expect the other fellow to do that.

Most of our very religious and extremely good people have an idea they serve the Lord by wearing a long face.

There are very few of us who would like to be judged by our own thoughts. Even the alleged men of God would hesitate if called on to confess the truth with this regard.

After the Boodlers.

Superior Judge Wallace, of San Francisco, in impaneling the Grand Jury, on Thursday, delivered a masterly charge. After calling the attention of the jurors to their duties with reference to the municipal and county offices, he went into a broader field and said:

"It is asserted that at the late session of the Legislature the county of Colusa was territorially dismembered as the result of legislation procured by means of bribery; that part of the bribe was a promissory note for $20,000 now or lately held on deposit in this city, its payment to await the ultimate effectuation of the measure. It is rumored—indeed, become notorious—that at the same session a corrupt combination—a trust—was formed by a majority of the members of the Senate of the State to sell the legislation of that body to purchasers for a price, and that a like combination for a like purpose was organized in the Assembly, indeed, a suit to recover a sum of money which is said to have been a part of the gains made in that business was lately brought and actually tried here in this department of the court.

"I advert to these matters merely by way of introduction to an illustration of the instruction which I now give you; which is, that for you such rumors are facts; not facts, of course, upon which to find any indictment or indictments of anybody—that can only be done after legal evidence of the commission of the offense shall have first been obtained by you; but these rumors are facts upon which your inquisitorial investigating power is put in motion. You must investigate them, you must inquire concerning them; not in a formal or perfunctory manner; not as those who, having eyes, see not, or, having ears, hear not, but, in the language of your oath, diligently, with assiduity and with the intent and purpose, in good faith, to find out the truth; and if the commission of the offense be proven, to present an indictment or indictments here against the guilty parties, provided the offense be one which, to quote the statutory phrase, is 'triable' in the city and county."

The foreman of the Grand Jury is ex-Congressman Barclay Henley, a lawyer of distinguished ability. Among the jurors are James M. McDonald, ex-Supervisor; Jeremiah Lynch, ex-Senator, and James Denman, a prominent educator. The composition of the jury, generally, is good, and we confidently await their action—it will be salutary. There should be a penetration of the black cloud that obscured the last days of the Legislature. If men are guilty as charged, there should be an exposure; if they have been unjustly accused by such men as Faylor, an opportunity should be afforded for them to clear their skirts. The people are interested in matters of so much public moment; the ax should fall and the guilty not spared.

The P. C. S. S. meets with universal success because its plan is equitable and its purpose is to encourage industry and to promote thrift and economy among its members, providing a medium through which their savings may be invested to the greatest advantage consistent with safety.

The birds have nests and the beasts of the field have burrows or dens in which they live year after year, and for the retaining of which they will use strength, instinct and cunning; and man should have a home which is his. You can get it by uniting with the P. C. S. S.

The popular method of saving money is to purchase five or more shares of P. C. S. S. stock.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Last week we gave an extended notice of the appearance of Russell's Comedians in The City Directory. On Monday night this excellent combination will give this farce comedy at the Metropolitan. For pure and delightful fun the company is particularly adapted. The only wonder is that this city should be cut off with a one-night engagement.

Our friend Charley McClatchy, who is recognized as one of the best dramatic critics on the coast, and who never slobbers over a performance or an actor, must have been a little cross-grained on Monday night when he witnessed the Lyceum Company in The Charity Ball. Charley must have experienced a burr under the crupper, which caused him to kick clear over the lines and traces. When a surly critic desires to find fault, there is always something he can seize upon as a pretext, and our young friend thought there was a little scheme of advertisement interpolated in the scene between "Cain," the ragged and hungry little waif, and Ann Cruger (Georgia Cayvan), wherein she soliloquizes on the wretchedness of Cain, and witnessing the wonderful capacity for food of the poor little waif, says: "His stomach must be made of Goodyear's rubber to contain such quantities." This the critic jumps on with both hands and feet, as an advertisement. It could not be of any benefit, as Goodyear's patent expired many years ago by limitation. Why, half a century ago Daniel Webster argued the Goodyear patent cases in the United States Supreme Court and the patent expired ten or fifteen years ago. We think the reviewer is in error when he urges that this was an advertisement.

The Poe Cottage.

By the telegraph we are informed that one Bryson has purchased the building known as the Poe cottage, near the village of Fordham, and that he intends to preserve it in memory of the lamented poet, Edgar Allan Poe, whom he admired. A large sum was paid for the cottage, and $50,000 has been set apart to keep the house and grounds in order. It was in this place that "The Raven" was written. It is old-fashioned in exterior appearance, and quaint to a marked degree in the interior arrangements. The cottage is admirably preserved, and is just about as it was in the days of Poe. The propriety of this act of Mr. Bryson cannot be questioned, but it will strike one that a little less sum could have been expended with better result to have saved Poe from the misery he suffered in his later years, and from the death he miserably encountered. Poe is regarded as among the finest and most original poetical genius produced by America. He was born in Boston, February 19, 1809. Left an orphan at a tender age, he was adopted by John Allan, a rich merchant, who had no children. He was carefully educated, but in early life developed a strong passion for gaming. In 1829 he published a volume of poems, and afterward entered West Point, but drank to excess, and was cashiered March 6, 1831. Incurring the displeasure of Mr. Allan he was disowned and thrown on his own resources. He adopted literature as a profession, and his success was marked. In 1845 his famous poem "The Raven" appeared. On October 4, 1849, he left Richmond by train for Baltimore, where, a few hours after his arrival, he was discovered insensible in the street, and on the 7th he died in a hospital. It is stated that he was made drunk on an election day, and made to cast his vote by designing persons. As well, however, pass his weaknesses, and give credit to his masterly intellect.

Thought He Had the Right Man.

A traveler, with a large-sized jag, got on the train at Buffalo, called the sleeping car porter, gave him a dollar, and said:

"I'm always ugly when I'm drunk, and it makes me fighting mad when waked up early in the morning, but I've got to be in Rochester to-morrow morning, sure. When we get to Rochester I want you to get me off the train. Never mind how ugly I am. Use force, if necessary, but get me off somehow, if you value your life."

The porter took the dollar and promised to put the gentleman off at Rochester. Next day when this gentleman woke up it was broad daylight, and the train was just entering Albany. Foaming with rage he hunted up the porter. That unlucky individual was found in a badly demoralized condition—one arm broken and tied up in a sling, two ribs fractured, his skull cracked, and both eyes draped in mourning. Paying no attention to these things, the traveler swung his fists and shouted:

"Blankety blank your soul! Why didn't you put me off at Rochester?"

The porter seemed stupefied for a moment. Then he faltered out:

"Be you the—the gentleman I promised to put off?"

"You bet your — life I am!" yelled the infuriated traveler.

"Well den, fo' de Lord, boss, I—I wonder who dat gentleman was I put off at Rochester!"

Tobacco Culture in California.

Tobacco was first produced in California, on a small scale, in 1854. The production was in the counties of Santa Clara, Napa and Sonoma. The product was inferior and only fit for pipe-smoking. In 1858 a fair quality of the weed was produced in Sonoma and Napa valleys, a temporary factory was established at Sebastopol, and a small quantity of inferior grade plug tobacco manufactured. Lack of care and knowledge led the tobacco to undergo a fermentation and spoil. In 1860 two colored men who had been employed in factories in Richmond, Va., purchased some of the best cured leaf and manufactured a limited amount of plug chewing, which favorably compared with the average Virginia grades. They ceased the business for want of capital. In 1863 Weil & Co., tobacco merchants of San Francisco, purchased all the fair leaf tobacco available, and some 100,000 pounds were shipped to San Francisco. A temporary factory was erected and about 50,000 pounds of light-pressed natural-leaf plug tobacco made. The same firm also manufactured Kilickinick smoking tobacco of good quality. Their goods met with ready sale, but owing to the fact that California growers ceased to produce the necessary leaf, the factory was closed down. About this time J. D. Culp, of Gilroy, produced a superior quality and manufactured smoking tobacco and a few cigars from tobacco grown by himself from Havana seed. These compared favorably with the average Havana-filled cigar with Connecticut wrapper. Mr. Culp then proceeded to grow tobacco on a more extensive scale. After three years' crops had been produced a stock company was organized, and by 1873, when the various companies that had been organized were consolidated, the business became of considerable importance. In 1873 they made up their tobacco into cigars as a test. They planted 300 acres in tobacco, 100 acres of Havana seed for cigars and the rest for filling and smoking. That year they made over a million cigars and a large quantity of plug, fine-cut, long-cut and granulated tobaccos, all of which found a ready market. In 1874 they planted 500 acres, and in 1875 they were at work in earnest. New buildings were put up and the old one at Gilroy enlarged. At one time that year they employed 785 men at the Gilroy cigar factory alone. That year the manufactured product was worth $600,000, and it was readily disposed of, about one-half finding market in California. In 1877 the cigar factories of the company were burned and all the appliances and raw material destroyed. The affairs of the company were wound up and its business ceased. Since that time little tobacco has been produced in the State, as no inducement has been held out to growers. Of late there has been a demand for California leaf by Eastern manufacturers, and it would seem the time is near at hand when tobacco culture will be revived here.

A few vines, lovely roses, little odds and ends of conveniences that add so much to home—make it attractive and worth living in—make it a sure enough home, which keeps the tired merchant or worker contented with his family, and the plan of the P. C. S. S. will help you get that home.

A Matter of Etiquette.

A question which the etiquette books should settle is the proper behavior on being caught in a lie. This would interest persons of both sexes. It is the custom of one woman to play a brave hand on such occasions. "I've found out that lie you told about me," said an irate person to her one day. "Have you, really?" she promptly answered. "Which one?"

This is sure to stagger. But it takes nerve to do it. Another person—a man this time—had an acquaintance rush in upon him one day like a cyclone. "Look here, you rascal you!" he shouted, "you've been lying about me!"

"Then thank your lucky stars, man, that I haven't told the truth about you," answered the other, coolly.

It was a woman this time. Another woman had said to her: "Is it possible that you have been lying to me?"

"Lying, my dear child? Lying? Why, I am self-confessed and self-approved the worst liar in the world. I have lied a great many times to you. If I hadn't lied all the years of my life religiously and conscientiously I should have been untrue to all my friends and all the obligations that life has brought to me."

Gail Hamilton somewhere tells this story about a friend of Mr. Lincoln, who, in the first convention that nominated Mr. Lincoln for the presidency, had both worked and spoken with great effect for Mr. Lincoln. Afterward, in thanking him for his enthusiasm, Mr. Lincoln said to him: "But I am afraid, Colonel, that when you spoke for me you prevaricated just a little."

"Prevaricated, Mr. Lincoln?" said the other; "prevaricated? Why, I lied like the d—!"

The P. C. S. S. allows 5 per cent. on extra deposits and 6 per cent. on withdrawals.

P. C. S. S. stock is popular with young people, and with ladies, who thus accumulate for some specific object. It induces habits of thrift, prudence and industry, is an unequalled temperance factor, and in every way an effective moral as well as material agency for the benefit of all stockholders as well as a power in the general growth and prosperity of the community.

The art of money-saving is an important part of money-getting. Without frugality no one can become rich; with it, few would be poor. The first effort to save is the most difficult. Only begin by taking a few shares of P. C. S. S. stock and it will soon become easy.

The P. C. S. S. offers unequalled inducements to the mechanic, laborer and persons of small income, desirous of putting aside sums of money from month to month where it will give him the largest return consistent with safety.

How many life failures, how much ill-health, hardships and misery could be averted if every man would learn to save a little money! Men who are thrifty and saving will always find the P. C. S. S. ready to help and encourage them.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber
and Elder Flower
Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

Cures the worst cases of Freckles, Sunburn, Sallowiness, Moth Patches, Pimples, and all skin blemishes. Price, $1.50. Harmless and effective. No sample can be sent. Lady Agents wanted.

The Druggist in this city who first orders a bill of my preparations will have his name added to this advertisement.

My preparations are for sale by wholesale druggists in Chicago and every city west of it.

THE STATE FAIR OCCURS AT SACRAMENTO
SEPT. 7TH TO 19TH 1891
THE EVENT OF THE YEAR.
DON'T FAIL TO EXHIBIT.
WRITE THE SECRETARY
FOR INFORMATION.
FRED K. COX,
PRESIDENT.
EDWIN F. SMITH,
SECRETARY.

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans
Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

The Very Sweetest.

What are the sweetest things of earth?—
Lips that can praise a rival's worth;
A fragrant rose that hides no thorn;
Riches of gold untouched by scorn.
A happy little child asleep;
Eyes that can smile though they may weep;
A brother's cheer; a father's praise;
The minstrelsy of summer days.
A heart where never anger burns;
A gift that looks for no returns;
Wrong's overthrow; pain's swift release;
Dark footsteps guided into peace.
The light of love in lover's eyes;
Age that is young as well as wise;
An honest hand that needs no ward;
A life with right in true accord.
A hope-bud waxing into joy;
A happiness without alloy;
A mother's kiss; a baby's mirth—
These are the sweetest things of earth.—
[Ladies' Journal.]

Nap's Duel.

Emile Fontaine was the handsomest young man in New Orleans in the old dueling days, and was engaged to marry Adele Lawson, a famous Southern beauty. Her father, the Colonel, was very much opposed to dueling, and when Emile had challenged a former rival, Mr. Lawson vowed that he must give up the fight or give up the daughter. He decided to brave the city and keep Adele.

From that time he suffered a martyrdom—was snubbed as a coward; and Adele at last, finding that she shared the universal opprobrium, broke the engagement.

Fontaine felt this keenly, and, seeking out the man he had challenged before to fight, he shot him dead and left the city. After that he became known as a famous Indian fighter and did some brave deeds on the frontier.

Stopping one night at a border ranch, I heard that the daughter of the house had been carried off by Comanches, and that "Nap" Fontaine, as he was now called, had gone with the father in search of them.

Before daylight a great shouting and laughing and crying and hurrying of negroes and rattling of dishes and glasses, convinced me that the party had returned successful. I would like to have joined in the happy, noisy meal, but being an entire stranger, I felt some delicacy in the matter. In the morning I was sorry I had not waived ceremony. Nap and his men had gone into camp three miles away and three miles quite out of our course.

The girl was frightfully exhausted, and her flesh severely cut with the rawhides with which she had been tied; but, somehow, I hoped that pretty Nellie Wharton's trouble might be the saving of Nap Fontaine; for as she spoke of him her eyes filled with a tender light, and all her face flushed as she recounted the bravery of his hand-to-hand fight with her captor.

"He's a number one fighter," said the grateful father, "and he has 'lifted more hair' than any twenty men on the frontier. If he hefts an Indian he is as sure of his scalp as the day is sure of light."

"He must like to fight," I said.
"Why, yes. It's meat and liquor to him. And he is like a lobos wolf—he gets better at it the longer the tussle lasts. And that's a fact, ma'am."

Soon after this he got fighting enough. The war broke out and he went, with a few men who stuck to him, to Fort Inge and offered his services to the government. His intimate knowledge of the lower part of the Mississippi caused him finally to be sent there to command some important operations. Things had then changed very much in New Orleans. The rich had then become poor, and most of his old friends were dead or scattered or impoverished.

Still all who had any acquaintance with him eagerly sought his protection and favor, for now he was a great man and had won a famous name, and been intrusted with much authority. He never sought Colonel Lawson at all, and it was therefore a surprise to him when he received a letter from that gentleman placing his home at his service. The offer was accompanied by an invitation to dinner, which, for some reason or other, he chose to accept.

He was now a strikingly handsome man, but Adele was much changed. Beauty in that climate has but a short, brilliant life. She was an old maid, thin, sallow and faded, and no arts of her splendid toilet could disguise the fact. She saw at once that her old lover was not inclined to retie the knot she had so rudely broken, but the opportunity was very likely to be her last one, and she could not bear to let it slip away unimproved.

"General," she said softly, as she led him to the warm, scented orange grove, "can I hope that you have forgotten and forgiven the past?"

"Yes," he replied sadly, but very coldly; "it is, I hope, both forgotten and forgiven."

"And—and, Emile—Emile, dear—"

"You must not call me by that name, Miss Lawson; I have forgotten it, too."

"What shall I call you, then? 'General' seems so cold."

"You may drop my title, then, Miss Lawson. I care nothing about it. Out on the far Western prairies they call me Capt. 'Nap,' and I got to love the name, especially since a little blue-eyed wonder of a woman whom I saved from the Comanches has begun to call me 'Nap dear.'"

"Then I can't call you that name?"
"No; she might not like it; and I would not grieve her for all the gold in Christendom. The Tonkaway Indians called me 'Big, Black, Whistling Thunder,' but you could not call me that either."

Adele faintly laughed, but she was sick at heart, for she knew that she had bought her desolation and her disappointment by her own falseness and folly.

"When people profess to have principles," she said bitterly to her father, "they ought to stand to them. For my part, I think it was cowardly to fly from them as from one's colors on the battle field."

"Why do you blame me, Adele? A man has got to do as the world does; though I must say the world has a trick of punishing the very crimes it creates. But it is different with a woman. It admires a woman who has heart enough and pluck enough to stick to her lover through thick and thin. I always thought General Fontaine was right, and I was a fool to mind your complaints." That was all the consolation she got. She went slowly and sadly to her own room, while the refrain of an old song went moaning through her heart and would not be silenced:

If she will not when she may,
If she will not when she may,
When she will, she may get "Nap!"

For the general had made an excuse and gone home early, having a letter to write to blue-eyed Nellie Wharton, who a few months afterwards became Mrs. "Nap" Fontaine.

Some Bill of Fare Puzzles Translated Into English.

Many cook books and bills of fare at hotels contain terms not generally understood. Here are some of the most common of them, with their meaning:

An blue—Fish dressed so as to have a blue tint.

Aspic—A meat jelly for covering game pies, served with boned turkey, etc.

Au jus—In the natural juice or gravy.

Bechamel—A sauce made from meats, onions; and sweet herbs.

Baine-Marie—A saucepan for boiling water, into which a small pan fits.

Braise—A manner of stewing meat.

Blanquette—A preparation of white meat.

Bouilli—Beef stewed slowly and served with sauce.

Bouillon—French soup or broth.

Bisque—A shellfish soup.

Civet—Wild fowl or game hash.

Compote—Something applied to fruit stewed in sirup, and sometimes to pigeons and small game.

Consomme—A strong gravy used for enriching other gravies and soups.

Caramel—Sugar boiled until the moisture is evaporated, and then used for ornamental dishes.

Croustion—A sippet of fried bread.

Entree—Side dish for the first course.

Gateau—A cake.

Jardiniere—A mode of stewing vegetables in their own sauce.

Maigre—Dishes made without meat.

Meringue—Pastry made of sugar and white of egg beaten to a snow.

Nougat—A mixture of almonds and sugar.

Pate—A small pie of oysters or meat.

Pot-au-feu—The common bouillon of the French peasants.

Quonelles—Force meat balls.

Roux—Thickening for sauces.

Saute—To mix or unite all the parts of a ragout by shaking while frying.

Salmis—Game hashed when half roasted.

Piece de Resistance—The principal joint of the dinner.

Serviette, a la—Served on a napkin.

Sorbet—A sherbet.

Souffle—A very light pudding.

Veloute—White sauce.

Vol au vent—Light puff tarts filled with meat.

Every dollar you deposit with the P. C. S. S. begins to earn money for you from the time you pay it in, and if you are persistent it does not take so long a time as you might think to accumulate enough money so that it will earn as much as you do, and money works every day if you give it a chance—every day and every night, rainy days and sunny days, holidays and working days, whether you are asleep or awake, at work or at leisure—money is constantly bringing an income to the thrifty depositor in this Society.

Costs Must Be Paid.

A Georgia editor, who is also a Justice of the Peace, recently granted a quarreling couple an absolute divorce.

"Mr. Bailiff," he said, "collect $3 costs out of the couple."

"I can't do it," said the bailiff, mournfully, "They hain't got a cent."

"Then," said the editorial justice, "fetch the ordinary before me and make him issue a license, and I'll marry the woman to the first man who has got $3. This court can't live on air. Step up lively, gentlemen."

Every cent paid your landlord for rent is a nail pulled out of a home of your own. The system of the P. C. S. S. enables every man to provide a home for his family.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than

J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M Streets.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL LOAN OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar
Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.

— ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED —

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON

CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

Clippings from Harper's Magazine.

A WOEFUL STATE.

One of Philadelphia's most prominent physicians, while in Virginia recently, wandered into a village court-room where a trial was in progress. As he entered, a dispute which was being carried on between the prosecution and defense as to the advisability of admitting a certain letter as evidence was ended by the judge desiring that the letter be given to him, in order that he might decide the matter. When the letter was handed him, he put on his spectacles, turned it first inside out, then upside down, then sideways, examining it carefully all the time.

"What's the matter with the judge?" asked Dr. Blank of a by-stander. "Why doesn't he read the letter?"

"Pshaw!" said the individual addressed, with a world of contempt in his tone, "he can't read readin'-readin', let alone writin'-readin'."

AN EXPENSIVE COMMODITY.

A gentleman traveling in Sweden asked the price of smoked salmon.

"One dollar and a half," replied the clerk. "What does fresh salmon bring?" he inquired, in wonder.

"About thirty cents a pound at retail."

"And what is labor worth in the smoker-ies?"

"Something like twenty-five cents a day, I believe, sir."

"Then," said the traveler—"then smoke must be very dear here."

A MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE.

Nubar Pasha, the famous Egyptian statesman, no longer possesses the magnificent watch, all encrusted with precious stones and embellished with the imperial monogram, which Napoleon III presented to him as a souvenir of the Empress Eugenie's visit to Cairo in 1869. The manner in which he lost it, or at least the story which he tells of its disappearance, is characteristic of Oriental notions of morality. Nubar, while Prime Minister, was accustomed to place his watch in front of him on the council table at meetings of the cabinet. These invariably took place in the evening. One night, while the cabinet was in session, the electric light suddenly went out. A minute later, when it shone forth again, the Premier noticed that his watch had vanished. The doors, as usual, had been locked from the inside at the beginning of the meeting. No one had stirred. But the watch was gone. Nubar gazed, first of all, at the spot where the watch had lain, and then inquiringly at each of his colleagues in turn. All bore his searching look without flinching. "Gentlemen," he finally exclaimed, after an awkward pause, "at the beginning of the council I had my watch down in front of me, in accordance with my usual custom. The light went out a few minutes ago, and during the darkness which prevailed, the timepiece disappeared. The door is locked, and no one has entered or left this room. I am ready to believe that the removal of the watch has been due to a practical joke, or else to a moment of temporary aberration on the part of one of the ministers present. I will now press this button so as to extinguish the light once more, and I am certain that when, a minute later, the light is turned on again, the watch will be found restored to its accustomed place." Nubar thereupon extinguished the light. A few seconds later, when it shone forth once more, the place previously occupied by the watch was still vacant, and the jeweled inkstand presented to him by King Victor Emmanuel had likewise gone, presumptively to join the watch. He was never able to recover either the one or the other.

A BIT OF LEGAL REPARTEE.

Sir Henry Hawkins, the only British judge who combines in his person a membership of the Supreme Court of Judicature and a membership of the Jockey Club, was accustomed before his elevation to the bench to practice a great deal in the Court of Admiralty. The presiding judge at the time was the popular Baron Channel, who, though renowned for his legal acumen and for the facility with which he disentangled the most knotty problems of marine law, was never able to master the letter H. On one occasion he was engaged in trying a case in which a vessel named the Hannah had been run down just off Dover by the steamboat Wave. Mr. (subsequently Judge) Huddleston represented the owners of the latter, while Mr. Hawkins appeared for the proprietor of the Hannah. Throughout the trial Judge Channel persisted in referring to the lost vessel as the Anna. Finally, Mr. Huddleston, gravely rising from his seat, pulled his wig down over his forehead with a gesture that was habitual to him, and after slyly winking at the opposing counsel, remarked, in his most solemn and impressive manner: "There appears to be a good deal of doubt about the name of this vessel which my clients are asserted to have run down. Some call her the Anna, and others again the Hannah. Perhaps my learned brother Hawkins will be good enough to state definitely for your Lordship's information what the real name of this unfortunate vessel was." Before Huddleston had time to resume his seat, Hawkins was on his feet. "Certainly, my Lord," he replied, with equal seriousness and unction. "The real name of the vessel is the Hannah, but the H has been lost in the chops of the Channel!"

The people of Thessaly were the first to break horses for service in war, and their proficiency as equestrians probably first gave rise to the ancient myth that their country was originally inhabited by centaurs, fabulous creatures supposed to be half horse and half man.

There are savings banks where money is received in small sums, and if left long enough will accumulate; but the best in every way—the safest way—to procure a home from small savings is through the P. C. S. S.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,

Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

	Assets.
Ætna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

S. A. WOLFE,

Photographic Art Parlors

426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK

Restaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET,

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B. PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

Capital Coffee House

J. H. BRUNING, Proprietor.

509 K STREET,

Between Fifth and Sixth, SACRAMENTO.

Fine Coffee, Tea or Milk, { with Pie or Cake, } 10 Cents.

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Grubler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

JUST AT HAND

The latest New York styles in Note Paper, Visiting and Correspondence Cards, Card Envelopes, Mourning Cards and Paper.

Tinted Note Paper and Correspondence Cards are now the rage. All the latest tints in stock.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

FOR SALE.

SECOND-HAND REMINGTON TYPE-WRITER for sale. Inquire at 1714 M street.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 18th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

A. P. CATLIN,

Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated August 13th, 1891.

JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and 1/10 Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for $1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. DODDY, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. DODDY, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jy16-8t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Emile Cavellier, Wm. T. Hynes and David M. Bemus, greeting:

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 23d day of June, 1891, in which action GEO. SMITH is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To determine the adverse claims of the defendants, and each of them, to the north half of the east sixty feet and the east fifty feet of the south eighty feet of lot two, in block between I and J, 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and for costs of suit; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take default against you and each of you, and apply to the Court for the relief prayed for.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 23d day of June, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, Attorney for Plaintiff. je27-9t

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

PANTS to ORDER

$3.50 to $13.50

SUITS TO ORDER

$15.00 to $50.00

1000 Patterns to Select from.

GABEL the TAILOR

426 J STREET.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON.

ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 604 J Street,

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNEL,

LAWYERS,

Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER,

Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,

920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

THOMAS W. HUMPHREY,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,

630 J Street, Rooms 7 and 8.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW

Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Sam Didn't Holler.

It was election day in the town, and I noticed that almost every white man was armed. There was no appearance of any trouble with the negroes, and I finally asked a man who was carrying a big revolver under his coat-tails what was apprehended.

"Can't allus tell jist how this yere will turn out," he replied. "I've dun bin down on the Greens fur fo' y'ars, and they've dun bin down on us jist the same. Thar's the Parkers; they ar' dun down on the Jacksons. Thar's the Lowrys; they ar' dun down on the Browns. Thar's the Perkinses; they ar' dun down on the Weltons. Can't tell when somebody will begin to shute, you know."

"You don't mean there is danger of a regular fusilade right here in the street, do you?"

"Can't tell. I've seed it afore. Got a bullet in that hand right about yere two y'ars ago. It all depends, I reckon."

"What does it depend on?"

"'Bout as much on my boy Sam as anything. Sam's got two guns and is powerful reckless. I wanted him to stay home, but he wouldn't."

"And what will Sam do?"

"Can't tell. If somebody will take Sam over to the saloon and fill him up so he can't shout thar won't be any row yere to-day. If they don't, and Sam should take it into his head to jump out on the squar' and begin to holler, nobody can be held in. Sam is powerful on the holler. Never heard him, did ye?"

"No."

"Wall, he fust flaps his arms and crows like a rooster; and you kin hear that crow a mile away. Then he a-ounces that he was b'on on the top of the Rocky Mountains, and is used to grizzly b'ars, chain lightning, cyclones and all that. Then he offers to out-run, out-jump, out-holler, out-wrastle, out-cry or out-fight any livin' animal on top the face of this yere airth. He works hisself up by degrees, and when he gits to the climax you kin hear him three miles, if the wind is right."

"Aud that brings on a row?"

"Suah to do it, sah. Thar comes Sam now, and I'll be clawed if he doan' look jist like he was gwine to begin hollerin'. Will ye do me a favor?"

"I will."

"Take him over and fill him up. I'm a runnin' fur office to-day and doan' want no row."

Sam and I were introduced, and we adjourned to a saloon. It took an hour's time and a full quart of whisky to lay him in a corner, but he was there for all day; and when the father came in and saw him he shook hands and said:

"A thousand times obleeged. Sam will lose his vote, of co'se, but we'll count out ten niggers as an offset, and thar won't be no shuttin' to speak of; jist a little shuttin' now and then—jest 'nuff to sorter make 'em realize that this yere is 'leckshun day an' our ticket is gwine to git thar by over fo' hundred majority." M. QUAD.

Improved Sport.

He sat on a horse-block on Amherst street with a long fish-pole in his hands, says the Buffalo Express. The line was dangling in a little stream of muddy water which flowed along the gutter. He had an umbrella over his head, a rubber coat on, a box of bait beside him and a pipe in his mouth. It looked like a boyish trick for a man of 50 or more, so it was natural for a neighbor who passed to stop and inquire:

"What are you fishing for?"

"Oh, anything that I can catch."

"But you don't expect to catch anything in that gutter, do you?"

"Perhaps I may."

"Why, there are no fish there."

"How do you know?"

"How do I know? Why, it stands to reason. You must be crazy."

"No," slowly drawing his pipe from his mouth, "I'm not crazy; I'm the sanest and most sensible fishing crank in the city of Buffalo. I used to be like all the rest. Every time there came a rainy day I would tramp off ten or fifteen miles into the country, or row away down the river, for the fun of sitting all day with this pole in my lap and buying some fish at a market to take home at night. I'd get all tired out and be unfit to work for a week afterward. Now, I'm not going to do it any more. I'm going to fish right here from my own horse-block, in front of my own house. Here's a stream of water, and I can have just as much fun, and get just as many fish—if I buy them—by staying here as I can by going anywhere else. I save the tramp and the work, which are likely to lay me up. I can go in the house at noon and get a hot dinner, instead of a cold lunch carried in my pocket; and I've made up my mind that this is the best way to go fishing. If you'd try it you'd think so, too."

The plan of the P. C. S. S. is simple, inexpensive, easily understood and effectual. There is no better method, at present, at least, by which a home can be obtained. There are hundreds of neat, pleasant, happy homes in every city which never would have been obtained but for these Savings Societies.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Imperial GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,
Between Fourth and Fifth,
SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6-50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11 02 A
3-05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8 10 P
12-50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4 20 A
4-30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7 00 P
7-00 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7 40 A
10-50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9 35 A
11-50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2-25 A
11-00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5-25 A
3-00 P	Oroville	10-30 A
3-00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10 30 A
10-35 A	Redding via Willows	4 00 P
2-50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11 25 A
4-35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12 30 A
6-50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11 05 A
5-40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10 40 P
3-05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8-10 P
*10-00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	6 00 A
10-50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2 50 P
10-50 A	San Jose	2 50 P
4-30 P	Santa Barbara	9 35 A
6-50 A	Santa Rosa	11 05 A
3-05 P	Stockton and Galt	8 10 P
8-50 A	Stockton and Galt	7 00 P
4-30 P	Stockton and Galt	9 35 A
11-50 A	Truckee and Reno	2 25 A
11-00 P	Truckee and Reno	5 25 A
6-30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2 30 P
6-50 A	Vallejo	8 10 P
3-05 P	Vallejo	8 10 P
*8 20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2 40 P
*12 15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10 20 A
*4 45 P	Folsom	*8 00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen'l Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE LUMPS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1891.

No. 28.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Whither are we drifting? The city authorities are in a quandary regarding the unfortunate situation of the municipality. For several years there has been a disposition on the part of the city trustees to lean on shadows. Indeed, so great is their weakness that they have depended in a full measure upon the chimerical impulses of that reform institution called the Improvement Association. If we were called upon to arraign this association, there are several counts in the indictment that the people could easily substantiate. It is probable that these men are over-zealous and honestly sincere in their plans, puerile and weak as they are, and that the trustees have been in a measure forced to adopt the course laid down by their suicidal policy. One of the first counts in the indictment is, that these "reformers" became wedded to the schemes of the city creditors, and lent absolute aid and comfort to them by throwing wide open the treasury doors to their unholy demands. Through their behests all resistance was abandoned against the creditors, and the water-works and its revenue given over bodily to these cormorants, which has almost resulted in the destruction of this great source of revenue to the city. The second count in the indictment rests upon the bitter opposition to the adoption of a new organic law for the city, whereby our system of government could have been made to conform to the State Constitution, and become abreast of the times, and to meet the requirements of the progress made in governmental affairs within the past 28 years. It was through these "reformers" that we are now drifting along under the tattered wreck of the government craft. They should be indicted by public sentiment for abolishing our awnings, and not substituting something in their places. About the only things done by this association have resulted in a detriment to the well-being of the city. It might not be out of place for the trustees to have a watchful eye upon the only good measure that was consummated by these "reformers": that is the subject of street improvement. It would do no harm to see to it that the $100,000 voted by the people is properly appropriated. We have already said we believe these gentlemen to be honest, but then they are so very zealous in behalf of the revenues of the city, that a little care should be taken that we are not placed further in the power of our bond creditors.

For building great castles and imperishable public improvements—by resolutions—commend us to these public-spirited men. We assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that, had these men kept their influences from the trustees, the city would have been much better off. Certain it is that we might have been able to resist the assaults of the bond creditors on our water-works, at least, not to mention the other raids on the treasury. Whenever any attempt has been made to break the shackles fastened upon the water-works we find these men, to a man, advising against such a course. So completely are they a part of the funded-debt scheme that the first consideration is, "How are we to add to this fund?" It is one of the strange things in governmental affairs that the masses will blindly follow these chimeras and permit the affairs of state to go to wreck. Is it not time that the Trustees should assert themselves? Here are our water-works about exhausted and ready to go to pieces, and the only attempt to protect them is by supplicating the bondholders, who have the city by the throat, asking for a loan of the interest money for a few months, which supplications are treated with indifference. Would it not be more in accord with right and independence to take the revenue from the water-works and place only what lawfully belongs to the creditors in the interest and sinking fund; namely, 55 per cent. of the net proceeds? Thus there would be what law and reason says belongs to the city—the expenses of running and repairing the works being deducted before any apportionment of the water rents. But we are answered that the city treasurer will not apportion this money on any other basis than 55 per cent. of the gross revenue, because he fears that he might be guilty of contempt of court. Well, if this is the only reason, the Board of Trustees should find some person who is not so squeamish about contempt, and who would obey the orders of the board. Let the bondholders cite one officer for contempt; let us have the contest over again. That is what we want. It is to be released from the ruinous decision of the bare majority of the old Supreme Court that we demand this. It is useless to think about conducting our water-works on the basis of giving 55 per cent. of the gross revenue to the creditors. It is not law or common sense to say that we shall pay all the running expenses of the water works, keep them in repair, and when worn out build new works, and then give 55 per cent. of the entire revenue to the interest and sinking fund. The present Supreme Court will hold this view of the case, judging from the written opinions of two of the ablest judges now on the bench. Gentlemen of the Trustees, you must do something to protect the water-works, and that quickly; and the best that can be done immediately is to order only 55 per cent. of this net revenue into the sinking and interest fund.

There is now an agitation of the question of providing suitable accommodations for the city prison, the Police Court, and the attendant officers, and the proposition is made to rent property for a term of years; it might be termed a temporary expedient. We are disposed to regard this matter with a view to the future. The city of Sacramento has a population of something like 28,000; there will be the natural increase consequent from its location and natural advantages. It has been, notwithstanding the depression of the bonded indebtedness, that within the last ten years very considerable extensions have been made in the way of improvements to the east and to the south. What will the next ten years develop? It is apparent the city will need a public building suitable to its increased wants. As it is now we are practically without accommodations for the officers of the municipal government, its court and its jail. The city prison has long been condemned as a death trap; the quarters of the municipal officers are in the second story of the brick shell of the new water-works building. What we do need, if we had the present means, and what we will have to have in a very near future, is a city hall, a city jail, and a police court-room. The proposition now made is to rent a building for a term of years for prison and police court purposes only. The rental and the cost the city will be put to to appropriately fit it for the purposes intended will be very considerable, and at the termination of the lease there will be nothing left in the way of property to the city. We esteem the wiser policy will be, as we have arrived at a contingency when the proposition is forced upon us as it is now, to take time by the forelock. We should own rather than rent, and should look to what the future demands of a considerable population will be. Time will come when Sacramento city will require more real estate, and when it will need appropriate public buildings. We suggest that for the present the property we now own, known as the Perry Seminary, embracing a frontage of 135 feet on I street, and a depth of 160 feet, would be available, and that the building could be remodeled at little expense to meet the present demands. There have been attempts by the Board of Education to dispose of this property, as we think very unwisely. Unquestionably the city will be better off by keeping it for public uses than to sell it, and in years to come purchase other ground for public purposes at an exaggerated price. If the city authorities will conclude to utilize this property, and the building that stands upon it, for municipal purposes, the most of the site upon which the old water-works building is now located could be disposed of to advantage, and the proceeds would more than pay the expense of the remodelling of the Perry Seminary building and the construction of a jail. Enough of the Front and I street property should be retained upon which a police station could be erected to accommodate prisoners arrested in the lower portion of the city and those in transit. Those arrested could be taken each morning to the central jail for trial.

There is another proposition that appeals with favor—to purchase the old Pavilion building at Sixth and M streets. That includes a full quarter of a block, and we understand that it can be purchased at a reasonable price, and that time will be given to pay for it. The property is desirable, and time will come when it will be needed for city purposes; for the present it could be used to accommodate the municipal government; and if it should be abandoned for that purpose, the Board of Education could make good use of it. We make these suggestions in that we believe there will be a wastage of money to rent when we can own. The proposition with a city of endurance is different from that of a private individual who seeks only a temporary location. It strikes us as apparent that what we use for public purposes we should own, and that upon our own soil we should make such permanent improvements as the demands of progress will require.

There is now some talk of expending $6,000 or $8,000 in fitting up temporary quarters for city hall and city prison. It seems that misfortunes never come singly. With the water-works in bad repair, we have no place for the conduct of the city business or the detention of the city prisoners. Now is a time we need action on the part of the trustees; not hasty and ill-considered action, but such as is tempered with a knowledge of the science of government. It is never good policy to expend public money on other people's property not in the public interest. We have been too long without a proper city hall, and the trustees might as well face the music now, and take the initial steps in securing a permanent place for the administration of municipal affairs. It will not do to expend any large sum of money for temporary relief. Better bear a little longer our ills, and finally have some plan worthy of the city.

It looks as if the matter of doing something practicable with regard to the disposition of the sewage of this city will not be accomplished. That it will be simply a wind explosion seems now assured; there will be but an addition to the long line of tornadoes that have swept over the city, leaving a trail not so pronounced as the cyclones of the western States, but as destructive. There is something of dignity in a cyclone; its emanation is from the supreme power, and its coming and destructive action is not heralded through the medium of public meetings and the local press. With the petty outbursts that periodically sweep over Sacramento there is a condition different. Much of good is promised; there is a general feeling, when time has lapsed and nothing accomplished, that there exists in the city a large sprinkling of visionists, who seemingly are adept at plans and figures, but who are in the background when it comes to an intelligent solution of an important problem. It would be unjust to criticize with severity the various speeches made and the numerous articles that have been printed suggesting improvements and advancement, the propriety of which will be readily admitted by a student in our grammar schools. But it is, at what time may we look for their culmination? For some years there have been periodical agitations of the question of the disposition of the sewage matter that is thrown out in this city. There is no question but that in a subject of so serious importance action should have been taken years ago. Under the present imperfect system we are dumping most of our refuse upon the lands of people below us; that they have a righteous cause of action against us for maintaining an intolerable nuisance will not be questioned. Perhaps there is no community in the nation that could say with more ill grace than Sacramento to the people between here and Snodgrass slough that they should uncomplainingly accept the filth we flow upon their properties. But a few years since our people embarked in expensive litigation against the hydraulic miners, and were successful in establishing the doctrine that one must so use his property as not to injure that of others. In the action against the Gold Run Mining Company the gravamen was that by mining by the hydraulic process there resulted injury to properties in the Sacramento valley—the waters of the rivers were polluted, navigation obstructed, health menaced, and lands rendered unfit for production. We can see little distinction in the matter of sewage disposition that is now presented; we are injuring others. If there is a distinction in the two cases, it is against the people of the city. Courts will unquestionably hold that however populous a city may be, there is no warrant to destroy the holdings and impair the health of those who are located within the destructive influence of its offal. And against us is the patent proposition that science, not at all modern, has demonstrated that cities as unfavorably situated as Sacramento are disposing of their sewage matter with benefit to their population, and without incommode to their neighbors. We are told that cities in the East so dispose of it within their limits that the elements of offense are removed, and that profit is derived from its conversion to fertilizers.

We have no faith that the people of this city will do anything practical in this regard, and feel that the agitation that has been had has resulted in more harm than good, in that it has advertised our sanitary situation unfavorably. Other cities in the State, so far as natural conditions are concerned, are similarly situated: Stockton, Marysville, Woodland and many others. More economical it would be for the State to authorize the creation of a board of competent men to carefully consider the subject, with regard to each city and town. Let them advise themselves from the experience of cities and towns in Europe and in the East and comprehensively report. Good would certainly result, and the expense of gathering the needed data would be trifling to the people. We feel the recommendations of a board of scientific men will be regarded; they will carry more weight than the suggestions of men who have superficially read up and formed conclusions that may or may not be adaptable in a particular community. The importance of intelligent activity in this matter cannot be questioned. No city can hope to be healthy with its soil permeated with the filth ours naturally is—standing on almost a dead level plain, with little fall for drainage. The time for the meeting of the next Legislature is remote, and we would suggest that in the meantime coöperation could be had with the official representatives of other cities and towns and a plan adopted whereby first-class engineering ability could be secured, and the expense of the suggestions and plans jointly borne. While the aggregate cost may be great, when divided it would be a trifle to the people of each community, and it will result, as such means always have, in the acquirement of technical knowledge that will be practical. We are of the opinion that the amounts expended for medical attendance and drugs, and those incident to the present unhealthy condition of the city, will much more than offset the expense to us of scientific experts and the cost of placing a modernized system that will relieve the embarrassments under which we now labor. Little good in this regard will be accomplished in public meetings. The Trustees could, perhaps, meet it by a proposition to coöperate with corresponding municipal heads in other cities and towns. No harm will come from an attempt to secure unity of action, and if there will come consent, the cost will be no burden upon the people of any particular place.

There has been much said and written within the past year about the general disquiet in Europe. Prognostications of war have been rife, and foreign correspondents have had Russia, England, France, Germany, Italy, Bulgaria, Turkey, and other countries on the eve of hostilities. Whatever may have been the situation in the Balkan country, or the inflammable condition of Central or Northern Europe, the wan and weird spirit of hunger has hoisted the white flag of peace. The failure of crops in the agricultural regions of Europe has knocked all the propensity for fighting out of those diplomatic powers, which were heretofore striving to obtain some advantage over their weaker neighbors. Their people are crying louder for bread than for cannon, and the contest with that gaunt invader, hunger, is about all the war that can be attended to this year. There is too much diplomacy with the great crowned heads of Europe to engage in war when the wolf is at their doors. The rulers have as much as they can attend to in answering the complaints of their hungry subjects, without the arbitrament of battle with other powers. Next year when there will be full granaries and full stomachs, we may look out for the clash of arms.

Relics of America's Prehistoric Age.

Among the most prehistoric remains yet discovered in this country are those found in Pinal county, Arizona. They are the Casa Grande (Great House) ruins. They were the object of special investigation by Mr. Morrison in 1889, and Congress in that year appropriated $2,000 for the purpose of repairing and protecting the ruins. Special Agent Morrison, who was sent from Washington to examine into their condition, reported that these venerable relics of prehistoric America stand in a great undulating plain, about midway between the station of Casa Grande and Florence, seven or eight miles from the Gila river. He said that the front of the main building measures sixty-six feet and the width forty-three feet. The height of the first story is thirteen feet, the second nine feet, and the third and fourth stories are eight feet each. The greater part of the upper story has disappeared. The walls are between four and five feet thick, and the material of which they are constructed is almost indestructible concrete made of fine gravel, sand and cement, closely resembling the granolithic now used in Washington. This was laid in the walls in great blocks. One of these measured seven feet three inches in length, four feet three inches in width and two feet six inches in height. The walls, both inside and out, were plastered with cement, which yet clings to them with wonderful tenacity, that on the inside being as smooth and glossy as the best hard-finished interiors of the present day. All of the rooms, of which there are four now intact, are of a uniform buff color, which is very pleasing to the eye. The largest of the rooms is 34x9 feet. The extreme height of the building is nearly forty feet. The lower story is filled up with crumbling debris, and the drifting sand of the plain, to the height of thirteen or fourteen feet. The holes in which the ceiling timbers were placed are plainly visible, but every particle of wood had been carried away by relic hunters, and the disintegration of the walls had been so rapid of late years that, if measures were not taken to strengthen them, the entire mass would soon fall into a shapeless ruin. The report said that for miles around the mysterious Casa Grande many great mounds, now hardly distinguishable from the desert sands, bear indisputable evidence of having been at some far remote period the abode of busy industries. Mr. Morrison was convinced that the Casa Grande was not used either for religious or warlike purposes. The superiority of its architecture, it having outlived all the other structures by which it was surrounded; the numerous small apartments into which it was divided, and the elegance of the interior finish, all point to the conclusion that it was the palace of the king, or chief, who governed the primitive Americans who inhabited the vast domain ages before Aztec or Toltec. The most ancient of the traditions of the Pimas and Papagoas, who yet live here, where their fathers have lived for centuries, allude to them as "the ruins." The earliest historic record we have of Casa Grande was given by the famous Spanish cavalier and explorer, Cabeza de Baca, who discovered it during his journey across the continent about 1537. A few years later the famous explorer, Don Francisco de Coronado, governor of New Galacia, who led an expedition into New Mexico, described the ruins as being four stories high, with walls six feet in thickness. As a proof of the great antiquity, he says that the Pima Indians then (350 years ago) had no knowledge of the origin or history of the town which had existed there. It had always been a ruin to them and their ancestors. Fathers King and Mange, who visited the place in 1694, found the remains of the great edifice. They also gave an account of twelve other ruins in the vicinity. Father Pedro Fout, in 1777, found them in much the same condition. He describes the main building as an oblong, facing the cardinal points of the compass. The exterior walls extended from north to south 420 feet and from east to west 260 feet.—Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine for August.

The Wisdom of the Ancients.

Homer has long ago been proved to have had a most accurate knowledge of geography, and he was so good a botanist that under the name of lotus, he described accurately the rotob date, and the intoxicating wine still made from it by the Berbers of Djerba Island. Ptolemy, after being scoffed at for ages as a compiler of romances, is at last vindicated as a first-rate geographer of Africa. The latest discoveries tally very exactly with his supposed fabulous descriptions. It is conceded that the great African lakes were known to the early Portuguese long before Burton, Speke, Stanley and Baker rediscovered them, and Dr. Schlieter has just demonstrated that not only was Ptolemy acquainted with the general outlines of Eastern Africa, but that his Eastern Nile lake was the Victoria Nyanza, and his Western Nile lake, either the Albert Nyanza, or lake Albert Edward. Kilimanjaro and Denia are, of course, his mountains of the Moon. It is quite certain that his Rhaptus was the Pangani river, and Rheptum Ras Mambo Mku, a cape south of Zanzibar. It has also been shown that the ancients were familiar with Melina, the Tona river, Brova and many other places that are claimed as very modern discoveries. But the ancients knew some other things besides geography. In poetry and philosophy the Greeks stood at the head, as they did in sculpture, architecture, and many other arts. But long before the Greeks came the Egyptians, who have surpassed the people of every later age as engineers and mighty builders. Then they were engravers and cutters of gems in a manner so excellent that their work has never been outdone, and the relics and memorials which they have left behind suggest that they were the possessors of arts and sciences which even today have not been equaled. Yes, those old fellows of 4,000 and 5,000 years ago were not such fools as are many who are accustomed to boast the superior excellence of modern civilization. They were mighty men, those who built the pyramids, and set up the obelisks, and regulated the floods of the Nile, and established a rich and powerful empire that overshadowed the nations both East and West. They were mighty men, too, whose history is told in the Hebrew Scriptures, and so were they who gave to posterity the art and literature of Greece. And they were all used as instruments to preserve and perpetuate the revelations of a divine theology, to be inherited by the peoples of this latter age. Yes, those ancient peoples were giants intellectually, and generations that must come after us will arise to testify to the fact.

Famous Horses of the Greeks.

The Greeks were genuine lovers of horses. It was claimed that Poseidon struck the earth and produced the horse—a poetic way of saying that horses were first imported into Greece from beyond the sea. Homer's favorite appellation for the Greek heroes is "tamer of horses." And almost every page of the Iliad shows that Homer's admiration for the chieftains is almost matched by his enthusiasm for the firm footed coursers, the fiery steeds, the horses famed in war. No common animals were these of the Greeks and Trojans.

The horses of Æneas were of the stock which Zeus the thunderer gave to Tros. The horses of Rheus were as glorious as the sun; the snow was not so white, the wind not so swift, as they. The horses of Dromed seemed to be in the air as they flew along; but of all the horses that proudly distinguished themselves in that famous war, the wooden horse took the lead for efficiency. It was the wooden horse that gave Troy to the Greeks.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

After a long absence the popular Kate Castleton will return here with The Dazzler, and it is safe to predict that she will be tendered an enthusiastic reception.

One of the novel scenes that Walter Burridge has painted for A Peaceful Valley, Sol Smith Russell's new production, is a set representing a farm on the steep-sloping side of a mountain.

Charles W. Hoyt rewrote portions of A Parlor Match, and introduced a new ending for the second act, this summer. Mr. Evans spent several weeks at Mr. Hoyt's country seat, Charleston, N. H., while the work was in progress.

Time was when the actor was a kind of licensed vagabond, "his days all past in jeopardy and jest." With us he may rank as a gentleman, if he so will, and his once despised vocation may be conceded the rank of a profession which, if not learned, is at least deemed illustrious.

Advertising being part of the player's stock in trade there is always present the temptation to get it by making himself or herself notorious. This is a cheap and easy road to fame, and it seems to be a profitable one. But it is death to legitimate art, and it is quite unworthy of men and women claiming for their business the rank of a profession.

The United States is the only country in the world that boasts of a national organization of musical composers. The society consisted originally of four members, and to-day, after three years of untiring zeal and labor on the part of a few, the club contains 114, among whom are enrolled most of America's ablest composers. This membership list represents twelve different States of the Union, from Massachusetts to California, and from Michigan to Virginia. New York is the headquarters of the society.

A comedy of American life, entitled The President, will be produced with the well known comedians Frank David and Frank Lane in the two leading parts. Preliminary performances have been given in Jackson and in Grand Rapids, Mich., and the results indicate a very emphatic success. The story deals with a series of interesting complications, is ingeniously developed and moves with briskness and certainty. The characters are cleverly individualized and contrasted, and the dialogue is crisp, sparkling and humorous. After a week in Chicago the comedy goes to the Pacific coast under a contract with Leavitt.

When Marie Halton returned from her first visit to Paris she secured a position as governess in a family where she taught the little folks French, dancing and music. She had a pretty little voice, and the children got very fond of her catchy tunes, and would listen to them with delight for hours. One day it occurred to the small governess that if the children were so pleased with her songs, big folks might not find them uninteresting. She looked at herself in the mirror and made up her mind that she would go on the stage. The next day she called on Jimmy Duff, who was worrying and working over the rehearsals for the production of Dorothy. Miss Marie Halton was in her best bib and tucker, and she was in dead earnest. She told him that she had just come from her home in Paris, that she could sing and dance and act, and wanted an engagement at once. "Any bit would do until she was settled in this strange country." Well, Jimmy Duff, sometimes Duffy, was charmed. He engaged the little girl on the spot, gave her a copy of the score she was to sing, and told her when to report for rehearsal. When she got home she began to do a lot of thinking. She had never been on a stage in her life, and didn't know any more about acting a part than she did about making an electric lamp. It so happened that there was an actor in her boarding-house, and the day of the rehearsal she went to him for some points. He said he hadn't any time even to talk to her as he was in a hurry to get to the theater. On his way out he added, never dreaming that the girl would take him seriously: "Just go to the theater and put on all the airs you can imagine; bully the chorus; sass the stage manager; kick at the conductor; find fault with the opera and the theater, and everybody will think you are a great artiste." Well, Marie Halton carried out his direction to the letter. When she appeared on the stage she pushed her way across with her head in the air and that fine scornful expression on her face she afterwards turned to account, unfastened her cloak and threw it into the hands of one of the principal male singers. Then she began to feel the draft and ordered some window closed before she caught her death. When the conductor impatiently rapped the music rest with his stick for that new soprano she jumped to her feet, marched down to the footlights, with her eyes flashing defiance and her nostrils dilated, and asked if he expected her to ruin her voice for him. The farce worked like a charm. Everybody really took her for a singer of experience and ability. Her success dates from that time.

Book Chat.

This did not occur in any Sacramento library: Reader (to the attendant at the desk)—"Have you the 'Autocrat of the Breakfast Table?'" Attendant—"I think so, but am not sure. Is it a cook book?" Probably that attendant would call the same author's "Over the Teacups" a lot of recipes for steeping tea. She is married now, and we shouldn't be surprised to find the books in her kitchen library.

I watched a sail until it dropped from sight
Over the rounding sea. A gleam of white,
A last far flashed farewell, and, like a thought
Slipt out of mind, it vanished and was not.

Yet, to the helmsman standing at the wheel,
Broad seas still stretched before the gliding keel.
Disaster? Change?—he felt no slightest sign;
Nor dreamed he of that dim horizon line.

So may it be, perchance, when down the tide
Our dear ones vanish. Peacefully they glide
On level seas, nor mark the unknown bound.
We call it death—to them 'tis life beyond;

The initial defect of most of our poetry is that our poets do not consider whether or not they have a good subject with which they are adequate to deal. Another defect is its tendency to extraordinary prolixity. Akin to this there is the cultivation of obscurity and the copying of the artificialities of the French verse. When we have got rid of the devastating pests of obscurity and triviality; when our poems are made lucid and not immensely long; when our poems have some human interest, and pedantry has been rooted out, and we follow Greek models in the spirit and not the letter, and rely more upon metrical harmonies than upon the mere jingling of sound, we shall have attained the poetry of the future.

The young woman of to-day does not read books; she skims paper-backed novels of the fourth rate instead. If you doubt, look over any news stand, from New York to San Francisco, and see what literature you find there. The newsman knows what his customers want, and supplies it. And his customers are mainly young women. Every book publisher has felt the effect of this tendency. It is no longer possible to count confidently upon a good sale for a masterly book of essays or other book belonging to the higher forms of light literature. Even novels of the better class—those that are worthy of a cloth binding—are no longer in much demand. The reading public of our time wants trash, and it gets it in lavish abundance. The effect upon the book trade concerns the publishers and dealers mainly. There are other effects of greater consequence. Our young women are growing up ignorant of literature and with perverted tastes which will prevent them from repairing the fault in later life. They do not read books that make them think, and, for the most part, they do not want to think. They want to kill time with the least possible intellectual exertion. To this there are exceptions, but this is the rule. It is an age of trash.

Professional Chat.

The action of President Balmaceda in removing all the old judges and appointing new of his own stripe, will not be received with favor by the world at large, as this act is in direct violation of the Chilean Constitution, which declares that judges shall be appointed for life, and shall not be removed, only after trial and sentence.

When a rich man calls in a physician he does not expect that he will be presented a bill for medical services. In fact, no such thing as a doctor's bill is known in Japan, although nearly all the other modern practices are in vogue there. The doctor never asks for his fee. The strict honesty of the people does not make this necessary. When he is through with a patient a present is made to him of whatever sum the patient or his friend may deem to be just compensation. The doctor is supposed to smile, take the fee, bow and thank his patron.

Here is a portion of the examination to which an old lawyer recently told that he was subjected when he applied for a license to practice. The oldest member of the examining committee interrogated him: "Are you familiar with any game of chance?" "No, sir." "Don't you know how to play any game of cards?" "No, sir." "Surely, you understand euchre?" "Never heard of it before." "It can't be possible you never indulged in a game of draw poker?" "Yes, sir; it can. I am a member of the church, and don't know one card from another." "Well," after a long pause of astonishment, "young man, we'll give you a license, but how in the world you're going to make a living for the first two or three years after you start to practicing law is a mystery to us."—Chicago News.

The Berlin courts have decided that a lover may cut off his sweetheart's tresses and yet escape with a light sentence, even if it be proved that the act was inspired by malice and with a view of spoiling the young lady's outward appearance. This decision has been arrived at in the case of a girl who last week sued her ex-lover for "conspiracy," alleging that he robbed her of her blonde locks with the object of injuring her personal attractiveness to such a degree that she would be glad to accept his offer of marriage. The case, it appears, has been before several courts, and finally reached the Supreme Court of the Prussian realm, which decreed that 'Arry might cut off 'Arriet's 'air, but could only be punished for assault and sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

Since eating is the only subject on earth, or in the heavens above the earth, or in the waters under the earth, which engages the thought of every human being, daily at least, it is not surprising that wise men have said many notable things about it. Robert B. Roosevelt, ex-Minister to The Hague, who is known as the successor of Sam Ward, the most famous bon vivant of America, is perhaps as notable an example as can be cited to-day of the quickening, generous impulses which good living gives to a broad nature. He has said: "More divorces are due to an ill-regulated kitchen, when the trouble arises with the man, than from an ill-regulated morality. No husband ever deserted or abused a wife who always gave him a perfect dinner, unless driven to it by dire force. Good cooking is at the foundation of all happiness, for there can be none without it, and it should be taught in our public schools."

The author of "Ten Thousand a Year" could not have been a dull man; yet the wags of the time made a common butt of Samuel Warren, and he is the hero of many ridiculous stories. But, with all his innocent conceit and apparently stupid pomposity, he could hold his own in the war of wits. On one occasion he was severely attacked by Roebuck at a debating society of which both were members when they were young. "In the course of his harangue," Sir William Fraser tells us in his "Disraeli and His Day," "Roebuck had stated that it had been imputed to him that he was a 'Party man.' He repudiated that statement; he denied it with indignation. He was not a party man; he never had been a party man; and he swore by everything that he held sacred that he never would be a party man. This produced considerable applause, in the midst of which Roebuck sat down. Warren, with that solemnity of demeanor with which his friends were familiar, rose, and, in a deep voice and with the impress of earnestness, said: 'My learned friend has just informed you that he is not a party man, that he never has been a party man, and in terms of fearful adjuration he has sworn that he never will be a party man. Mr. Chairman, what my friend has said reminds me painfully of the words of Cicero, "that he who belongs to no party is probably too vile for any." As they left the debating-hall an hour later, the two men, as is the custom of their profession, walked away together in apparent amity. Roebuck complimented Warren upon having made a good hit, and added, 'I am fairly well up in Cicero, but I cannot form the least idea where I shall find the passage you quoted.' 'No more have I,' said Warren. 'Good night!'"

Dixon C. Williams—not reverend, as he is not an ordained minister, and dislikes to be called by any other title than plain Mr.—whose reputation as an evangelist is almost world-wide, and second only to that of the Rev. Sam Jones, is one of Tennessee's most original and unique products. He began his evangelical career, says the Memphis Commercial, about ten years ago, and previous to that time he was a sort of horse fancier and patent medicine fakir. He acknowledges the charges, and still claims that he made a pot of money out of the medicine business, which was conducted on the brass band and free lecture principle. Mr. Williams, in addition to the reputation of having saved more souls than any other man or minister in the country, is also an all-round financier. He is the manager of the extensive street railway company at Anderson, Ind., where he now lives, and occasionally dabbles in politics, sufficiently to get a rapping from the Republican newspapers of that city, which accuse him of saving souls at so much per soul. He is a magnetic talker, and can reach an audience quicker than almost any other man now engaged in that work. "I have had some very funny and still very serious, to me, experiences since I have been engaged in this work," said Mr. Williams to a reporter. "Not long ago I went to Princeton, Ind., to hold a revival. I reached town the day before the meeting was to open and went into a barber-shop to get shaved. I was sitting in the barber's chair and about half my beard had been taken off when the man in the chair near me, who had been telling very dirty tales and experiences, jokingly remarked: 'Wait until that Tennessee preacher gets here and I'll get religion.' No one in the shop knew I was the evangelist until the remark of that man was made, when I said: 'Barber, let me up. I'm the man that fellow over there is waiting for, and we mustn't wait to finish getting shaved.' With that I got the 'tough' down on his knees, and we held a prayer-meeting right there, which resulted in not only the man referred to, but all the barbers becoming converted. We then resumed our seats and the shaving operations were completed."

NOTES.

At a recent auction sale of odds and ends in Paris, a woman bought an old mattress in which she discovered 14,000 francs in gold.

Albert M. Johnson has been very ill during the past two weeks. He has recovered sufficiently to be again on the street, but is by no means a well man.

Miss Louise Imogene, Guiney, the poetess, thinks nothing of walking twenty miles a day.—Exchange. Neither do we; we have more important things to think about.

The breaking up of the large lauded estates in Ireland under the operation of the Land Purchase Act is the dawn of better days for that country. The small-farm system has worked wonders in France.

Kentucky keeps up its record in deadly family feuds. Another bloody tragedy is recorded at Georgetown, Ky., where two families proceeded to butcher each other over a quarrel about stealing watermelons.

Governor Markham has returned from his vacation much improved in health. He has taken up his temporary residence at the Sutter Club. The Governor's family will for the present remain at their home at Pasadena.

The parsons are all taking their summer vacations—synods, conventions, conferences and revisions of doctrine are forgotten. You can, consequently, believe the same theological dogmas for two months without falling behind the times.

A fellow in Chico tried to revive the custom of the halcyon days in California when it meant fight to refuse to drink when asked. This fellow failed in his endeavor to make his intended victim drink, and received his quietus with a bullet.

King Humbert of Italy is candid enough to acknowledge his inability to sing acceptably; and so, when Queen Margherita wears spectacles, which he detests, it is said he threatens to vocalize unless she immediately removes the obnoxious glasses.

What is the secret trouble that bothers the indignant bowels of the Chronicle that it is not pleased with Judge Wallace's way of selecting a Grand Jury? Is anyone connected with that paper interested in some of the business that may come before that jury?

There is great dispute in France and Prussia as to which country possesses the garment known as the "holy coat." Notwithstanding the difference of opinion as to the identity of the ancient relic, both sides adhere to the same creed of "I believe in the 'holy coat,'" etc.

The situation in Chile has evidently become somewhat "chilly" for the insurgents. From last accounts Balmaceda has been victorious, although the opponents deny this result. It is about time this strife was brought to a close, even if outside powers have to interfere. Say, our own brigade staff.

The old Duke of Nassau, who, at 75, is hale and active, has a fortune of $25,000,000, and is consequently set down as the richest prince in Europe. Much of his wealth represents the profits of the Wiesbaden casino, and for many years the royalties from the gaming tables there flowed into his pockets in a veritable stream of gold.

The new Sheridan statue for a West Side park, Chicago, is to depict the famous cavalryman as he appeared when "he dashed down the line with a terrible oath." The sculptor cannot render the terrible oath in bronze, but if the statue is like most of the statues in the Chicago parks the people who look at it will supply that feature.

Clinton L. White continues to make it lively for the liquor dealers. He does not rest satisfied to have a judicial determination in one or two suits, but insists on piling Ossa upon Pelion. Yesterday fifty-six new suits upon attachment were commenced in Justice Starr's court. There are now about 250 actions, civil and criminal, upon the calendars.

The chief article of creed held by the believers in what has been called the "Religion of the Great Pyramid" is that the pyramid was built for the purpose of revealing a number of remarkable truths to the human race. They hold that it was designed by direct inspiration of the Deity, and was meant to embody important astronomical and mathematical truths for the instruction and guidance of future times.

The State Fair this year is already an assured success. Everything is combining in favor of a splendid exhibition. The weather forecast is excellent, and which will add to the comfort of the visitors. The racing programme will be the finest in years. There will be no lack of fine stock of any character at the park. Exhibitors at the Pavilion are preparing their exhibits already. Many visitors are now in the city, attracted by the exhibition. The directors of the fair are busy arranging for the splendid exposition.

The Associated Veterans of the Mexican war will celebrate the forty-fourth anniversary of the entrance of the American army into the city of Mexico on September 14, at San Francisco, by a grand banquet and reunion at Pioneer Hall. The old "Vets" will assemble and doubtless recount their exploits and fight the old battles over again. Capt. Wm. M. Siddons showed us one of the elegant cards of invitation issued for the occasion.

It would seem in good taste California should withdraw all claims for representation in official capacities at the World's Fair. It seems there has been a comedy of blunders, and that the action of those who have forced themselves into positions to represent our people has been reflective upon the State. As well let the representatives of California be deposited; the interests of the State will be in better keeping in the hands of less ambitious people in the East.

A young man in Berlin, Germany, stepped upon a cherry, slipped, fell against a window and had his nose almost severed from his face. A young lady came forward and acknowledged that she had carelessly thrown the fruit upon the sidewalk, and her parents promptly defrayed the bill of the surgeon who stitched on the young man's nose, amounting to 450 marks. Now romance should lead the victim and the cause of the mishap to commit matrimony and give some novelist the cue to "The Romance of the Cherry."

Wong Gee On, the Chinaman who forged the stamp of B. M. Thomas, an officer in the U. S. revenue service at San Francisco, is out in a published confession. Upon its face there is much of concealment on the part of the Chinaman. He adopted the usual subterfuge of his people when confronted with a charge of a violation of our laws, of professing ignorance of our regulations and our language. As a rule Chinamen are better posted on our public affairs and happenings, than very many whites, and their professed innocence will not deceive.

It is idle to spread upon the statute books enactments touching questions which do not need the regulation of fixed statutes for settlement. The great currents of human activity ebb and flow controlled by laws not written, subject to influences beyond the letter of the book, more wisely, more beneficially, than when weighted down by excessive burdens of over-legislation. Not every petty detail of life requires a law to guide it; not every trifling social problem needs a statute for its solution. Human intelligence does not require a leaning staff at every step.

John Catlin, son of Superior Judge A. P. Catlin, is having glorious sport killing California lions in Tehama county. The last one killed was a monster. When young Catlin first came upon the savage brute he was only about twenty five yards distant from him, and the lion gave a terrific scream, which, says John Catlin, "made his hair stand up straight." But the young sportsman's presence of mind never left him, and the bringing of his rifle to bear upon the monster was the work of an instant. The hind claws and hide of this large lion were shipped to Don Catlin in this city, who intends to have them tanned and mounted. These ferocious animals are quite plentiful in the mountains, and destroy a great deal of stock. They are dangerous customers for a fellow to meet in close quarters.

It is natural that with the very large crowds of people that come here to visit the great State exhibition, that the rough and thieving element is attracted. With the army of visitors always come the camp followers. There is no power, police or otherwise, can prevent this influx of the scum of society. The only thing that can be done to prevent these pests from doing any harm is for the citizens to be on guard, and see that no opportunity is afforded for plying their thieving occupation. The carelessness of the ordinary citizen is about as much the cause of these petty thefts as the propensities of the thief. See to it that there is no opportunity for the plying of their vocation and there will be less thefts. Let every citizen constitute himself a guardian of the peace, and our police force will have such assistance that crime will be averted.

Senator Sherman puts the silver question in a small compass when he says no man will be fool enough to deposit an ounce of gold for coinage, into sixteen dollars, when with it he can buy enough silver bullion and have it coined without cost into twenty dollars. The present coinage Act of Congress has already advanced the value of our vast store of silver in the treasury; it has given great activity to the production of silver; it has furnished increase of circulation; it has maintained the gold standard, while utilizing silver to the utmost extent short of demonetizing gold; it is the key to our exalted, almost prominent standing in commercial credit and national honor among the nations of the world; it treats both silver and gold, like all other commodities or production, as subject to the universal rule of being worth what they will bring in the markets of the world.

The trustees of the town of Woodland have found it necessary to construct a city hall, erect new water-works and provide for a system of sewerage. They did little talking, but determined to issue bonds, and made provision to pay the interest and the principal. The assessment roll showed a valuation of $2,653,544. To raise the necessary amounts the levy was made as follows: For city hall ($30,000), .0009; for water-works ($55,000), .0017; for sewerage ($45,000), .0014. Total, .004. This rate is equal to 40 cents on the $100, which will decrease annually, both as the payments are made and the profits of the water-works are turned into the sinking fund. "This tax," said a trustee, and he was endorsed by the rest of the board, "is simply nothing. Any taxpayer will save more than the extra tax by getting water at half the present rates; besides, with sewerage, he will have another great saving of expense."

Corea has good harbors and Russia wants them. The czar already possesses a long strip of Pacific coast lying directly east of Chinese territory. The fortified port of Vladivostok is at the very south end of this strip and just north of the Korean peninsula. China claims suzerainty over Corea, but it is of a very shadowy and intangible texture. The possession of Corea would give Russia a great vantage ground for the use of her fleets and armies against both China and India, and the purpose to annex that little kingdom as soon as the projected trans-Siberian railroad is well under way is hardly disguised. Russia is spreading over a great deal of territory, and the czar rules a badly scattered domain, poorly provided with the means of transportation and communication; still he is ever pushing on to military conquest for commercial advantages. Toward the Mediterranean Sea, the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, and southward along the Pacific, he is approaching.

The Farmers' Alliance.

Some of the ambitious are getting the Farmers' Alliance into hot water, and are earning for it ridicule. It is the old story: a new party is presumed by political moss-backs to become the winner. It rarely has been that one-ideal political organizations have lived to pass through the brief period of their infancy. We had in this State the New Constitution party. It rose as a rocket, fell as the stick. It is apparent now that the Farmers' Alliance is largely dominated by ambitious politicians. It seems in North Carolina a row has occurred between the Alliance and the Democratic party, and that President Polk, of the Alliance party, and an editor of a political paper called the Progressive Farmer, and a Democratic editor, engaged in personalities that have resulted in the passage of a challenge to mortal combat. The matter got out. Polk doubtless will not risk his life for the cause he is so vehemently championing, but there is no excuse to write him down as an unmitigated ass, as is evidenced by the following advice sent him by wire:

SAN FRANCISCO (Cal.), Aug. 26, 1891.

L. L. Polk, President N. F. A. and I. U., Raleigh, N. C.—MY DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: In the name of your family and of the Alliance and of civilization, you cannot afford to accept that challenge. It is a Wall-street plot to ruin us. The world has its eye upon you. Your brethren expect better things. Let your moral courage predominate.

J. L. GILBERT, Lecturer F. A. and I. U. Indorsed by J. S. BARRER, National Organizer.

We sympathize with Polk, whoever he may be. If he should be killed we would feel like reenlisting in the National Guard and braving an attack on Wall street. To Polk we calmly say: Restrain, else you may perish. Possibly, though, as your brethren say, the eyes of the world are upon you. Should you fall in combat you will be as much missed as the hole made by the plunging of a finger into the water in a basin.

Decline of a Great Journal.

The Call refers to the recent change in the heading of the New York Herald, where, in place of the name of "James Gordon Bennett" there appears the names of G. G. Howland, general manager; W. C. Reick, city editor; and John Henderson, night editor. Bennett lives in Paris, and is making a failure by attempting to control a newspaper from a distance. His father was successful in building up a great paper in that he attended to its business in the office; under the rule of the son the Herald has dropped out of the list of national newspapers. There are some papers in this State that are declining for the same reason—that their controllers dictate their policy from a distance and with little knowledge of the sentiment of the readers. That they will fall into the trail of the Herald is manifest. It may seem a man can have the brains to run a newspaper from out of the city of its publication, but that man has not materialized, and he will not.

A Reminiscence of Judge French.

The late Judge French was the personification of dignity and pomposity if anything in life. He could not brook familiarity or the semblance of hilarity in any one while communing with him. The least approach toward merriment he was immediately ready to resent with dignified reproof that taught the luckless offender a lasting lesson so far as the Judge was concerned; and one unlucky misadventure in that respect was sufficient to give the New England Apollo a horror of ever again meeting the man that could so far forget himself as to become familiar in the presence of that monument of perfect decorum. Especially in court was he most scrupulous and courteous in his manner to both judge, fellow-attorneys, jurors and witnesses, and no ancient Temple Bar ever made obeisance to the wool-sack with more knightly grace than did the late Chief Justice of Arizona to the judges of the District Courts when he was before them. But at times his stiff harsh methods subjected him to the practical jokes of the "boys" about the court-house, and more than once he has nearly wept tears of regret for the degeneracy of the human family when he found himself the object of a prank suited only to the play-grounds of children. One example will answer for the many. When Jim Lansing was sheriff and the old District Court-room was in the Masonic building, at Sixth and K streets, the occurrence took place. Judge French was arguing a law point to the court, and was, of course, absorbed in the matter. In the progress of the case it became necessary for the Chesterfield of the bar to get some papers from the clerk. He wore a bob-tailed, sack-coat, and as he leaned over the attorney's table waiting for the clerk to secure the papers, his position, for one so strictly decorous, presented a very amusing picture, for as every one knows Judge French was inclined to be more than corpulent. It was Jim Lansing's chance; Jim was the life of any crowd in which he ever appeared, and cared as much for the proprieties and amenities of high life as he did for the dead languages. This was his opportunity to play a joke, and he would not neglect it. He was merely an idle spectator in court that morning, as he had his bailiff there. So, quietly getting up, he started out of the room, and in doing so he had to pass by the leaning future Chief Justice of Arizona, who was waiting for the clerk to find the desired papers. With a quick move Jim gave the gentleman a peevish little pinch on the broadest part of his anatomy and left the court. With a sharp cry between that of a smitten child and bleat of a calf the luckless attorney fell, face down, over the table before him like a prostrate leviathan, and indulged in some vigorous kicking as if he expected another attack from the rear. The court-room was in a roar; the presiding judge, while struggling between the dignity that belonged to him and a desire to shout with the rest, stuffed his handkerchief in his mouth and assisted the bailiff, as best he could, to maintain order. Judge French, with a frightened look about him and his hand covering the spot assailed, slowly arose to his feet. The look of martyrdom that covered his countenance can never be forgotten by those who were present. Indignation and supreme contempt mingled with injured pride and vanity. With a voice trembling with passion at the insult he called on the court for protection, and delivered a most impassioned plea for the dignity of the judicial branch of the government. The court ordered the bailiff to make diligent search for the offender, and to produce him before the bar the next morning. But no one had seen the act, and no arrest was ever made. Curiously enough, Judge French never suspected Jim Lansing.

Sickly Sentimentality.

Warden Aull, of the Folsom State Prison, very properly replied to a foolish letter from a young woman of this city, who desired to open a correspondence with Milton Halligan, alias Gordon, who confessed active complicity in the murder of Robert Allen, and who is now serving time in the penitentiary. The Warden sensibly advised the sentimental creature to bestow her little sympathy where it will do credit to her intelligence—over the grave of the murdered man. Halligan has not yet received the punishment his terrible crime merits—a crime that is entirely without mitigation, so far as he is concerned. He saw Allen stricken to death with a blacksmith's hammer, and coolly knelt beside his bleeding form while Haley rifled his pockets. A man of education, he gloatingly told upon the stand the story of the robbery and the murder, and the incidents of his own mispent life. Aull perhaps did right that he did not publish the name of this candidate for admission into the Home for the Feeble-minded.

The question is often asked: "How can a man most systematically and surely acquire the habit of saving?" The answer is: By uniting with the P. C. S. S.

P. C. S. S. stock can be withdrawn and cashed through the Society at any time, with 6 per cent. interest.

FLASHES.

An affected simplicity is refined imposture.

A slow debtor is usually a man of promise and of note.

An unlucky word dropped from the tongue is difficult to recall.

It does not require long ears to distinguish the modern ass.

The city Farmer Alliance men have caused a shortage in hay seed.

The average working man wears out five ounces of muscle daily.

The idiotic style of lifting the hat to salute ladies should be abandoned.

When pleasure is at the helm, look out that the devil is not near the boiler.

Wealth without refinement produces more snobs than from any other source.

The fellow who never reads the papers is first to find anything about himself.

Is it not the very cheapest notoriety to keep up the so-called "social" column?

The Matter of the Water-works Management.

In the Bee of Wednesday was published a statement that the breaking of an arm of the air apparatus of the Stevens pump was due to the carelessness of the engineer on watch, Frank Daroux, and that he is retained in his position through political influence. This statement was made on the authority of Mr. Judd, presumptively the Chief Engineer of the water-works. The next day Judd rather backed out of it, and Daroux served upon him a demand for an investigation. In the demand Daroux, or whoever wrote the paper, said:

"Particular reference is made to your accusation that, referring to me, 'there is too much politics' in the water-works management, and that it was due to carelessness on my part that the arm of the air-pump attachment to the Stevens pump was broken on Saturday, August 22d."

As to the responsibility for the breaking of the machinery we know not, but there should be an investigation; that there is too much politics in the water-works management is manifest. Trustee Conklin sails into the fight, and expresses surprise that attention should have been paid by anyone to statements from Judd. He is thus reported:

"The trustee said that the talk about politics is simply nonsense. Politics or politicians had nothing to do with the appointment of Daroux or anybody else in the water-works."

Mr. Conklin is as well aware as any man in this city that politics has much to do with the management of municipal affairs. He has discussed the subject with the editors of this journal, and expressed regret that he felt forced to bend to a power that seems to have secured the contract to control our elections. We have had opportunity to observe the inside of politics during the three terms we have served as Chairman of the Republican County Committee. At the last State election it became manifest to us that an attack would be made upon William Beckman, the nominee for Railroad Commissioner, and that the purchasable vote would be controlled against him. We had several interviews with Mr. Beckman and other leading Republicans, and it was determined that we should, as chairman of the committee, observe the proceedings at the polling place on J street, between Third and Fourth, at which the white denizens of Chinatown and the habites of the disreputable resorts near Third and J would vote. The polls closed. An inspection of the ballots disclosed that Mr. Beckman had been systematically scratched. Daroux admitted to the writer and others that he and another pensioner on the city government were responsible for it. Personally, he had the right, and has it now, to marshal the I-street gin bums and the scruff of the lower end of the city to the polls; as the holder of an official position of responsibility, the impropriety will not be questioned. A few months afterward the delegation of the Second Ward made him a member of the city Republican committee. Mr. Conklin is not blind to the fact that the baser element of politics does control in large degree municipal management, and that it is a source of unjust expense to the people. Were it there would be contentment in the control of the city treasury alone, perhaps there would be no disposition to criticise; it, however, goes farther. In this matter it is apparent that Mr. Judd has spoken his own death warrant. We know him not, but are told he is an honest man. He has made his mistake. Rather than to criticise the palpable evils that exist, he should have secured a political pull.

The P. C. S. S. will help you to save your money, and by small and constant savings you can accumulate a handsome sum in a short time.

The P. C. S. S. loans only to shareholders in good standing, on first mortgage security on real estate.

NEW YORK LETTER.

The Heated Term—Summer Exodus—Long Branch—Employees' Vacations—The Decline of Baseball—Foreign Currency.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, August 22, 1891.

The misery of life in New York during the superheated term was beyond description. After a day or two of heat the wilderness of brick and mortar below Fifty-ninth street grows to be a regular oven. Below Central Park there are no trees except in one or two small squares, and the stone and brick walls hold the heat long after the sun has set and the night wind has cooled the more favored parts of the town. As a consequence the nights are terribly exhausting. Uptown and on the west side the conditions are somewhat better. Trees are to be found at moderate intervals, and the blocks of houses are not built so closely as to prevent the cooling river breeze making its way into each and every house. New York as a summer resort is all very well as a piece of "fine writing" from the imaginative dealer in fiction; between ourselves it is a tremendously uncomfortable place when the solid masses of stone and mortar of which it is composed become heated to the radiating point.

Everyone that was able left the city during the three days of extreme heat. To look at the conveyances leaving the city, a casual observer would imagine that the exodus was as complete as that of the Israelites of old. Every horse-car, railroad train and boat had its full quota of out-bound passengers. To watch the constant stream of overheated humanity flowing constantly in one direction gives one an impression of an infinity of resources only equalled by a first-class snow storm or an hour's profound pondering on the succession of rollers on the sea shore. As a natural consequence, the seaside resorts were overcrowded. The hills had their fair share of visitors, but the average man seemed to believe that a dip in the surf and a long drink on a veranda, cooled by the sea breeze, was the only remedy for his discomfort. One of the officers of the Long Branch boats told me that his boat had been loaded to its legal capacity on every trip. The hotel men, who have been complaining of the lateness of the season, enjoyed the rush and made the most of the opportunity of reaping an abundant harvest of New York shekels.

As a seaside resort Long Branch is as nearly perfect as it is possible to find in this vale of tears. It has been noted for some time as the home of Phil Daly's Club House, where the heaviest gambling about New York was carried on; for its gorgeous bathing suits and for the kindness with which it received the stranger within its gates. The glory of the first is somewhat dimmed by the closing of the Monmouth race track, some five miles from Long Branch, and the consequent exodus of those to whom the "lay out" and the track had more attractions than a fine beach and beautiful drives. The fame of the Branch for chic women and hospitality has in no wise diminished. It is truly a beautiful place; nestling along the bluffs between the huge hotels are the cottages of the summer residents, while everywhere the background forms a framework of dark green foliage. The sand is white and firm, the roll of the breakers is tumultuous, the roar of the ocean is imposing, and nature distributes her choicest gifts with a lavish hand on rich and poor alike. The majority of the folks you see are "nice people one would admire to know," as they say in Boston, and a "clubbable" fellow does not have to travel far before he finds someone to assist him in enjoying the freedom of shore life, and the absence of enervating heat.

The practice of allowing summer vacations to the subordinate clerks in the down-town offices has become almost universal. A few years ago it was confined to a comparatively few philanthropic business houses, but the value of the vacation from the business point of view has been recognized, and now it is not uncommon to find nearly half the regular force of clerks absent during the warm weather. Every Saturday crowds of pale-faced and tired-looking men may be seen hurrying toward the depots and ferries with overgrown grip sacks in their hands. Two weeks later these same men are to be seen returning to their work with bronzed faces, clear eyes and a springy step plainly indicative of elastic muscles. The majority spend their short vacation in some of the smaller mountain or seaside villages, where they find quiet boarding houses or small hotels, with rates suited to their means. On the whole, their two weeks, well spent, seem to have a far better effect on them physically, mentally and morally than the longer vacation of the man about town spent in the fashionable watering places. About the only man in New York who seems to get no rest is the head of the firm. He has to be at the service of his business from year's end to year's end, and it is indeed seldom that he is able to get a week's outing without worry or care. They appreciate the value of the vacation from a money stand point, however, and are generally very willing to grant leave of absence to their clerks, even if unable to go away themselves.

If there is anything that so plainly shows the peculiarity of the course of public opinion it is the baseball season of 1891. First-class players are just as numerous, and the great clubs are doing just as good team work as ever, but there is a notable lack of enthusiasm among lovers of the game. There is not the outpouring of the people to see a match game between the leaders that there was a few years ago, and which crowded from 15,000 to 20,000 excited men and women in the old Polo grounds, who could not have been more deeply interested in the game if the fate of the nation was at stake. It is rather difficult to determine the reasons for this apathy. Undoubtedly the mistakes and quarrels of last year have had much to do with the indifference with which the public looks upon its aforesaid favorites. Then the changes that have taken place in the teams have had something to do with it. Men who have been accustomed to yell for "Johnnie" or "Buck" don't like the idea of seeing their favorite players on opposing teams. The sentiment of hero-worship is still strong within us. It is safe to predict, however, that baseball will always be our national game and the favorite outdoor pastime of the American public. There is a dash and spirit in the game which appeals peculiarly to the American temperament. A successful cricket player may have as much skill and endurance as a good all-round baseball player. It is even possible to admire the fine plays in the noble English game. Football is exciting enough, but does not admit of brilliant strokes that appeal to the spectators. But there is nothing but baseball that will make a man dance on his seat, turn red in the face and yell like a Conanche Indian over a home-run or a three-bagger. The baseball crank falls asleep over cricket and considers football "no game."

It is no longer fashionable in the best society to drink heavily. Men of wealth do not think it necessary to have wine upon the table, and have set the fashion of putting the seal of approval upon business men who are abstainers. The change in this respect is remarkable to those who have watched the social happenings of the past fifty years in New York. It used to be believed that the reporter as well as the poet and essayist was most brilliant with the pen when drunk, but the habits of the old-time Bohemian are no longer tolerated on the press, and the man of education and brains, who dresses well, is refined in his manners, has steady habits, and shows himself the gentleman at home and abroad, is the only one who is in line for promotion. The clubs, which are an excellent thermometer of society, have taken measures to rid themselves of the "soakers" who have been a nuisance and an eye-sore for years, not only with a desire to be rid of decayed timber, but as an object-lesson to young members. The so-called temperance movement has had nothing to do with this. Society has simply come to the conclusion that excess in drink is ungentlemanly, and has acted accordingly.

A pretty widow, who was still on the sunny side of 30, and whose face was her fortune, became engaged to a gentleman living in Harlem, who was twice her age, and worth something like $400,000. After becoming engaged she found that he drank heavily, and so she threw him overboard and refused to marry him at any price. In the meantime he had made his will, by which everything was left to her in case she married him, and she was to have $37,000 if they were not married. Upon his final rejection he went to Europe, and has recently died there without altering his will. She will receive the $37,000 without opposition or question. Some of her friends, including his relatives, think she should go into mourning for him; but she refuses, saying that she did not marry him, and would not have done so, nor did she ask him to leave her any of his money. All the same, she counts herself a happy woman in that she no longer has to struggle with poverty, and can now choose a husband at her leisure and suit herself. It is a case in which, evidently, a man has nothing to say, and every woman must decide for herself whether it is a time for the habiliments of woe or the garment of joy—i. e., of fashion.

As a specimen of the cosmopolitan character of New York, I was offered an opportunity the other day of inspecting a collection of bank notes in the possession of a gentleman who does probably more business with the foreign element in our population than any other one man. There were specimens of English, French, German, Austrian, Italian, Russian, South American and Chinese currency. The European notes differed from our own principally in coarseness of execution and the poor quality of the paper on which they were printed. They looked easy to counterfeit. The notes of the various South American Republics bore a strong resemblance to our own both in size and design, except that cinnamon brown and blue were the prevailing colors. The Chinese currency is in red, white and yellow paper, with gilt lettering and gorgeous little hand-drawn devices. They bear a general resemblance to washing-bills, but I was assured that they were as good as gold in the flowery kingdom. The Austrian bill bears on the back an extract from the law against counterfeiting as a warning to evil doers. On the whole, the collection was extremely interesting as showing how many different nationalities exchange their money on our shores, and also as an evidence of the fear in which European governments are held to make such easily counterfeited currency a legal tender.

No financial institution will assist in building up a town, add material wealth to the community, or enable greater numbers to obtain homes of their own, who otherwise would be renters, than the P. C. S. S.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues, and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of ten cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

Cures the worst cases of Freckles, Sunburn, Sallow-ness, Moth Patches, Pimples, and all skin blemishes. Price, $1.50. Harmless and effective. No sample can be sent. Lady Agents wanted.

The Druggist in this city who first orders a bill of my preparations will have his name added to this advertisement.

My preparations are for sale by wholesale druggists in Chicago and every city west of it.

THE STATE FAIR OCCURS AT SACRAMENTO
SEPT. 7TH TO 19TH 1891
THE EVENT OF THE YEAR
DON'T FAIL TO EXHIBIT.
WRITE THE SECRETARY
FOR INFORMATION.
FRED'K COX.
EDWIN F. SMITH,
SECRETARY.

Fine Table
Wines
From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

WOMEN JURORS.

"I was purser on one of the German Lloyd steamers about ten years ago, and we had been making a smooth journey of it on one summer trip. It was just after the school commencement season, and three-fourths of the passengers were ladies. There was a young fellow aboard from Georgia, I believe, who was traveling alone, and who appeared to have a very cool supply of cash when he first started out.

"He soon became the victim, however, of one of the most unprincipled scoundrels I ever saw, a desperate blackleg, who made his living crossing and recrossing the ocean, and fleecing the passengers at cards.

"He was a Spanish-Mexican, and a devilish handsome fellow. I saw him afterwards in Seville, where he had a wife living—as pretty a woman as a man ever laid eyes on.

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, this young Georgian was fresh meat for the scoundrel. They were at their cards early and late. It was a pity to see him. The Spaniard knew he had him, and was playing him like a cat does a mouse.

"Little by little that young man's money was crossing the green, and the game was worked so nicely that he thought every loss would be his last. He was so sure luck would change that he got wild about it. He was pale and sick from excitement.

"One day the Seville got reckless in his cups and bungled, I guess, for all at once the young Southerner was at his throat and swearing he had cheated.

"I never saw such a desperate look as that Spaniard turned on us when several officers rushed up. He looked like an animal who had been wounded and whose first instinct was to strike back again. He was scared and self-assured at the same time. His face was red, his eyes were dancing from his assault to the spectators and back again, and the very moment we were pitying his fright he had whipped out a stiletto from his sash and had buried it in the young fellow's bowels.

"It was the work of a second, and the next he was struggling in the grasp of a dozen men, who had put a rope around his neck and were hurrying to the side of the ship.

"It was here the women came in. The murder occurred at an hour when the deck was thronged with passengers, and the situation was understood in a flash.

"There were screams and cries for pity and loud appeals for us to stay our hands. There were delicate white hands clinging to our coats, and before anything could be done, the whole aspect of the affair had changed, so that no gentleman on his honor could have followed out the plainest duty of the moment.

"From some motives of policy the captain took no active part in what followed. The fate of the murderer was turned over into the hands of the passengers, and our good will to the blackleg was so generally questioned that the ladies insisted in taking a hand in the trial.

"A jury of twelve ladies, school teachers, school girls and professional excursionists, was impaneled with small regard to opinions previously formed or expressed.

"A lawyer from some western state volunteered to defend the prisoner, and I have had very little respect for that man since, although his name is a household word to-day, and he has figured prominently in politics.

"There was considerable formality about the trial. The examination of witnesses was close, and the course pursued by the prosecution was vigorous and aggressive. The scoundrel's character was freely ventilated, and shown to be of the blackest sort.

"The details of the crime and the devilish system of robbery which led up to it were fully emphasized.

"In the meantime that villain sat and wept. Tears stood in his handsome dark eyes, and his cheeks were pale with every token of remorse. His long, waving black hair was matted on his forehead, and he was the picture of wretched despair.

"He had already been exalted from the lyncher's rope to the seat of a murderer on trial, and, damn me, sirs—begging your pardon, miss—before they got through with the argument that Westerner had made him an archangel.

"Every member of that whole blessed jury was crying. They would say, 'poor, dear fellow!' and when the blamed lawyer stooped lower than I ever saw a gentleman stoop, and asked for pity and mercy upon the devil whose life had doubtless been under bad influences, and would have been a Sunday-school superintendent if it hadn't been for misleading companionship, there was one grand burst of sympathy.

"Public sentiment, of which that jury was the center, became so strong in favor of the gambler that the young Georgian was made out to be a criminal for having crossed the path of this ill-starred but well-meaning imp of Satan and tempted him to wrong.

"The foreman of the jury took her lace handkerchief from her bosom and passed it down to him, as he sat blubbering with the rest of them. A pretty, blue-eyed, yellow-haired girl was at the end of the row, and she rose from her seat on the jury and dampened the handkerchief before she offered it to him.

"The gentlemen passengers realized that the trial was absolutely farcical, and gave up trying to bring the murderer to the swift justice which those on board ship felt it their right to mete out.

"The jury was finally allowed to retire and an immediate verdict of not guilty was expected. They were very earnest about it, although the rest of us had got to thinking of it as a joke. We waited to hear the result of their consultation. Twenty minutes slipped away. Then it lengthened into an hour. The judge got down off his bench and the court was resolved into a group of curious passengers, who expressed to each other at intervals the deepest interest in the secret deliberations of the twelve women in the cabin below.

"Sunset, and the bells for dinner, but still no jury. Finally they filed up the steps and gathered at the point where the judge met them. They were immediately surrounded by every passenger aboard, and ears were strained to catch every word that fell from the forewoman's lips.

"'Have you agreed?' asked the judge.

"'No, sir,' she replied.

"'How is the jury divided?'

"'I don't know, your excellency.'

"'Is there any point of law you wish explained in order to aid your decision?'

"'No, sir; we understand the law.'

"'Why do you not come to a verdict? Would you prefer to postpone decision until to-morrow?'

"'No, sir,' said the forewoman, suddenly gaining firmness, 'I will have nothing more to do with this jury, not another instant. I would not again resume the responsible position I now hold, sir, for any consideration. That poor man has been maligned and abused by the members of this jury until my ears revolt at the sound of their voices.' Everything went off smoothly enough at first, until one lady who was admiring the fine Spanish face of the accused, was interrupted by the most ignoble insinuation that he was a 'Mexican'—

"'Judge,' cried the blue-eyed girl, springing to her feet. 'I demand the right to speak. I meant no malice to the prisoner by saying he was a Mexican. I believe there are as good men in Mexico as there ever was in Spain, and it is traitorous to our own country to speak otherwise.'

"'Who ever heard of such rank heresy?' asked a Boston excursionist, turning in her chair and appealing to the crowd. 'Has Mexico ever produced a Ferdinand, a Philip V., an Isabella?'

"Then that whole jury opened up. Each woman on it was a volcano loaded to the neck for or against Mexico, and she took her crowd of listeners and harangued them vociferously. The passengers became involved in the debate. A splendid, full-chested jury-lady collared the judge and talked Prescott to him by the mile.

"The Mexican war was kept up for three days. The court never was convened again, nor was sentence passed. The blackleg was kept under guard, but he was the lion of that ship. Every effort was put forth to make him enjoy himself, and so jealously did the ladies protect him that while we were landing there was a grand final dispute about putting him in irons. The boat touched the pier while the discussion was still high, and in the midst of it the prisoner escaped."

Women and the Steam Engine.

It takes sand to run an engine; so it does to run a woman.

There is usually a great bustle about an engine; so there is about a woman.

It makes a fellow mad to get left by an engine; so it does by a woman.

An engine is an object of much wonder and admiration to men and of fear to horses; so is a woman.

When an engine goes off the track it usually takes a man or more along with it; so does a woman.

An engine is known by its company; so is a woman.

An engine will sometimes blow a fellow up if he puts on too much pressure; so will some women.—New York Herald.

Every man—or nearly every man, even if he be not in haste to get rich—still desires to have a home of his own, and a place where he can get rest under his own vine and fig tree, so to speak. The P. C. S. S. will assist you.

Talk of red hair or freckles or cross-eyes or bow legs or crooked noses, they, one or all, may be inconvenient, they may be useless, but they are blessings; yes, sir, blessings, compared to my "Adam's apple." An "Adam's apple," sir, is Nature's kick—her slap in the face—a camel's back on a small scale in a man's throat: Brains, sir, talent, genius—nothing will atone for it. It is a frost—and it never thaws. I might have been anything I desired but for my hunch-throat; but who could be persuaded that a man with an "Adam's apple" attached to him for life could be anything but a freak?

The P. C. S. S. has the best plan devised for securing a home for the amount usually paid to the landlord for rent money, advanced in one sum and paid back in small monthly installments.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL

HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND

SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO

OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a thorough education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening, Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than J. SLAUGHTER, Sixth and M streets.

Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Ganible's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL O LOAN O OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

ADOLPH TEICHERT,

Manufacturer of

ARTIFICIAL STONE

—FOR—

Sidewalks, Garden Walks, Cellar Floors, Fence Coping, Etc.

SCHILLINGER'S PATENT A SPECIALTY.

RESIDENCE:

917 Twenty-fourth St., bet. I and J

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,

WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS

AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.

410 J STREET.

— ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED —

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON

CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

"M. Quad" Fables.THE PEASANT AND THE WAYFARER.

A Wayfarer one day found a Peasant in Tears beside the Highway, and naturally halted to ascertain the cause of his Sorrow. "O Friend," replied the Peasant, "I have Worked like a Slave the Season through, but owing to the bad Weather my corn is only half a crop."

"Dry thy Tears, O Son of Toil," replied the Wayfarer. "Had your Corn been a full Crop I was intending to come after it was gathered and Steal the whole of it to the last ear. As it is I will pass you by and strike some other member of the Alliance."

Moral—Things are never as bad as they seem.

THE HARE AND THE FOX.

A Fox one day caught sight of a Hare in its Burrow and quietly lay down to wait for him to come out. After an hour or two without result Reynard became impatient and advanced, with a grin on his Face, and said:

"Good morning to you, Sir Hare! Being as I was in the Neighborhood, I thought I would Call and see how you got along."

"That is Kind of you, and I am Happy to assure you that I am well," was the reply.

"I notice," continued the Fox, as he looked around, "that you have dug your Burrow very narrow. Does this come about from any want of Confidence in me?"

"Oh, no! no! no!" quickly responded the Hare, as he Winked his left eye in the darkness; "the idea was to prevent accident to our Friend the Elephant. He might tumble in on me some night, you know."

"Yes; I tumble, too," dryly observed Reynard, as he gave his chops another lick and started off.

Moral—One should have no weak spots in his armor.

THE FROG AND THE FARMER.

A Frog who dwelt in a Puddle close by the house of a Farmer one evening overheard the Agriculturalist vigorously Praising the Notes of a Nightingale, which sang from a tree near by.

"Loves Music, eh?" queried the Frog of himself. "Well, being as he is a good Man and seems to be Built that Way, I'll do my Best to Make him Happy."

The Frog had not been singing over two minutes when the Farmer came down to the Puddle with a big Tomato, and nearly knocked his head off, and yelled:

"If you don't shut up I'll fire the whole garden at you."

"Alas! but is this my Reward for Seeking to Make you Happy?" wailed the Frog, as he looked Around for the Arnica bottle to bathe his Head.

Moral—"You must learn," replied the Farmer, as he turned away, "that while there may be no great difference between the notes of the Nightingale and the Voice of the Frog, Man has been granted the Privilege of Choosing Which he shall Listen to."

Prayer, Cold Water and Faith.

The sect of "Illuminated Apostles" has been increasing considerably in Spain. They claim to have power to heal the sick by prayer and the application of cold water. Some of them were recently arrested in Madrid, but were subsequently discharged. Several of them then called upon the local authorities and asked that their sect be officially recognized as a legally constituted association. The spokesman of the party, a venerable-looking man, with a long white beard, said that they derived their doctrines from the writings of the evangelists and were Christian apostles. All they asked was to be allowed to preach their doctrines and to cure the sick. "Have you any diploma entitling you to practice medicine?" asked the governor. The old apostle replied that they had a divine diploma that could not be questioned and that was better than any diploma that a human being could give. He would give an instance of a cure that they had made and how they practiced on an old woman who had the small pox and was given up by the regular physicians. The apostles took her in hand, prayed over her, told her and her relatives to trust in God, to make her drink plenty of water, eat well and roll her up in wet sheets. And the old woman got well. The apostles added that they had established congregations of their sect in thirty-six provinces. The governor did not think it proper to give permission to men to practice medicine who rolled up small-pox patients in wet sheets and dosed them with plenty of water.

To illustrate Mrs. Polk's popularity when mistress of the White House they recount this incident: At one of her receptions, while she sat gaily talking, a distinguished South Carolinian said: "Madame, there is a woe pronounced against you in the Bible." Every voice was hushed, and a scared look came over the faces of the guests; only Mrs. Polk was at ease; and, while her black eyes flashed, she said, with a bright smile: "What have I done?" "Well," he replied, "the Bible says 'Woe unto you when all men speak well of you.'"

P. C. S. S. holders of a small number of shares are as acceptable as large stockholders. Everybody, rich or poor, should be a stockholder.

He Meant Well.

Some weeks ago, writes a Wisconsin correspondent of the Youth's Companion, a young temperance lecturer, in his travels from town to town, fell in with an Indian, who made signs for a ride. He was allowed to get into the buggy, and pretty soon it appeared that he was intoxicated.

The lecturer, who believed in being instant in season and out of season, began forthwith to labor with his passenger. He dwelt upon the disgrace and death which follow the use of liquors, and wound up by entreating him to forsake his cups.

The Indian did not understand a word of the exhortation, but judging the lecturer by himself, thought from his pleading eyes and earnest manner that he wanted a drink. Accordingly he drew a large black bottle from under his blanket and offered it to the white man.

The lecturer was elated. He had made a convert, he thought. He took the bottle and dashed it to the ground, where it flew into a thousand pieces.

The Indian could not have been angrier if his scalp had been threatened. He sprang from his seat with a tremendous war whoop, seized the white man by the arm, dragged him to the ground, beat him in the face and was reaching for his knife when the lecturer managed to break away and ran at his best speed for the next town, where his wounds were dressed.

According to his own version of the affair, he meant well, but showed a lack of judgment.

A homeless man is an object of pity, but how much the more a homeless woman or a helpless child. "But how can a home be gathered from the little savings of which the most of us are capable?" Through the P. C. S. S.

The P. C. S. S. offers all the advantages accruing from cooperative investment of savings, and secure for you the most satisfactory results.

S. A. WOLFE,Photographic Art Parlors

426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCKRestaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET,

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B. PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

Capital Coffee House

J. H. BRUNING, Proprietor.

509 K STREET,

Between Fifth and Sixth, SACRAMENTO.

Fine Coffee, Tea or Milk, { With Pie } 10 Cents. or Cake, }

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

Ætina Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

JUST AT HAND

The latest New York styles in Note Paper, Visiting and Correspondence Cards, Card Envelopes, Mourning Cards and Paper.

Tinted Note Paper and Correspondence Cards are now the rage. All the latest tints in stock.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER.

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 18th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

A. P. CATLIN,

Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated August 13th, 1891.

JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and 1/10 Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for $1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jyl8-8t

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

PANTS to ORDER

$3.50 to $13.50

SUITS TO ORDER

$15.00 to $50.00

1000 Patterns to Select from.

GABEL the TAILOR

426 J STREET.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

FOR SALE.

SECOND-HAND REMINGTON TYPE-WRITER for sale. Inquire at 1714 M street.

A. L. HART,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON.

ALBERT M. JOHNSON.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,

LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 604 J Street,

W. A. GETT, JR.,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,

L. W. YERS,

Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,

LAWYER.

Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,

LAWYER,

920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW

Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

N.W. corner Sixth and K.

An Odd Fact About the Potentiality of the Number 7.

Mr. John W. Kirk, the white-haired veteran who was with Morse when the first working telegraph line was stretched, and who stood beside the great inventor when the first message was transmitted from Annapolis Junction to Washington, has made during his life a great many interesting calculations in numbers. The two most remarkable numbers in the world are 3 and 7. "The numeral 7," says Mr. Kirk, "the Arabians got from India, and all following have taken it from the Arabians. It is conspicuous in biblical lore, being mentioned over 300 times in the Scriptures, either alone or compounded with other words. It seems a favorite numeral with the Divine mind, outside as well as inside the Bible, as nature demonstrates in many ways, and all the other numerals bow to it. There is also another Divine favorite, the number 3, the trinity. This is brought out by a combination of figures that is somewhat remarkable; it is the six figures 142,857.

"Multiply this by 2; the answer is 285,714.
"Multiply this by 3; the answer is 428,571.
"Multiply this by 4; the answer is 571,428.
"Multiply this by 5; the answer is 714,285.
"Multiply this by 6; the answer is 857,142.
"Each answer contains the same figures as the original sum, and no others, and three of the figures of the sum remain together in each answer, thus showing that figures preserve the trinity.

"Thus 285 appears in the first and second numbers, 571 in the second and third, 428 in the third and fourth, and 143 in the fourth and fifth.

"It is also interesting to note that, taking out of any two of these sums the group of three common to both, the other three, read in the usual order, from left to right, will also be in the same order in both sums.

"Take the first and second sums, for example. The group of 285 is common to both. Having read 285 out of the second sum, read right along and bring in the first figure of the thousands last. It will read 714. All the others will read in the same way.

"Again, note that the two groups of three in the first sum are the same as the two groups of three in the fourth, reversed in order, and that the same thing is true of the second and third. The last multiplication has its groups of threes the same as those of the original number, reversed again.

"Examine these results again and you will see that in these calculations all the numerals have appeared save the 9. Now multiply the original sum by the mighty 7—the Divine favorite of the Bible and of creation—and behold the answer!—the last of the numerals, and that one only in groups of three; again the trinity!

142,857
7
999,999

"No other combination of numbers will produce the same results. Does not this show the imperial multipotent numeral 7 and its divinity?"—Boston Transcript.

The P. C. S. S.'s plan enables a man to build a home and pay for it in small monthly installments.

P. C. S. S. shareholders are encouraged to save, because their savings immediately begin to earn profits.

The P. C. S. S. is organized under the laws of California, and is under the supervision of the Bank Commissioners.

In the P. C. S. S., six dollars a month will carry ten shares, $1,000 worth of stock, maturing in from six to seven years.

A person may lease a house and pay $16 a month rent for seven years, and at the end of that time have nothing to show for his money.

The P. C. S. S. will help you to save money, and as you owe it to yourself and family to lay up a few dollars for a rainy day, make a beginning by taking a few shares.

You can borrow $1,000 of the P. C. S. S., build you a home, pay it back in monthly payments of $16, and at the end of seven years, or sooner, own your home free of incumbrances.

Paying off a debt in installments is like attacking an army in detail; many a man who meets his monthly payments easily would despair if confronted with his whole debt at once.

Not one in a hundred pays off a mortgage in the usual way. It is renewed again and again. By the P. C. S. S.'s plan debts are paid so gradually and easily that no comfort is sacrificed.

Invest in a few shares of the P. C. S. S. stock. There is no better investment, as every dollar invested doubles itself in a few years, and your money in it is as safe as a safe deposit vault could keep it.

There are many thousands of people whose income from their labors are larger than is necessary to feed and clothe them, and many of them are investing a part of each week's income in the P. C. S. S.

There are thousands of the industrial class who save something from their monthly or weekly incomes, and thousands more who could and would do so if they would investigate the plan of the P. C. S. S.

CURES MALARIA. CURES HEADACHE. CURES CONSTIPATION. LASH'S KIDNEY AND LIVER BITTERS CURES DYSPEPSIA.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING! LOW PRICES!

TOP NOTCH SPICES. J.B. GILBERT. JED. M. SCOTT. MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS AND PROPRIETORS OF TOP NOTCH TONIC, TOP NOTCH FLAVORING EXTRACTS, STOCKMAN'S CONDITION POWDERS, STOCKMAN'S LINIMENT, DR. GILL'S BOTANIC COUGH SYRUP.

SACRAMENTO, CAL. San Francisco Branch, 305 Battery St.

Imperial GALLERY, No. 415 J Street, Between Fourth and Fifth, SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

THE GREATEST OF AMERICAN WATERS. A NATURAL MINERAL WATER OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT. "SHASTA" WATER. MOUNT SHASTA MINERAL SPRING CO. GENERAL OFFICE 908 & 910 2ND STREET, SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA U.S.A. BOTTLED FOR EUROPEAN TRADE.

W. J. HANSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO., Book and Job Printers, 410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.20 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
11.50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express
	Ogden and East	5.25 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.05 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	8.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.10 P
3.05 P	Vallejo
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted, †Sunday only, ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon. RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager. T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, and payable on or after July 3, 1891. GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

Sau Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE LEADER

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1891.

No. 29.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

One may find many good texts in the speeches of Robert Ingersoll. They are instructive and suggestive, and for the greater part true. Take this, from one of his recent addresses: "Property is valuable in proportion as people are intelligent and honest. What is property worth in a town full of ignoramuses?" And this: "I want to live until toil is honestly paid; until no person is perfectly happy so long as somebody is toiling; until it will not be enough to live in a palace if a woman a few blocks away is working and stitching and praying that the angel of death may with cold fingers touch her weary heart."

Outside of a term in Congress years ago, who can name an office that Colonel Ingersoll ever held? What a misfit would such a man be in any office? He was "born for the universe," and, unlike Edmund Burke, who "to party gave up what was meant for mankind," he has kept to his principles, though the prejudices he has created prevent his official preferment in the party whose most eloquent eulogist he has been. In his eulogy upon Roscoe Conkling, at Albany, he seems to have unconsciously drawn a picture of himself, or at least of what his admirers believe him to be.

Of Roscoe Conkling as a great man, orator, statesman, lawyer, he spoke as no other man could speak, and his sentences are like apples of gold in pictures of silver. While the following may be true of Conkling, does it not also picture Ingersoll? "He was an orator, earnest, logical, intense and picturesque. He laid his foundation with care, with accuracy and skill, and rose by cold gradation and well-balanced form from the corner stone of statement to the domed conclusion. He filled the stage, he saddened the eye, the audience was his. He had that indefinable thing called presence. Tall, commanding, erect, ample in speech, graceful in compliment, Titanic in denunciation, rich in illustration, prodigal of comparison and metaphor, his sentences, measured and rythmical, fell like music on the enraptured throng."

Of Conkling as a legislator he said: "Roscoe Conkling was an absolutely honest man. He uttered the splendid truth that the higher obligations among men are not set down in writing, signed and sealed, but reside in honor. He was an ideal representative, faithful and incorruptible. He believed his constituents and his country were entitled to the fruit of his experience, to his best and highest thoughts. No man ever held the standard of responsibility higher than he. He voted according to his judgment and his conscience. He made no bargains, he neither bought nor sold. To correct evils, abolish abuses, and inaugurate reforms, he believed was not only the duty but the privilege of the legislator. He neither sold nor mortgaged himself. He was in Congress during the years of the vast expenditures of war and waste, when the credit of the nation was loaned to individuals; when claims were as thick as leaves in June; when in the amendment of a statute a change of a single word meant millions, and when empires were given to corporations. He stood at the summit of his power, the peer of the greatest, a leader tried and trusted. He had the tastes of a prince, the fortune of a peasant, yet he never swerved. No corporation was great enough or rich enough to purchase him. His vote could not be bought for all the sun sees or the close earth wombs or the profound sea hides."

The recent charge to the grand jury by Judge Wallace, in San Francisco, has been the cause of much praise and some adverse criticism of that gentleman. The amusing part of it is the wonder of the press at such an "innovation." The charge may be unusual here, but such a charge to the grand jury in the Eastern States is a usual thing there. It is done every year, or every quarter, and to every grand jury. If certain crimes have been by general report or rumor talked of, as within the jurisdiction of the court, the judges who impanel grand juries, in New York any way, always call the attention of the jury to such matters, and charge that it is their duty to investigate. Judge Wallace has done a good thing, and it looks very small for any one to insist on putting a base motive behind the good deed. Some minds are always occupied more or less in such kind of detraction. To them there is no good action done except from some ignoble motive; for such Judge Wallace can well feel the contempt and aversion they deserve.

Our city fathers are loth to enter upon new and necessary improvements because of lack of funds. "We are poor," quoth they; "taxation is heavy and burdensome, let us put up with our present sewerage, our city hall and jail, our streets, though the sewerage breed a pestilence, the city hall (?) tumble down upon our police and prisoners, and the municipality suffer much, it is better to bear the ills we have than fly to others we know not of." Yet, while they save a tthe spigot, lo! the treasure runneth out at the bung. The city's coin is cared for by a solvent and sound bank, and there is at all times a large balance on hand, the use of which brings no revenue. The city even pays the bank for keeping it, and when in need the bank very graciously and generously lends the city her own money at interest to improve the streets. If this is not Bob Ingersoll's town of ignoramuses, it seems to be on the high road to such a goal, and may get there in course of time.

A competent physician is named as health officer, and in a straightf-orward, truthful way points out the particular dangers and abominations of our so-called sewerage system; he advises cleanliness, the suppression of leaky and foul dripping drains, the cleansing of cess-pools, enforcement of the ordinances against depositing filth, swill, and festering corruption in the streets, alleys and public places; tells us in plain language that if we mean to continue decent and in health we must observe the plain laws of health and hygiene, even if it does cost money; and straightway this admirable official is jumped on by a mob of our silurian, semi-savages who seek to crucify him for warning us of the wrath that is to come. Filth and disease are extolled and invited; open sewers or none at all, noxious, mephitic gases and vapors from everywhere, and always right under our noses on every down-town street and alley, must be ignored or lied about for fear of harm to the city's reputation; systematic and regular violation of every health ordinance we have must be winked at, and every rule of municipal decency and neatness set aside to quiet the howl of a few oranges to whom civilization of any kind is distasteful and too expensive. Travelers say it would be difficult to find a city in Asia, Africa, or South America where a greater indifference is shown by officials to sanitation and municipal regulation of stinks and disease-breeding nuisances of all kinds than there is in this.

There is profit, yea pleasure, in the reading of antique books. "The Tatler," by Isaac Bickerstaff, was published in London in 1794. Then was printed the manuscript of the author, written "from his own apartments, September 12, 1709," that "no man can conceive, till he comes to try it, how great a pain it is to be a public spirited person. I am sure I am unable to express to the world what my lucubrations have been to my fellow-subjects. Men will go on in their own way, in spite of all my labour." Perhaps at so early a date there did exist public boards presumed to administer important trusts. We are not, however, aware Bickerstaff had the advantages 1891 affords, in a country known not in his time. That we quote from this writer of old imparts not a feeling for the pain he then did feel; rather it is he is to be congratulated he died so early in the world's history, and encountered not the mismanagement of the Sacramento city government.

This week witnessed the ending of the official inquiry by the municipal heads into the water-works farce. So nearly as the public can gather, Conklin assumes to superintend these works, yet it seems his chief engineer—one Judd—is adjudged indiscreet in saying that which is known by every grammar-school boy in the city—that the lower grade of politics does control in water-works management. It is apparent Conklin has in his chief engineer one who admittedly is not fitted to fill the place; Judd should be removed; he should be supplanted by Daroux. We are not aware that Judd has ever been so indiscreet as to degrade himself with lower politics; that he did not do so is his fault; he will suffer.

We understand from the investigation these conclusions have been arrived at: That Judd is a "chump;" that under the management various parts of important machinery have been broken with little matter who had the watch; that the influence of ward politics cuts no figure in that department. All hands are exonerated. We repeat our declaration made last week, that ward politics has too much to do with water-works control, and this remark we apply both to the management of the machinery of the works (very important to the inhabitants of this city) and the collection of the rates. In this late investigation it is apparent the matter was pre-judged against Judd, so far as political influence in appointment in the works is concerned.

With relation to the collection of the water rates only, there is paid out annually for salaries over $5,000. Compared with the cost of collecting the direct tax for the maintenance of the city government by Mr. Putnam, or the State and county dues by the Sheriff, the percentage will be readily seen by figuring to be absurdly high. And yet it is gravely claimed that politics cut no figure. As the water-works are now managed they are about a loss to the people. With an inexhaustible supply from the river, why not grant a franchise to a private corporation to supply water service to such of our inhabitants as see fit to encourage such an enterprise? There will then be an assurance the machinery of the competitive works will not be impaired; that they can be depended upon to furnish protection if emergency demands; that we will get for a trifle water service more adequate and satisfactory than the present. Taking into consideration the 55 per cent. of the gross receipts now paid into the bond fund, the cost of fuel, salaries, political incidentals, and interest on the capital invested, we cannot see that the people of this city are now getting off even. Would this important matter not be weighty in the county municipal conventions?

We have read with interest as well as amusement the criticism of the Colusa Sun of an article in THEMIS. It is as follows:

PAY YOUR DEBTS.

THEMIS of last week has an article advocating a repudiation of a part of the contract of Sacramento with its creditors. The city was to pay 55 per cent. of the revenue of the water-works to bondholders to pay interest and liquidate principal as fast as it would. The Supreme Court decided that revenue meant gross proceeds. There was a bill before the last Legislature to alter this, but it was defeated. And now comes our contemporary and urges another tilt at law with the "cormorants." The whole State is interested in seeing to it that Sacramento pays her debts without harassing her creditors. If she owes the debt and does not want to pay 55 per cent. of the gross income, or, in other words, the revenue, let her issue her bonds and take up this indebtedness. The people of this State have suffered much by such repudiations. Away back in the "fifties" there was a failure by the State to pay interest on account of the failure of the banking firm of Palmer, Cook & Co., and that failure is now quoted to our discredit. The Montgomery-avenue bonds, the Dupont-street bonds, and other litigations over debts contracted, hurt every enterprise in the State. We look upon every man as a public enemy who talks about repudiating any part of any indebtedness, or who refers to bondholders as cormorants. Any man who loans money is entitled to all the borrower agrees to pay. The only way for an individual or a corporation to get rid of a debt is to pay it. The discussion of repudiation conveys abroad an idea of dishonest people, and injures credit.

We assume the article in the Sun was written by our pioneer friend Will S. Green. To him we will say his early history with relation to the failure of the State to pay interest on account of the downfall of the banking firm of Palmer, Cook & Co. was about on a par with the position taken by the present inhabitants of Sacramento city. The firm had a short existence—from 1853 to 1857—and handled politics as well as banking. The head of the firm was charged in the Legislature with offering a money bribe for a vote for a candidate for United States Senator. There then came this alarming state of affairs in the State: that while the Constitution provided that the State indebtedness should not exceed $300,000, in January, 1857, there was an indebtedness of $4,131,127 31. The facts were reported to the Legislature by Governor Johnson. There had been provision made by former Legislatures for the issuance of bonds, and the payment of interest on them in the city of New York. The bonds that had been issued were clearly invalid, but they had been floated, and the interest on them paid semi-annually. The house of Palmer, Cook & Co. had for a time received the interest money and paid it; there was, however, something like $200,000 missing from the State treasury when the Legislature of 1857 made investigation, and a considerable portion of the sum had gone into the hands of Palmer, Cook & Co.; the result was the removal from office of State Treasurer Bates, and the offer of Palmer, Cook & Co. to make up that which they had acknowledgedly received. The people lost the money; it had been sent to pay interest on bonds that had no legal existence. Yet the Sun, after these many years, and after the matter has been thoroughly investigated in the matters of the impeachment of two State officers, and in criminal proceedings against Bates, Rowe, and others, says "it is now quoted to our discredit." Concerning the Montgomery-avenue and Dupont-street bonds, we will permit the Sun to be the champion; let us be classed as a public enemy who will suggest their repudiation.

There is little difference with the debt of Sacramento city, as compared with the cases the Sun has cited, so far as equity is concerned. We are not disposed to willingly pay for the unwarrantable extravagances of men who now slumber in our cemeteries, and accept the terms that have been presented by judges who are now remembered only by tombstone inscriptions. There have been decisions rendered in the interest of the holders of Sacramento city bonds that are manifestly unjust; they may well be characterized as absurd. The editor of the Sun says, with seriousness, that "revenue" means "gross receipts," when applied to any business transaction. We may assume with truth the gross receipts of our water-works are upwards of $90,000—out of that sum manifestly the expense should first be paid; no trouble will come as to the disposition of the balance.

The labor demonstration which will take place Monday will be proper recognition of the spirit of labor in all its branches, save the professional and literary labor. While the latter will not be a component part of the pageant, the true laborer recognizes these branches of labor with the union of labor. It is in accord with the free and liberal American idea, and one of the grandest principles that labor and the industries shall receive the protection of the nation. It is this idea that prompts that greatest of American statesmen, James G. Blaine, to stand forth the exponent of protection to American labor and American industries. We are glad to see the union of labor on such occasions as that of Monday, and it forebodes good in the future, when thoughtful men band together for the great purpose of the protection of the laborer. There is a sentiment of good feeling on such occasions, which will do more to harmonize labor and capital than any other means. Labor Day is destined to be one of the events of the nation, and it is right that due recognition should be given by the people in all branches of trade industry and the professions. Our labor unions must not overlook the fact, however, that among the hardest worked people on the earth should be included those engaged in literary and professional pursuits. The tax on the brain by constant work is greater than that imposed on the body by physical exertion. There are none so overworked as the newspaper men. Certainly these can be classed with the laborers in the broad and comprehensive sense of the term. It is the laborer in this country that governs. It is the laborer that shapes all enterprise and consummates every industry. Labor is, indeed, the ruler. When labor and brains combine, there can be no apprehensions for the future.

The city of Sacramento is at present in a healthy condition, indicated by its growth in an easterly and southerly direction. There is one serious obstruction to its growth in a northeasterly direction, to wit: the racetrack and agricultural park. The middle of such a populous city is not a place for a racetrack or such a park. It closes up D, E, F, G, and Twenty-first and Twenty-second streets. Those who own building lots east of the racetrack have no direct route to the business parts of the city. They are hid away and out of sight of the city. These lots are becoming valuable, and they would increase largely in value if all the streets of the city were open to them. The park itself and the racetrack are of no use to the public except for the two weeks of the fair and a few days when used for races. And it has become a nuisance to the public rather than a source of pleasure or income, and it effects the value and use of the property situate west of the park, as well as the lots to the east. The time has come that this matter should be agitated with a view to a removal of the park and racetrack to some point east or south of the city. When a sufficiently large plat can be secured suitable for the location of a racetrack and agricultural park, the owners of lots east and west of the park as situated cannot always be restrained from insisting on the opening of the public streets through it. They would have an undoubted right to a removal of that obstacle. The park and track could be removed to a point equally fit for such uses where there would be no streets to obstruct. It could be bought at prices for what agricultural land is sold. With electric motors to our cars, and a five-cent fare established, the old Louisiana racetrack, the Harigan racetrack, Oak Knoll, or a lot south of Oak Park would be just as accessible as where it is now located. The lots that now constitute the park would perhaps pay all expense of buying, say forty acres, and fitting the same up as well or better than the present park, and it would, if so located, become a place of resort much more used than as at present located, and Sacramento would suddenly start its growth in a northeasterly direction, adding a large amount to the taxable property of the city, and thus that quarter would in a short time rival the southern part of the city in its growth and prosperity.

Our virtues may sometimes cause us to suffer, even greatly, as forbearance and fortitude and resignation imply the endurance of insult, of injury or of trials.

But the sufferings of virtue are so sublime, so rich in precept, and so crowned with rewards, that the reflecting mind must learn, and the sensitive heart will feel, that to triumph over the passions is to triumph over the malignity of fortune; and in subduing ourselves we virtually subdue the many evils of our destiny. As no tyranny equals that of the passions, neither is there any misery so sure as that of submitting to their unlimited control. The greatest peril, the lowest obloquy, the most sarcastic contempt, are found to follow and fall upon the unrestrained career of those powerful mental, moral and personal enemies of virtue and of happiness. The passions, in their excess, are seen to distort and for the time being to destroy, the human countenance; changing the serene energy of dignified command, which speaks in the fine features of civilized man, to the vulgar violence of savage brutality—altering the angel sweetness of beautiful woman to the character and contour of a merciless demon; for what is so fearful as the madness of the irascible?—what so dreadful as the purpose of the revengeful?—what so vile as the insinuation of the envious?—so abject as the selfishness of the sordid, or so ridiculous as the excesses of the vain and the sensual? Nor is it irrelevant to confirm this by a fact adduced on the authority of Madame de Stael, that all the Jacobins actively concerned in the horrors of the reign of murder were individually distinguished by the same sort of countenance—pale, nervous and agitated; moving from side to side, like a wild beast in his cage, and when seated, poisoning themselves, without rising, in a sort of stationary restlessness, indicating the impossibility of repose. Thus powerful is the sway of the evil passions; so com-fortless and so frightful the distortion of their fury.

Even ambition, in whose sublime features and high feelings there is the fascination of glory and the charm of intrepidity, in striving to push others aside who are with similar efforts struggling to climb the same steep ascent and to reach the same dangerous apex of power—how often is it seen losing its hold and falling with a velocity which strikes, crushes and disables the victim from again rising in triumph or succeeding in future honors to authority. If distress or discomfiture be thus the possible portion of the most seductive and the least malevolent of human passions, of what avail and to what effect is the nurture or the indulgence of the more mean and less morally attractive? Nor let it be urged that these unsubdued foes of features, of manners and of mind, owe their despotic empire to the error of youth; that time, chilling the circulations into sluggishness, will, with the same hard grasp, cool, calm and quiet the hot spirit of turbulent inclination. Believe it not. To the moral, as to the physical habits of man, age brings no remedy for the neglectful. At that period the objects of sense may change, but not the violence of sensation; the fretful and the furious will not, through the medium of disgust, be rendered amiable and conciliatory. The extravagant love of pleasure will change, but to the intemperate desire of gold, or the more excessive avarice of power, as certainly, ere the autumn of existence has passed away, will the strong passions yield to the stronger understanding or be restrained by the better principle. Thence delay would be fatal. Age may never come; or were it sure as is the moment of dissolution, does the mind bloom and brighten as the body bends and breaks? Will the heart expand and grow kind amid the solitude of outlived and buried affections, or under the wrongs and estrangements of painful humanity? There is of lengthened existence a probable period to which improvement does not belong; when to vegetate and to suffer are all that remain of the beautiful and glorious. Thrice happy they who, prepared for the possible result of long, protracted years, have said to the whole host of lawless passions, "Peace! and sin no more!"

Janauschek is very enthusiastic about The Harvest Moon, by James M. Morgan. She described it as a romantic drama, and says: "I feel so sure that the public will indorse it that I have laid aside the balance of my repertory and shall appear in that drama only. The part of 'Mrs. Oakley' affords me the opportunity to prove to my friends that I am as vigorous as ever. I have, through my manager, booked a long tour, beginning at Washington in September and including the principal cities of the country."

[Written for THEMIS.]

TRUE PRINCIPLE.

It has been questioned whether true, correct principle be the result of precept coöperating with example, or a nobler sentiment emanating from the soul. With Helvetius, we have believed that culture can do much, provided the mind be happily organized; but we have not believed with Helvetius that education is omnipotent in power and in glory to effect everything for the heart, and for the understanding. Since the innate disposition for right, and the actual propensity to wrong, are so individually marked, by nature herself, as to seem almost invincible, the materialist may attribute this propensity, and that disposition, to the nerves, to the blood, or to the muscles. If, as a parent anxious for his offspring, he has traced the fact, he will not deny its existence. Under the same irresistible belief, we have defined true principle to be a sense of duty, an impulse of virtue, a perception of right, which, with capacity to discern and to discriminate, feels before its reasons, and acting from the rectitude of its own original nature, resists evil and does good without the hope of reward, the calculation of profit, or the doubt of timidity; it is forbearing, and conciliates; placable, and pardons; tender, and consoles; active, and assists; it is both grateful and beneficent—faithful to acknowledge and prompt to bestow; for when was the heart of ingratitude allied to the feelings of generosity? True principle is sincere, and knows not to deceive; firm, and will not be tempted; pure, and repels corruption. It is unchanging because unerring. It is disinterested and travels by no crooked path to fortune. In the proud dignity of self-respect it is elevated above the egotism of vanity; and in perfect humility, always known to sacrifice the selfish to the social affections. Severe in character, but cordial in kindness; studious to improvement, and living to utility, it neither lends the hours to idleness, nor gives the heart to presumption.

Such are the properties which we believe to contain the elements of true principle, even that true principle which must feel honestly in order to act worthily; and is this, like a mechanic art, to be studied and learned and practised by that merely reasoning perseverance which coldly reflects, deliberates and resolves? Countin-, the cost and receipting the advantage of every virtue; a plausible substitute, specious and pretending, but born of the brain, and never approaching the heart? As devoted to self-interest and existing for the world, the one is its true standard, the other its chosen reward. Yet, most readily be it conceded, that great and grateful and efficient is the influence of just precept united to right example, powerful to confirm, improve and enlighten the capacities of a well organized mind, and frequently and forcibly is it found to counteract and perverse the temper of hearts, which, bad by nature, might become atrocious by neglect. To corrupt the principles of the originally virtuous would probably be more arduous than to correct the propensities of the evil-disposed; for the moral feeling shrinks from contamination, and the pure and peaceful heart, clothed in humility, dares not trust its own strength, but fears and shuns the possible contagion of evil. Not thus the offender. As the hardihood of his character, rising to defiance, fears nothing and braves everything, he may, in the bold presumptions of his passions, draw near, and in listening to the eloquence of truth, be unexpectedly won by the charm of its accent to abandon the misery of offense, and to seek the happiness of well-doing. In opposition to this, see the mechanically virtuous, who has not the image of goodness stamped upon his soul; if seduced by perverted reason, or misled by unbridled passion, the mental obduracy of his nature will neither yield nor retract; consequently cannot be softened into reform nor soothed into reflection. Yet this should not discourage the doubtful, nor intimidate the repentant. Let these rather derive instruction by adverting to the history of the divine Socrates, in whose character nature had blended bad propensities with good dispositions; sublime genius with destructive passions. The moral, the wise, even in early youth, prove sufficiently powerful to overcome the evil, and the foolish, not through the omnipotence of education, but by the determined energy of his own corrected will, and the active integrity of an originally superior soul; for the inclinations of this well organized mind were virtuous, those of his unruly passions vicious—wisdom improving the one and subverting the other, constitutes what may be termed correct principle; elucidated by the moral genius and mental graces of his life, the mild philosophy and faithful precepts of his death. The conclusions to be deduced are, that those to whom nature has given the best temperament, material and intellectual, are most capable of approaching the height of human perfection; yet the more deficient have strength and means to resolve themselves into improvement, physical, intellectual and moral; while all who feel and think and reason, may become good and kind and virtuous, provided they do not stifle the small but sure voice of conscience, which God has given them. Neither does it demand the sublime wisdom of Socrates to extirpate the bad and to cultivate the good that is born and lives within us. It is a plain and simple lesson, in which we must be our own immediate instructors; and for which the most moderate abilities are competent. At the same time it is a lesson sufficiently profound to occupy and to interest the most reflective mind, the most feeling heart, and the most comprehensive genius. A lesson rich in profit, high in honor, and profuse of the best rewards on earth and in heaven.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Richard Mansfield will appear on this coast the coming winter.

The world isn't so wicked as the applause of a poker joke at the theater would indicate.

It is finally settled that Annie Pixley will not act at all this season. She will take life easily, most of the time in Europe.

Charley Reed and May Tohe are with the Hoss and Hoss company. We will have an opportunity of seeing them this coming season.

Charles MacGeachy is interested in the business of a new Italian star, and the wicked say he will be called Signor Carlos Magichi hereafter.

The original "Violetta" of Verdi's Traviata, Signora Donitelli, died lately at Milan. The opera was first produced at Venice, in 1855.

Vrchlicky is the dreadful name of a Czech dramatist who is the author of a new tragedy called The Torture of Tantalus, in which the various situations are illustrated by appropriate orchestral music.

W. S. Gilbert has delivered the dialogue of the new comic opera by Collier, which will be produced at the Lyric Theater in October. It is understood that the piece is based upon the story of Gilbert's own comedy of Broken Hearts, which was produced at the Court Theater in 1876.

Fanny Davenport makes a rule never to see two women in one day if she can help it. She thinks one can have too much of a good thing; so, if she has entertained one lady caller, she excuses herself to the next. Another superstition of the actress is, that if you are unlucky you should never speak of it, for the mention of the fact will bring you worse luck.

While in Australia Sarah Bernhardt is said to have visited the famous whispering gallery near Kiama, on the coast of New South Wales. The gallery is a horseshoe-shaped chasm whose walls rise 300 feet. A brook runs through it, forming several little cataracts, from the brink of one of which rise the "Parson's Steps," peculiar natural terraces, on which Mme. Bernhardt stood and recited the "Marseillaise." The faintest accent, if distinct, is carried all round the horseshoe.

A poetical idea has been born in Chicago. There was an anniversary celebration there of the fiftieth performance of A County Fair. The play, as everybody knows, deals with bucolic scenes and the general story of life in a country village. The managers, unlike the usual run of theatrical people, clung to the idea of making the souvenir of the anniversary performance in keeping with the character of the play. This is something that is not usually thought of at such times. They sent out into the country and bought a lot of new mown hay, which was corked air-tight in bottles and given away as mementoes of the souvenir performance. A request was made that the corks should not be broken until the audience had returned to their homes. The request was not heeded, and the auditorium of the theater was filled with the odor of new-mown hay throughout the performance.

Stage snow is at present in a distressingly crude state. Bits of paper coming down from the flies in a sparse flurry are not realistic. The heroine, turned out of doors in a V-shaped corsage, kid slippers and a blinding snowstorm, does her part, but the man who works the elements is singularly devoid of emotion. He sifts the storm down as conscientiously as a barrel of clippings and a limited knowledge of meteorology allow, but the effect is not lustrous. The new patent rain-producer raises a hope of better things. If the heavens can be made to yield diamonds in the shape of raindrops, why not pearls in the form of snow? Then, amid moans from the orchestra, the flakes could fall fast, and even faster, on the heroine's homeless head. Benumbed with cold, she could coil up on a doorstep and be snowed in and dug out by a handsome young man, who could marry her in the last act. Pending this happy issue to all her afflictions, the snow, properly flavored, could be carried out and distributed around to the audience in the form of ices and be eaten with souvenir spoons. The future is rich in promise for the realistic drama.—N. Y. World.

Book Chat.

Sir Edwin Arnold will deliver fifty lectures in America next winter.

We are told that Eugene Field's book of Horace translations now passing through the press, is to be a sumptuous volume, with wide margins and many vignettes.

Lowell's "Vision of Sir Launfal," which gave such an impetus to his early fame, was composed in forty-eight hours, while Gray struggled for seven years over his famous "Elegy."

Oscar Wilde has a weakness for white kid gloves and Turkish cigarettes. He is reported to be at work on a book that will deal with the "study of Christianity from the outside." With Wilde and Saltus invading the field of Renan and Lew Wallace the world of letters will witness some curious developments.

Men of letters are notoriously unreliable as critics of other men of letters. Thus, when an interviewer collates a series of opinions on similar topics from various literary people, we have a confusion of ideas which would make the sphinx grin. The sad wag of a syndicate writer who recently undertook this task met with particularly pleasing results from a humorous standpoint. He inflicted ten questions apiece upon seven noted American authors, and the replies are thrilling. George Bancroft, being asked whom he considered "master of the purest English," mentioned—the Hon. W. E. Gladstone. Julian Hawthorne named Cardinal Newman and John Ruskin; Edgar Fawcett was divided between Froude and Huxley; and Bill Nye modestly mentioned Bill Nye. No one said anything about Stevenson or Howells or Andrew Lang. In answer to the question, "What is your preference of all works of fiction?" the replies are even more singular. Bancroft preferred "the modern German school" of medieval sentimentality. Julian Hawthorne likes the "Scarlet Letter," "Monte Cristo," "Gil Blas," "Tom Jones," and "A Sentimental Journey." William D. Howells sticks manfully to Tolstoi, and prefers "War and Peace" to any modern novel. He also has an affection for "Don Quixote." Sober William Eggleston evinces a hardy literary appetite capable of withstanding a mixture of "Les Miserables" and "The Children of the Abbey." Edgar Fawcett is even more unconventional; he reads Henry James and Ouida, and is still in his right mind. Ella Wheeler Wilcox won't state her choice, "because it would be misunderstood," thus leaving us in painful doubt between Rabelais and Boccaccio.

Professional Chat.

It is narrated that a New England preacher of the olden time was paralyzed during a sermon by discovering his rude offspring in the gallery pelting the hearers in the pews below with peanuts. But while the good man was preparing a frown of reproof the young hopeful cried out: "Tend to your preaching, daddy; I'll keep 'em awake."

At the convening of Judge Van Fleet's department of the Superior Court last Friday, after vacation, there were, of course, some long arguments of counsel on various questions, notably on the part of the Attorney-General. During one of these arguments, and while Judge Van Fleet was complacently listening, Attorney-General Hart had occasion to use the pen; and after making several vigorous jabs into the ink battle, jokingly remarked that the vacation had caused the ink to "dry up." "Well," quietly and comically remarked the Judge, "the vacation has not had that effect on counsel."

It will not be many years before a family physician will be a thing of the past. Your boy will some day be brought home with a broken arm. You will think immediately of the surgeon who lives but a few blocks away. He is hurriedly summoned. As he enters the room he will look at the patient and exclaim: "Oh, it is the arm that is broken. I could not think of having anything to do with that; I am a leg specialist. You must send for Dr. Brown; he sets arms." It will be some comfort, while you sit waiting for Dr. Brown, to know that an arm specialist is going to mend your boy's broken arm. Some comfort, yes, but mighty cold comfort.

There are some disadvantages in going back into practice as a lawyer after having for many years sat upon the bench, says the New York Advertiser. A short time ago ex-Judge Noah Davis was arguing a motion before Judge Patterson of the Supreme Court. The argument was an extended one, and finally Judge Patterson remarked: "Now, Judge Davis, we will stop here until to-morrow, and you may then take half an hour in which to finish your address." "Oh, your honor, don't limit me as to time. Please don't limit me," pleaded the ex-judge, Judge Patterson's eyes twinkled as he reminded Judge Davis that when he was on the bench he had established a rule limiting the length of argument on chambers motions. It is safe to add, however, that the time limit was not adhered to very closely.

NOTES.

Photography has been reduced to such a science that colors can be taken as well as features. How will this please the freckle-faced girl at the sea shore?

Boulanger stalks about the streets of Brussels, "remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow." There is not much about the former "brav" Général to excite admiration nowadays. His figure has proved to be too small for the trappings of greatness.

England has a potato blight. The whole crop of South Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire is diseased and practically ruined, the "black spot" having appeared in every field. There are black spots in other departments, and they are not confined to the vegetable kingdom.

Orange omelet is a dainty desert. Slice the oranges, removing all peel, seeds and bits of tough inside skin. Sugar the pulp liberally and fold inside the omelet. Serve with powdered sugar, and, if desired, pour a large wineglassful of rum over all and burn it at the table.

Malignant malaria is slaying its hecatombs in Breslau. Should it cross the raging main, as la grippe did, and find a breeding place in the campaign sewage to be dumped all over this country next year, the office of coroner may prove to be the most important within the gift of the people.

The hot dispute between Havana and San Domingo as to which possesses the real bones of Columbus shadows forth a belief among the thrifty denizens of the Antilles that a good thing is in store for the person who can sell or lease the remains of the great discoverer to the Chicago fair.

Paris requires every vehicle traversing its streets at night, if only a wheelbarrow, to carry a lighted lamp. Safety is secured, and the avenues glitter as if swarming with giant fireflies. If some of our Riverside drivers would adhere to the ordinary rules of driving, there would be no need of any distinguishing lights.

An English naturalist has discovered proofs that the bedbug was quite common in the armies of the world 120 years before the Christian era, and that he was ever a sea rover, as the fleets of that day had the timbers stocked with this breed of nocturnal prowlers. The bedbug remains very vigorous in his antiquity.

Young James R. Garfield is likely to be the Republican nominee for State Senator from Lake county, O. Since his father's death he has lived at Mentor, at the old homestead, and is one of the town's most successful lawyers. He is a thoughtful student of politics, and is expected to make a name for himself in the legislature.

Sig. Crispi is declared to have a passion for the nightingale's song, which he loses no opportunity of hearing. Word was brought him recently that a particularly melodious nightingale was warbling in the ruins of the Coliseum, and the story goes that Crispi came near being shot by a sentry that night as he was making his way to a point of vantage near by.

A thousand years ago the builders of the Mosque of St. Sophia, in Constantinople, had forethought enough to mix musk with the mortar, and to-day its odor overpowers the other perfumes of the streets. It would be a grand thing in certain quarters of this city if musk was mixed in the building material so as to counteract the perfumes of a doubtful character which pervade such localities.

The old complaint about the scarcity of young men at the fashionable summer resorts is heard again this season. The trouble seems to be that the young man now goes off sailing on his yacht, roams off on his bicycle, or gets himself far away into the rural districts afoot or on horseback, with gun or rod, and no longer paces up and down the hotel piazzas for the edification of the girls. The young man has grown sensible.

According to the census returns, there are in California 405,313 horses. There were foaled in California in 1889, 56,116 horses. In the whole United States and Territories there were on hand June 1, 1890, 14,976,017 horses, 2,246,936 mules and 49,109 asses. The last enumeration of course refers to four-legged asses. There are thousands of long-eared bipeds that could without doubt be included in the category of "asses." We have some in this city.

In Southern Hungary there is a class of people whose practices make divorce easy. A society of women exists which, for a compensation, poison people to order. It is said that the chief patronage comes from women who have become tired of their husbands and procure the aid of the "poisoners" to get rid of the marital incumbrance. This is an improvement on the old judicial manner of dissolving the matrimonial bonds, at least to the extent of being prompt and effectual, without the circumlocution of court process.

Under no condition is the American woman likely to rival the French woman in careful costuming. A lady familiar with Paris says that the Parisians unhesitatingly pronounce a lady to be an American, when they see her adjust her gloves after reaching the street. To don her gloves as she walks, or when she is fairly settled in car or carriage, is a fixed habit here with the average woman. The New York woman does this to save time, the Western woman from carelessness, the Southern woman because she hopes to be excused from putting them on at all.

One of the committees of the Georgia legislature has recommended the enactment of a "bachelors' law," taxing celibates of thirty $25 a year. The amount is to be raised every five years until the victim is sixty, when he must pay $200 for the privilege of living homeless and alone. This will be a popular measure with gentlemen who are already implicated in matrimony. There is, however, a suggestion of cruelty about it to the single man who has done his best and still cannot find a single Georgia girl who will have him. He is not to blame, yet he will have to pay a tax just as much as though he were.

Speaker Reed has not added to his fame as a statesman in attacking the reciprocity doctrine and calling it "an attempt to carry on commerce by diplomacy." The idea was grandly diplomatic. Had it been originated by any other than James G. Blaine our doughty speaker might not have made the attack. There has been no commercial scheme which has taken such hold as reciprocity, and it has made America the envy of our European neighbors. So popular has the plan become that our democratic friends are now trying to steal the credit of its adoption from Secretary Blaine, fearing that it might be the watchword of victory in 1892 for James G. Blaine. Tom Reed is not adding anything to his laurels when he attacks reciprocity.

On Monday the great State exposition will open in this city and continue for two weeks, including eleven days racing. The speed programme embraces some of the fastest horses in the world. The art gallery will have the work of some of the best artists known, as well as some of the gems from Pacific coast artists. The pavilion is being made attractive. The famous Liberatti will furnish the music at the exhibition pavilion. Nothing is left undone to make all the features of the fair attractive and instructive. At the agricultural park with the stock parades there will be ladies' riding tournaments, balloon ascension, twenty-mile saddle-horse race, vaquero tournament. The playground for children will have attractive features. Much praise is due the directors for the complete arrangements of all the details of the fair.

The trouble about the equalization of the assessment rolls of San Francisco and some other counties has again arisen. There is certainly much that appeals to justice in the protests that are made by the officers and the press of San Francisco against an arbitrary raise. The State Board of Equalization can deal with the assessment roll of a county only as an entirety, and for that reason it is powerless to accomplish anything for good. Were it provision had been made for an equalization as between individual properties there would be some sense in it. It must be recognized that the basis of our system of revenue and taxation so elaborately outlined in the thirteen sections of Article XIII of the State Constitution is extremely confusing, the natural result of a constitutional convention enacting a copious volume of statutes. However, it will be the courts must misconstrue the language of the framers of the Constitution, and make it mean sense; adjust it to the changed conditions of a people.

What an invalid Creed Haymond must have been when he was in Russia, since he informs a Chronicle interviewer that his physicians absolutely forbade him to either read or write, so that, away off in that God-forgotten country, he dared not even look at a newspaper of his own State! What on earth was the matter with the delicate man? Really it does look as if there was something wrong with his mental construction since he says, among a lot of other slop, "they (the Russians) worship the Czar; believe no one who says they do not. They are at all times ready to die for him, and the very tyranny which he exercises over them is deemed a blessed thing." Did Creed ever read the curdling history of the surfs of that land, as told by George Kennan, who has spent as many years in Russia as Haymond did days? Can it be that the Colonel expects to apply to the Czar for a place in the department of injustice there when his services are no longer wanted at the foot of Fourth street? Better read a little history, Creed—when your health will permit.

A fly lays 320 eggs during a summer. The progeny of a single fly may from June 1st to September 30th exceed 2,000,000.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Early Opening of the Winter Theatrical Season—Exodus of Natives and Influx of Strangers—In Quest of Female Horn Tooters—The Deadly Immature Fruit Crop—A Brace of Anecdotes of Royalty.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, August 29, 1891.

For some years past the general complaint among the purveyors of amusement and cold-weather pastimes has been that the "season" has been opening later every fall. This year, however, the dramatic season has opened unusually early and with considerable success. To all appearances, we shall have a remarkably good season, for the taste of the public appears to be settled in favor of light plays, and the managers have gone into comedy to an unheard of extent. Nobody that I have seen so far is able to explain why the dramatic season, that has heretofore opened in September, should suddenly spring into life in the middle of August. It surely isn't the cool weather. New York is deserted and yet is crowded to the limits. Nobody knows where the New Yorkers have betaken themselves, although a well-known steamship agent is responsible for the estimate that not less than one hundred thousand residents of this little village are now in Europe. Apparently there are some millions tucked into odd corners, for the reports from Saratoga are that the hotels are at last filled and the bonifaces are happy once more. At Albany Park and the other near-by watering places the sudden rush of guests has well nigh swamped the hotels and boarding-houses. Only a few weeks ago there was less than one fifth the usual number registered than for the month of July a year ago, and complaints of impending disaster were so general as to give this the name of the most disastrous season on record. But all that is changed now. Meanwhile New York is crowded to the very doors. All the theaters that have been open during the summer are running to the capacity of the houses. Jane and A Fair Rebel, which were produced a week or so ago, have jumped into public favor with scarcely an effort. The houses that have opened their doors early have done a uniformly good business, and the outlook is unusually bright.

Of course the audiences are made up pretty much of strangers. The average New Yorker who has made a study of American character as developed in various sections of this rather extensive country of ours can readily pick out the stranger within our gates, and can form a pretty accurate opinion of the section from whence he hails. There is always something amusing to the native in the air of restlessness and shyness about the visitors, that is in such marked contrast with the indifferent and almost languid manner of the New Yorker. At the play he grabs his hat the moment the curtain begins to fall and rushes out of the house as though pursued by a great calamity. He is usually in his seat within three minutes, and waits with the utmost impatience the rising of the curtain. Another of the hallmarks of the visitor is that he gives vent to his feelings in a most demonstrative way, thereby proving how much he is impressed by the scene before him, and, by implication, that he is somewhat out of his element.

One theatrical manager is just now receiving the sympathy of his friends, and that is Mr. Jesse Williams, director of the Lillian Russel Opera Company. Aside from the effort to harmonize the peculiar vocal methods of a Chicago prima donna, a Spanish baritone, and a German tenor, he has undertaken the herculean task of organizing a female orchestra to play in the ballroom scene of the second act of La Cigale. It was at first thought by experts that he would have to send to Europe for his performers; and visions of innumerable entanglements with the politicians of the musical union rose before him. But Mr. Williams decided that he could organize his troop as easily on this side of the herring pond as in European capitals. As a result he has succeeded in almost completing the required formation. The only delay has been in securing what is technically known as "brass." There is an astonishing number of women in New York who play the violoncello, flute, liarp, and clarinet; but when it comes to trombones and horns feminine artists are about as rare as roses in the ditches of the Broadway cable road. Mr. Williams has, however, the nucleus of an orchestra, and will no doubt soon have an organization equal to any demands he may make upon it. Mr. Williams usually keeps his promises. Of course, it is inevitable that the ubiquitous press agent should assert that the members of this orchestra are drawn from society women following out a fad. Such a claim is not likely to be widely credited, but if the company does anything like good work, it will give us a novelty, and that is what we are all after.

According to the comic weeklies this is the season of the year when Johnnie Jones and his sister Sue yearn to partake of the peach of emerald hue, and then to take their stand among the angels. From the standpoint of the truth, however, I suppose there is no American family, "no matter of what race, color, or previous condition of servitude," that would allow a child to eat unripe fruit. Yet that is an ordinary sight among our Italian residents. Apples, the size of a hickory nut, are eagerly devoured by these people, who appear to be the receptacle for all the refuse and indigestible things that would kill a civilized man at the first trial. The board of health officers are constantly at work during the warm weather confiscating and destroying unwholesome food products; but the fact remains that we have with us a class of people who would deliberately invite the cholera or yellow jack to enter our doors, and then use their utmost endeavors to nullify the work of our health officers. A prominent physician, when asked how these people survived the violation of every known sanitary law, replied: "It kills those people, too; they're dying all the time, only you don't hear about it."

An early arrival from the other side was telling a couple of stories the other night, which may or may not be new, but were received as genuine by experts. The first was at the expense of a certain master of Trinity College, who thought it would be well to exercise his prerogative on the occasion of the Queen's paying a visit to his college. He accordingly kept his cap on his head during the proceedings. As her majesty took no notice of the circumstance, he began to feel uncomfortable, and think that an apology would be in order. He finally summoned up courage enough to say: "Your majesty has perhaps wondered why I should appear so far wanting in respect as to keep my hat on all day, but it has perhaps escaped your majesty's memory that the Lords Kingsale and Forrester and the master of Trinity are the only persons in the kingdom who have a right to remain with heads covered in the presence of the sovereign." "Just so," replied the Queen, in a frigid tone, "but not in the presence of a lady." The poor doctor spent the rest of the week in wondering how many kinds of an ass he could be in a given time, and mentally consigning all observance of ancient customs to the most caloric corner of Hades.

The other story is to the credit of the Prince of Wales. The Prince is noted for his promptness in keeping social appointments, particularly those with people of the lower class, with whom he represents the Queen. On a certain occasion not long since he arrived at an entertainment somewhat late. One high-born lady, presuming on her position and intimacy with the Prince, took him to task, and sarcastically asked if "Mamma would not let her little boy out?" His royal highness at once assumed his dignity and buried the playful lady by replying: "My mother has a right to command my time, madam, for she is my queen and yours." All of which goes to show, as Kipling would say, that it is not always safe to presume upon a rule of conduct obtained by inductive reasoning.

The Bureau of Police of Vienna, according to the Wiener Extra-Blatt, issued a circular recently which strikes a heavy blow at the liberty of women. The fair Austrians have already protested against the circular; their foreign sisters, it is believed, will aid them in their crusade against its execution. "The high Imperial and Royal Government," reads the circular, according to the papers, "has under consideration the question of the advisability of denying women the privilege of wearing trains to their dresses on the public streets. The Federal Sanitary Council of Lower Austria has expressed the opinion that the wearing of such trains should be forbidden, as they raise the dust and thus aid in conveying the germs of infectious disease to the lungs. The practical execution of a measure forbidding the use of such trains, however, is coupled with many difficulties, as are all measures dealing with excesses in style. In accordance with the wishes of the Imperial and Royal Government, the Commissioners of Police are requested to present their views upon the necessity and availability of such a measure." The Extra-Blatt fails to inform us of the reports of the medico-Worths of the Viennese police.

The heads of the big European nations have good reasons for their dislike for France. Twice in its career in the past hundred years France started movements which upset several governments in the old world and shook a few of the rest of them. Its present prosperity under popular rule is a constant menace to every monarch in Christendom. The restoration of either the Bonapartes or Bourbons to power in France would, in a figurative sense, be greeted with a regular hallelujah chorus by every crowned head from the Thames to the Neva and from the Mediterranean to the Arctic ocean.

FLASHES.

Doctors and lawyers live on the misfortunes of humanity.

When the seaside vacation ends the people come home for a rest.

Always praise your wife. If you do not you don't deserve a good one.

That loose minded fellow that poses as a wag is often only a scallawag.

When a fellow gets hot at a former friend, the cooler he acts towards him.

There can be no doubt that the girl of the period has no time to read—she shows it.

Politics and partizanship are prompt to excuse dishonesty, and frequently to reward it.

Some country people don't drink green tea—they don't need it, they are green enough without.

They have discovered another wild man. He should be at once returned to Sacramento, the improvement association needs him.

What Is It?

We cull the following gem from an editorial published in our morning contemporary:

HUMAN STAGNATION.

John Burroughs, in the Atlantic Monthly, well says that "a man's life may stagnate as literally as water may stagnate." It is a truth that not a few men, to their sorrow, fail to understand. Activity, at least motion, movement, is the law of well-being. The human being can rot upon its stalk of life as certainly as will fruit or flowers upon theirs. Men were created to contend, if with nothing else, at least with themselves. We can conceive of no more truly pitiable object than he who has absolutely nothing to do; who is in a state of positive inaction; who has no concern in the world of things or in the well or ill being of his fellows.

We have read the article several times, and have been unable to determine precisely what the editor tried to get at. Is it possible an attempt is being made to define the expression "innocuous desuetude?"

An Old Texas Town.

The oldest town in Texas, and, it is believed, in the United States, is Ysleta, situated on the Rio Grande, and near El Paso, the chief town in the county of that name. It has a population of 2,500 souls. The place is one of peculiar interest, alike from its age, its people, its architecture, its agriculture and its general products. It is a well established historical fact that a Spanish military explorer named Corando visited the town in 1540 and found it then a popular and prosperous civilized Indian community. He was immediately followed by the Franciscan Friars, who erected a church and established schools. Ysleta is believed to have been a considerable center of population centuries before the visit of Corando. It is not a little curious, considering the advance of civilization from Europe, that the same race of people exists in the town to-day that existed 350 years ago, and that they are engaged in the same agricultural and mechanical pursuits as their forefathers at that period and for ages preceding.

A very excellent departure in the way of weekly articles has of late been introduced by a leading English women's journal. Every seven days the wife of an M. P., otherwise known as a member of parliament, writes a brief record of any doings of great pith or moment that are debated by the commons. From her seat behind the grating of the gallery, where women are permitted to view and listen to the law-makers, this clever woman watches and notes all proceedings, and during those months when parliament is in session keeps her sisters well informed with regard to the nation's affairs. Her letter is written in clear, sprightly English, that enables all women to keep pace with political movements without the aid of prejudiced and prosy daily newspapers. Something of this nature is sadly needed for American women, who are so strangely ignorant of political action, not only in Washington but in their own state's senate, and even the town councils.

The latest jealous wife heard from up to the hour of going to press says she "spotted" her man because she saw he was "wearing too many neckties." This demands close thought. Too many neckties at a time? Or in succession? If so, required to be known the normal number of neckties a man may wear and yet conserve his character.

At the close of his present term in the Senate John Sherman will have been thirty-eight years in office without interruption. This is a remarkable record as to time, and the service which it represents has even been more remarkable in its benefits to the country and his party.

"Heat," explained Colonel Sellers when the stove door fell off and exposed to view his pious fraud, "heat is a non-conductor." That it conducts itself badly, on occasions, the people of this so-called temperate zone are ready with one accord to bear witness.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

During fair week there will be no lack of amusements. Both the Clunie Opera House and Metropolitan Theater will be open.

The Dazzler, a sharp farce comedy, will be produced for the first time in this city on Monday night at the Metropolitan. Kate Castleton is the particular star of the company. The support is said to be fine. While we think that farce comedy has about run its course, there are many that prefer that line of acting to the more meritorious drama. Hoyt has worked the vein for all that there is legitimately in it.

Under the head of popular amusements may be considered the splendid entertainment given under the auspices of the Sacramento Athletic Club, on Tuesday evening, at the club rooms. The tournament was a free amateur exhibition, and the young gentlemen who took part are deserving of praise for their rapid advancement in athletic sports. This particular evening's entertainment was given to proficiency in the art of boxing, and right cleverly did the contestants acquit themselves. Among the members of our local club can be found some exceedingly good gymnasts and bar performers. In the latter we have at least two that cannot be surpassed in the ring or on the stage. Joe Mansfield has but one superior, and that is Robert Leando of the Olympic Club. We mention this specially, but without disparagement to the very many exceedingly clever amateur artists in the Sacramento Athletic Club. We fee, it incumbent on us to say and advise that our young friends of the club make often repetitions of their tournaments and exhibitions. The club is fortunate in having such a live president as Geo. H. Clark. Indeed, the officers and instructors of the club are wide awake.

He Retired Early.

A little story was related at the navy yard the other day which concerns Rear Admiral Thomas O. Selfridge (retired), who is visiting his son, Captain Thomas O. Selfridge, the commandant of the navy yard. Some years ago the admiral, who is the oldest living United States naval officer, being over 90 years of age, was dining at Delmonico's in New York with a distinguished company, among whom were Generals Grant, Garfield, Arthur, Sherman and Sheridan. At 10 o'clock, when the festivities were at their height, the old admiral arose and called for his hat and coat. All were surprised at the action and called for an explanation. He replied that he never permitted enjoyment to interfere with his health, and that 10 o'clock was a good hour for him to retire.

All present laughed heartily, chaffed him a little and begged him to remain.

He could not, however, be coaxed to remain. After bidding them good-night he added: "Early to bed and sound sleep tend to longevity, and I'm going to prove it to you all." All except the admiral who were present at the banquet that evening have passed away. The admiral has kept his word.

It has been truly said that "arrogance is a plebeian veil." But many people fail to appreciate the fact, and insolence is widely adopted as a means of exhibiting independence, which would not be otherwise apparent. Indeed, in nine cases out of ten you can put down an insolent individual as one who is naturally inferior, habitually trampled upon, and fearful lest his true insignificance be discovered by others. As a matter of fact he adopts the very best means of publishing his inferiority. Go into any store, any office, and you will find that arrogance varies inversely as rank. For the truly great, the leaders among men, are conspicuously civil and gentle in manner; their positions are assured. It is the ignorant and the unimportant who foolishly seek by means of impudence and pomposity to convey an idea of independence which they are fully conscious of lacking. It is hardly necessary to add that this impression is never really conveyed.

Hannibal Hamlin's first trip to Washington was filled with variety. From his home he traveled to Portland by stage coach. From Portland he went to Boston by boat, then to Norwich by rail; from the latter place he crossed the sound to Greendport; from there he took the Long Island railroad to New York; from the latter place he again took the railroad to Philadelphia; from that point he made the best of his way by boat and stage coach to Baltimore, and from the Monumental city at last reached the capital by rail. Arriving in Washington after this tedious journey, he found it to be a struggling, dilapidated and overgrown village of less than 20,000 inhabitants. The streets of magnificent houses which now accommodate the two hundred and odd thousand of the place were then used as cow pastures.

"I wouldn't marry the best man on earth," she said vigorously, "with a touch of malice in her tones. 'And why not?' inquired her companion. 'Because,' and she smiled, 'I wouldn't know what to do with him. One that isn't quite so good would suit me better, I think.'"

The Age of Man.

When was man first placed on the earth? No one can answer that question. Hugh Miller says that man's habit of burying his dead out of sight makes it very easy to be mistaken on that point; for, because of burial, man's bones may be found among animals that have lain in the earth for ages. There is one thing, however, that gives us an inkling of when he came. Certain tools that only man could have made, have been found buried in caves, in peat beds, and in the bottom of lakes. Often these are covered by layers of rock, and by calculating how long it took to make the layers, a guess can be made as to when the tools were put there. Still it is only a guess, and no one pretends to regard that question as settled, because under some conditions the layers would be made much faster than under others; but the bones of certain animals, the mammoth and other great creatures of that time, which have long since died, have been found with these tools. By calculating in what ages these animals lived, and how long it takes a race of animals to die out, a surer result can be arrived at. In a cave in England, buried under a limestone layer from one to fifteen inches thick, tools have been found mingled with the bones of elephants, tigers, rhinoceroses, and hyenas, which roamed over that country thousands and thousands of years ago. The peat bogs of what is now Denmark and Scandinavia are filled with these stone tools. Some have been found in beds of gravel, underlying peat which is certainly 7,000 years old. This seems to show that man must have dwelt on earth at least as many years ago.

Don't Use Big Words.

"When I announced myself as a harrisyoph to-day, that gasconer, Phil Rubbish, proclaimed me a latinistaster, and enunciated that I had better seek the latibulum until my physiognomy had a more hirsutish appearance," said a certain youth who attends the Vallejo High School, to his father, on returning home the other evening, his chest heaving with just indignation. "My son," said the old gentleman, "as soon as he was able to catch his breath, 'in promulgating your esoteric cogitations, or articulating superficial sentimentalities and philosophical or psychological observations, beware of platitudinous ponderosity. Let your conversation possess a classified conciseness, compact comprehensibility, coalescent consistency. Eschew all conglomerations of flatulent garbality, jejune babblement and asinine affectations. Let your extemporaneous descantings and unpremeditated expectations have intelligibility and veracious vivacity, without rhodomontary or thrasonical bombast. Sedulously avoid all polysyllable profundity, pompous prolixity, psittaceous vacuity, ventriloquial verbosity and vaniloquent vapidity. Shun double entendres, prurient jocosity and pestiferous profanity, obscure or apparent; in other words, talk plainly, naturally, sensibly, truthfully and purely—and don't use big words.'"

Derivation of "Tahoe."

The name Tahoe is usually said to be an Indian word, the name also of a tribe. An old Spaniard once told me that this was not true. He held a rather interesting theory about it. Taho or Tayho, he said, was an almost forgotten mediæval Spanish noun, that meant "a deep chasm filled with water." I could not find it in modern Spanish dictionaries, he informed me (and I did not), but Spanish philologists knew the word. His notion was that some Spanish captive from Mexico, or some shipwrecked person, a long time ago, perhaps in the seventeenth century, had passed from tribe to tribe, had seen this great lake over 1,600 feet deep, lying in the vast cleft in the Sierras, and so had named it Tahoe, and had taught the name to the Indians.—Overland.

It seems extraordinary to observe a number of the bats in the evening flying back and forth through the trees with remarkable rapidity, but without ever coming in contact with the branches or hurting themselves. Spallanzani, the Italian naturalist, placed a hat in a dark inclosure, across which were stretched a number of threads, crossing and retcrossing each other. The bat flew rapidly back and forth trying to effect its escape, but avoided the threads with as much ease as if they had not been in its way in the least. Whether this curious power was the result of a sixth and unknown sense was long a puzzle to naturalists. To decide this knotty point Spallanzani resorted to the cruel expedient of blinding a bat, and found that it still flew among the threads without being, to all appearances, any more inconvenienced than if it still had its eyesight.—Illustrated American.

Young reporter—"The storm king hurled his torn and tumbling torrents over the ruins of the broken and dismembered edifice." Old editor—"What's that? What do you mean, young fellow?" Young reporter—"I—er—er—the flood washed away Patrick McDougal's old soap factory."

Several reciprocity treaties are now in course of negotiation, and will be completed and proclaimed in time to give the Republican party a decided boost in the fall elections.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor. E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor, having applied to this Court for a discharge from his debts, it is hereby ordered that the Clerk of this Court give notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, to appear before this Court, at the court-room thereof, on the 2d day of October, 1891, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock, P. M., and show cause, if any they have, why the said E. M. Stevens should not be discharged from all his debts, in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided. It is further ordered, that notice of said application be given to the creditors by mail, and by publication for four weeks in the THEMIS, a newspaper published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated September 3d, 1891.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. sep5-4t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of F. L. Bates, an insolvent debtor. F. L. Bates, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said F. L. Bates is hereby declared to be insolvent. All persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association, for his use, and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the county of Sacramento, on the 9th day of October, 1891, at 1:30 P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, September 3d, A. D. 1891.
C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Filed September 3d, 1891.
W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
CLINTON L. WHITE, Attorney for Petitioner. sep5-5t

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber
and Elder Flower
Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hair-dressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

Cures the worst cases of Freckles, Sunburn, Sallowiness, Moth Patches, Pimples, and all skin blemishes. Price, $1.50. Harmless and effective. No sample can be sent. Lady Agents wanted.

The Druggist in this city who first orders a bill of my preparations will have his name added to this advertisement.

My preparations are for sale by wholesale druggists in Chicago and every city west of it.

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

J. FRANK CLARK,
UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL o LOAN o OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

THE MAD MAYOR.

One of the Mayors of Cornwall was "the mad Mayor of Gantick, who was wise for a long day, and then died of it."

It seems that the Cornish village of Gantick was used once in every year to purge itself of evil. To this end the villagers prepared a huge dragon of pasteboard and marched out with it to a sandy common, since cut up by tin works, but still known as Dragon's Moor. Here they would choose one of their number to be Mayor, and submit to him all questions of conscience, and such cases of notorious evil-living as the law failed to provide for. Summary justice waited on all his decisions; and as the village was usually chosen for the post, you may guess that the horse-play was rough at times. When this was over, and the public conscience purged, the company fell on the pasteboard dragon with sticks and whacked him into small pieces, which they buried in a small hollow called the Dragon Pit; and so returned gladly to their homes to start on another twelve months of sin.

The Feast of Purification fell always on July 12; and in the heyday of its celebration there lived in a cottage a widow woman and her only son, a demented man about 40 years old. There was no harm in the poor creature, who worked at the Lanihorne slate-quarries, six miles off, as a "hollihubber"—that is to say, in carting away the refuse slate. Every morning he walked to his work, mumbling to himself as he went; and though the children followed him at times, hooting and flinging stones, they grew tired at last, finding that he never resented it. His mother, a tall, silent woman, with an inscrutable face—had supper ready for him when he returned, and was often forced to feed him, while he unlocked his tongue and babbled over the small adventures of the day. He was not one of those gifted idiots who hear voices in the wind and know the language of the wild birds. His talk was merely incoherent; and, for the rest, he had large gray eyes, features of that regularity which we call Greek, and stood six feet two in his shoes.

One hot morning—it was July 12—he was starting for his work, when an indescribable hubbub sounded up the road, and presently came by the whole rabble of Gantick, with cow-horns and instruments of percussion, and in their midst the famous dragon—all green, with fiery, painted eyes, and a long tongue of red flannel. Behind it the prisoners were escorted—a pale woman or two, with dazed, terrified faces, an old man suspected of egg-stealing, a cow addicted to trespass, and so on.

The Mayor was not chosen yet, this ceremony being deferred by rule till the crowd reached Dragon's Moor. But drawing near the cottage door and catching sight of the half-witted man, with his foot on the threshold, a village wit called out and proposed that they should take "the Mounster" (as he was called) along with them for Mayor.

It hit the mob's humor, and they cheered. The Mounster's mother, standing in the doorway, went white as if painted.

"Man in the lump's a hateful animal," she said to herself, hoarsely; "come in doors, Jonathan, an' let 'em go by."

"Come an' rule over us," the crowd invited him, and a gleam of proud delight woke in his silly face.

"The heat—his head won't stand it." The woman looked up at the cloudless sky. "For God's sake, take your fun elsewhere!" she cried.

The women who were led to judgment looked at her stupidly. They, too, suffered, without understanding, the heavy sport of men. At last one said:

"Old woman, let him come. 'We'll have more mercy from a mazed man."

"Sister, you've been loose, they tell me," answered the old woman, "an' must eat the bitter fruit o't. But my son's an innocent. Jonathan, they'll look for you at the works."

"There's prouder work for me 'pon Dragon's Moor," the Mounster decided, with sniling eyes. "Come along, mother, an' see me exalted."

The crowd bore him off at their head, and the din broke out again. The new Mayor strutted among them with lifted chin and a radiant face. He thought it glorious. His mother ran into the cottage, fetched a bottle, and followed after the dusty tail of the procession. Once, as they were passing a running stream, she halted and filled the bottle carefully, emptying it again and again until the film outside the glass was to her liking. Then she followed, and came to Dragon's Moor.

They sat the Mayor on a mound, took off his hat, placed a crown on his head and broomstick in his hand, and brought him the case to try.

The first was a gray mare possessed (they alleged) with a devil. Her skin hung like a sack on her bones.

"'Tis Eli Thom's mare. What's to be done to cure her?" they asked.

"Let Eli Thom's buy a comb an' comb his mare's tail while she eats her feed; so Eli'll know if 'tis the devil or no that steals oats from his manger."

They applauded his wisdom, and brought forward the woman who had pleaded just now with his mother.

"Who made her?" he asked, having listened to the charge.

"God, 'tis to be supposed."

"God makes no evil."

"The devil, then."

"Then whack the devil."

They fell on the pasteboard dragon and belabored him. The sun poured down on the Mayor's throne, and his mother, who sat by his right hand wondering at his sense, gave him water to drink from the bottle. They brought a third case—a boy who had been caught torturing a cow. He had taken a saw and tried to saw off one of her horns while she was tethered in her stall.

The Mayor leaped from his seat.

"Kill him!" he shouted; "take him off and kill him!" His face was twisted with passion, and he lifted his stick. The crowd fell back for a second, but the old woman leaned forward and touched her son softly on the leg. He stopped short, the anger died out of his face and he shivered.

"No," he said; "I was wrong, neighbors. The boy is mad, I think, an' 'tis a terrible lot to be mad. This is the devil's doing, out o' doubt. Beat the devil."

"Simme," said one in the crowd, "the sins o' Gantick be wearin' out the smoky man at a terrible rate."

"Aye," answered another, "his naughtiness bain't equal to Gantick." And this observation was the original of a proverb, still repeated: "As naughty as Gantick, where the devil struck for shorter hours."

There was no cruelty that day on Dragon's Moor. All the afternoon the mad Mayor sat in the sun's eye and gave judgment, while his mother, from time to time, wiped away the froth that gathered on his lips, and moistened them with water from her bottle. From first to last she never spoke a word, but sat with a horror in her eyes and watched the flushed cheeks of this grown-up, bearded son. And all the afternoon the men of Gantick brayed the devil into shreds.

I said there was no cruelty on Dragon's Moor that day. But at sundown the Mayor turned to his mother and said:

"We've been over-hasty, mother. We ought to ha' found out who made the devil what he is."

At last the sun dropped; the shadow fell on the brown moors and crept up the mound where the mother and son sat. The brightness died out of the Mayor's face.

Three minutes after he flung up his hands and cried: "Mother, my head!—my head!"

She rose, still without a word, pulled down his arms, slipped one within her own and led him away to the road. The crowd did not interfere; they were burying the broken dragon, with shouts and rough play.

A woman followed them to the road and tried to clasp the Mayor's knees as he staggered.

His mother beat her away.

"Off wi' you!" she cried; "'tis your reproach he's bearin'."

She helped him slowly home. In the shadow of the cottage the inspired look that he had worn all day returned for a moment. Then a convulsion took him, casting him on the floor.

At nine o'clock he died, with his head on her lap.

She closed his eyes, smoothed the wrinkles on his tired face, and sat watching him for some time. At length she lifted and laid him on the deal table at full length, bolted the door, put the heavy shutter on the low window, and began to light the fire.

For fuel she had a heap of peat turves and some sticks. Having lit it, she set a crock of water to warm, and undressed the man slowly. Then, the water being ready, she washed and laid him out, chafing his limbs and talking to herself all the while.

"Fair, straight legs," she said; "beautiful body that leaped in my side forty years back and thrilled me! How proud I was! Why did God make you beautiful?"

All night she sat caressing him. And the smoke of the peat turves, finding no exit and no draught to carry it up the chimney, crept around and killed her quietly beside her son.

American Apprentices.

A system of apprenticeship that is found to work admirably at the Riverside Press, Cambridge, Mass., is that they pay no "wages," as such, but simply support the boy during the term of his apprenticeship. After the preliminary service of three or four months "on trial," he is examined by a physician and indentured. An average of $4 per week is paid him during the first two years. This is increased from time to time till the end of his term. The limit is $6 per week. In addition to this, they allow $30 a year for "clothes money." This is increased by $10 annually. On holidays they are in the habit of making their apprentices some trifling present. At the end of the boy's term, they usually make him a present of $50 or $100, and give him a diploma.

Probably the country will gain more by its reciprocity treaty with Cuba and Porto Rico than by any other compact of the sort yet entered into, but gains will come from all of them. The great conquests in this line, however, will be brought about by the trade arrangements which we will make with Canada and Mexico.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL

HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND

SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO

OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than J. SLAUGHTER, Sixth and M streets.

Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT

BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B. PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

Capital Coffee House

J. H. BRUNING, Proprietor.

509 K STREET,

Between Fifth and Sixth, SACRAMENTO.

Fine Coffee, Tea or Milk, { With Pie or Cake, } 10 Cents.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS,

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,
WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS
AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE NO. 41.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED,

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispeused by urbane and competent attendants.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET,

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.

410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

The Story of the Sabre.

"Did you hear that?"

I listened, and after a moment it came again—some one on the street sounding the call of "boots and saddles" on a bugle. It wasn't well done, but it had something of the old, familiar ring—something to make the blood leap faster.

"I couldn't help but rattle about," said the sabre, as the notes died away. "It's a quarter of a century since I've heard those notes, and yet it all comes back to me in a flash. I hear the commands: 'Prepare to mount!' 'Mount!' and once more I am jangling alongside of a trooper's leg."

"Do you remember when I got you?" I asked.

"Of course I do. I was hanging in the kitchen of a farmer's house at Brandy Station, Va., and you bought me for two silver dollars. That was so soon after the war that I hadn't time to rust. You can't find many 'C. S. A.' belt-plates around these days, I reckon?"

"They are very scarce." What's your story?"

"That of a thousand other sabres. You've heard of Stuart, the cavalier, as our boys used to call him? Well, I had the honor to make that famous ride around McClellan's army with him. That was my first active service. I belonged to a captain, as you can see, and he knew how to handle me well. You remember when Stuart was killed? Well, on that day my captain was beset by three troopers at once, but we won a victory. The very first down-stroke he made cut one of those common sabres slick in halves, and at his first 'point' I was driven through a trooper's body. Ugh! Makes me shiver to think of it! Poor Stuart! I saw strong men weep like children that day when they heard of his fatal wounding. Ever up the Shenandoah valley?"

"Yes."

"Well, after a time, my captain was transferred over there, and I was carried up and down until I knew every crook and turn of the highways. My captain was killed over there in a skirmish, and a second lieutenant of cavalry somehow got hold of me. This was promotion backwards, but I soon found out that he had strength and skill. It wasn't over three months, though, before he was also killed, and from then on I had a dozen owners. I was in the cavalry, infantry and artillery by turns, and I always got around in time for all the big fights. You've heard of Fitz Hugh Lee?"

"Yes."

"And Wade Hampton?"

"Of course."

"Well, at different times I served under both. The night Gen. Jackson was killed at Chancellorsville I wasn't a quarter of a mile away. Wasn't that a terrible blow to us? They kept the news from us as long as they could; but when it became known some men looked white and scared, and others hid their faces and wept. You were at Gettysburg, of course? Rather hot work there, eh! When Custer drove at us, thinking to get hold of our wagon-train, I had the honor of giving one of 'you 'uns' a slash across the face which made him a homely man for the rest of his life. You men under Custer followed us over the mountains. Lands! but didn't it rain as Lee began to fall back? We turned on you two or three times and left the road full of dead; but our orders were to fall back to the river. Did you make the Wilderness campaign?"

"Yes."

"What a place that was for two mighty armies to grapple! I had got into the infantry again, and 'tis time a major had me. He was among the first killed, and before noon the captain of a battery had me buckled around him. I changed owners three times before Lee finally stood at bay and prepared to dole out the blood of the Confederacy until the last drop was gone. Ah! those were grim and gruesome days. In and around Petersburg were barefooted captains and ragged colonels, and there were days when even a brigadier could not get full rations. Outside of the army there were those who could see the beginning of the end, but we in it never gave up hoping. It was hope and fight, fight and hope, and even when the calamity came we couldn't comprehend it. We always believed 'Uncle Robert' would find a way out of it, but the day finally came when he had done all that human hands could do. Appomattox? Ah! it hurts, and yet why should it? We had done better than the veterans of Napoleon, and when we laid down our arms not a cheer was heard from your legions. You felt how it was, and you had only kind words. It was always 'Yank' and 'Johnny' with us at the front, and if the politicians had kept away we'd never felt the bitterness that came later on. Oh! well, that's all in the past, and what's gone is gone. I wouldn't have said a word, you know, but that bugle woke me up, and for just a minute I seemed to hear the old y! y! y! again, and to feel the exultation of a cavalry charge."

M. QUAD.

Mr. William Astor is described as "a portly gentleman of some 50 years, whose hair has been whitened by Time's frosty track. Age has crabbled his temper and made him so suspicious of general humanity that he tries to travel incognito."

Two Strange Stories.

Two young women, while bathing the other day at Bandoran, on the coast of Donegal—a beautiful seaside place much frequented by visitors and excursionists—were carried out to sea by the tide. A boat was soon got out from the harbor, and the bodies were so quickly found that, had prompt measures been taken, life would probably have been restored.

Instead of taking them out of the water, however, the boatmen attached a rope to them and towed them ashore, in deference to a popular superstition that it is unlucky to take a corpse into a boat. When the bodies were got to land, everything possible was done by the doctors and others, but in vain; which is not surprising, for the mere towing the bodies half a mile through the sea would be sufficient to cause death.—London Truth.

It is very strange how rife superstition still is, in spite of all our boasted civilization. We have heard of a young lady in Berlin getting up in the night to go in her nightdress, walking backward, to pick St. John's wort, the famous herb which, if we mistake not, plucked in this way, enables a young maiden to see her future husband. The girl, while thus employed, suddenly perceived coming toward her a white figure. The sight so frightened her that she dropped down dead; and the alarming form proved to be only another maiden on the same errand.—St. James Gazette.

Two Connundrums.

"Brown, do you know why you are like a donkey?"

"Like a donkey?" echoed Brown, opening wide his eyes. "No, I don't."

"Do you give it up?"

"I do."

"Because your better half is stubbornness itself."

"That's not bad. Ha! ha! 'I'll give that to my wife when I get home.'"

"Mrs. Brown," he asked, as he sat down to supper, "do you know why I am so much like a donkey?"

He waited a moment expecting his wife to give it up.

She looked at him somewhat commiseratingly as she answered:

"I suppose because you were born so."

The other one:

"I always speak of Adam as Colonel."

"Why so?"

"Well, I liken him to a Kernel, and hence to a kernel of corn."

"Oh, what rubbish! What are you trying to perpetrate? Why do you liken him to corn? Because he was gathered by the ear."

"Well, no—that's not the answer, though it's not half bad. I liken him to corn, don't you know, because he was shocked in the fall."

An Innocent Man Found Guilty.

On the statements of a man named Bratwiesz, Peter Papst, from Lassen, upper Austria, was in 1890 found guilty of arson and was sentenced to a term of twelve years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. A few months ago it was discovered that Papst was entirely innocent, and that Bratwiesz himself had been the incendiary. The latter, who was insane and an epileptic, had a mania of accusing other persons of crimes of which they were entirely innocent. Of course Papst was immediately released when his innocence came to light. He appealed to the Austrian parliament to grant him indemnity for his business losses, which he will receive from the government, as the committee to which the matter was referred reported in his favor. We had a case of this kind in Sacramento a couple of years ago—the case of Geo. Nelson—but the Legislature was too busy with important boodle jobs to render justice to the unfortunate man.

Comparisons.

"Mamma," said Phil, walking gravely out of the study evidently bearing a heavy mental load, "when you smile at me like that your expression is as sweet as—as saccharine."

"Thank you, dear!" replied his mother, with double appreciation, "do you think you could move this secretary for me to dust behind it?"

"I can't do it," replied he, after an unsuccessful attempt, "'tis as heavy as irridium."

"Then hand me the duster."

"Oh, yes. It's as light as lithium. Now, may I go and play ball with cousin Will till dinner time?"

"Not to-day. I may need you."

"Just a few minutes?"

"No."

"Mother," said Phil, "your heart is as hard as rhodium." And he went back to the library to hunt some more respect-inducing words.—Pharmaceutical Era.

The seventieth anniversary of the birth of Robert Schweichel, the German novelist and journalist and president of the German Union of Authors, was celebrated with appropriate ceremonies recently in Berlin. Few writers are more popular in Germany than "Schweichel, the optimist." The society of which he is the head made him a present of a considerable sum of money—sufficient to make him free from pecuniary care for the rest of his life.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,

Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

Assets.
 Etina Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn. $10,000,000 00
 Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 5,750,000 00
 German-American Insurance Co. 5,000,000 00
 Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York 11,729,400 00
 Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York 774,550 20

JUST AT HAND

The latest New York styles in Note Paper, Visiting and Correspondence Cards, Card Envelopes, Mourning Cards and Paper.
 Tinted Note Paper and Correspondence Cards are now the rage. All the latest tints in stock.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 18th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Judge of the Superior Court.
 Dated August 13th, 1891.
 JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and 7/8 Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for $1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
 By J. F. DODDY, Deputy Clerk.
 W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
 By J. F. DODDY, Deputy Clerk.
 ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jyl8-8t

THE
STATE FAIR OCCURS AT SACRAMENTO
 SEPT. 7TH TO 19TH 1891
 THE EVENT OF THE YEAR
 DON'T FAIL TO EXHIBIT.
 WRITE THE SECRETARY
 FOR INFORMATION.
FRED K. COX,
 PRESIDENT.
EDWIN F. SMITH,
 SECRETARY.

J. H. CAMPBELL,
 No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.
Cesspools and Vaults
 CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.
 SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.
 ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,
 NOTARY PUBLIC,
Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
 1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

A. L. HART, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON, ALBERT M. JOHNSON,
 HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
 JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,
 LAWYERS,
 504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR., ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, LAWYERS,
 Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
 Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, LAWYER,
 Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, LAWYER,
 920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
 Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney), ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
 N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Facts About the Nails.

A white mark on the nail bespeaks misfortune.

Pale or lead colored nails indicate melancholy people.

Broad nails indicate a gentle, timid and bashful nature.

Lovers of knowledge and liberal sentiment have round nails.

People with narrow nails are ambitious and quarrelsome.

Small nails indicate littleness of mind, obstinacy and conceit.

Choleric, martial men, delighting in war, have red and spotted nails.

Nails growing into the flesh at the points and sides indicate luxurious tastes.

People with very pale nails are subject to much infirmity of the flesh and persecution by neighbors and friends.

True Philosophy.

Mme. Neckar relates the following anecdote of M. Abanret, a philosopher of Geneva: "It was said of him that he never had been out of temper; some persons, by means of his female servant, were determined to put this to the proof. The woman in question stated that she had been his servant for 30 years, and she protested that during that time she had never seen him in a passion. They promised her a sum of money if she would endeavor to make him angry; she consented, and, knowing he was particularly fond of having his bed well made, she on the day appointed neglected to make it. M. Abanret observed it, and the next morning made the observation to her; she answered that she had forgotten it; she said nothing more, but on the same evening she again neglected to make the bed; the same observation was made on the morrow by the philosopher, and she again made some such excuse, in a cooler manner than before. On the third day he said to her: 'You have not yet made my bed; you have apparently come to some resolution on the subject, as you probably found it fatigued you. But after all, it is of no great consequence, as I begin to accustom myself to it as it is.' She threw herself at his feet and avowed all to him."

A Strange Birthmark.

A curious story comes from Salt Lake City which is attracting much comment from friends and acquaintances of Policeman Charles F. Wanless, shot and killed by Joseph A. Barnes, September 18, 1890, and may furnish medical men another subject for discussion. Barnes, it will be remembered, was having a quarrel with his wife, which the officer attempted to stop. Barnes fired and the bullet passed through Wanless' heart, leaving a jagged bullet hole in the left breast. A married sister of the dead officer was telegraphed and came for the funeral from her home in Salt Lake. She was much affected by the tragedy and took the loss of her brother to heart. In a short time she returned home. About three months ago, as the report is heard here by friends of the dead officer, his sister gave birth to a boy perfectly formed, but with a red birthmark over the heart of the exact shape and appearance of the wound made in Wanless' breast by the bullet from Barnes' pistol.—Denver News.

Not Satisfied.

"I hope you are perfectly content here," said the bishop to the boys he had taken from their miserable, filthy London homes and placed in a country charity school, one of the best in England. But the lads looked so gloomy that the bishop felt forced to ask: "Aren't you comfortable; have you any complaints to make?" Then the oldest boy said: "Oh, the milk, my lord." "Why, what on earth do you mean?" said the bishop. "The milk is far better here than in London." "No; indeed 'taint," cried the youngster. "In London we always buy our milk out of a nice clean shop, and here—why, here they squeezes it out of a beastly cow!"

Mrs. Andrew Lang tells this story: "A friend of mine was informed by a housemaid that she wished to leave and get married. 'Indeed,' said the lady, 'and what is your future husband?' 'Please, 'm, he's an asker.' 'I don't understand. What does he do?' 'Well, 'm, he—he goes about the streets, and if he sees anyone coming along that looks kind, he just stops 'em and asks 'em to give him a trifle; and he makes quite a comfortable living that way.' 'Do you mean a beggar?' 'Well, 'm, some people do call it that; we call it asker.'"

The barber is quite a traveled man; in fact, it seems to be his chief object in life to work long enough in one place to get money to get to the next. Inasmuch as he eats quite a good deal, wears smart toggery, plays the horses, gets married once in a while, and is in all a very swaggy young man, it sometimes requires a long stay in one place to get money to proceed to the next place in proper tonsorial style.

A Maine farmer who recently sent 10 cents to a man who advertised to send for that amount directions how to run a farm without being troubled with potato bugs got this reply by postal card: "Plant fruit trees instead of potatoes."

CURES CONSTIPATION.
LASH'S
KIDNEY AND LIVER BITTERS
CURES HEADACHE.
CURES MALARIA.
CURES DYSPEPSIA.

W. D. Comstock, 501--507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

Imperial
GALLERY,
 No. 415 J Street,
 Between Fourth and Fifth,
 SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

THE GREATEST OF AMERICAN WATERS
 A NATURAL MINERAL WATER
 OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT.
"SHASTA" WATER
 BOTTLED FOR EUROPEAN TRADE
 MOUNT SHASTA, ELEVATION 14,442 FT.
 MOUNT SHASTA MINERAL SPRING CO.
 GENERAL OFFICE 908 & 910 2ND STREET
 SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA U.S.A.
 TRADE MARK.
 BOTTLED AT THE SPRINGS
 W. J. HASSETT. D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,
Book and Job Printers,
 410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,
Photographic Art Parlors
 426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK
Restaurant and Oyster House
 1019 SECOND STREET,
 Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.
 First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.
 BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.
 1022 FOURTH STREET.
 Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.
 Importers and Wholesale Dealers in
Wines and Liquors.
 CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.
 116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,
 SACRAMENTO, CAL.
JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.
Artificial Stone Sidewalks
 Latest Designs and First-class Work.
 Estimates Furnished for Residences.
 Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company
 PACIFIC SYSTEM.
 August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
 SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.20 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
11.50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5.25 A
3.00 P	Ogden and East	10.30 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	4.00 P
10.35 A	Kedding via Willows	11.25 A
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.05 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	2.50 P
*10.50 A	San Francisco via Steamer	*2.40 P
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.10 P
3.05 P	Vallejo	8.10 P
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted, †Sunday only, ‡Monday excepted.
 A for morning, P for afternoon.
 RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
 T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank
 DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
 OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
 VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
 CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
 ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
 Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
 W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank
 SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
 People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5½) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
 and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
 GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
 in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,
 [CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE LEMERS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1891.

No. 30.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & CO. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.

W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

There was no boastful picture attending the opening address of President Frederick Cox at the Pavilion Thursday evening. No attempt at the ornate was made, but for wisdom and practical application the address of President Cox was most excellent. Coming from a practical and successful business man, it should have weight and influence with the masses to which it was directed and specially intended to apply. In our editorial columns to-day we have considered one of the topics dwelt upon by Mr. Cox, and concur with the advice and conclusions arrived at by the speaker. After giving a careful review of the work of the society, and a comparison between the products of to-day and at the time of the organization of the State Agricultural Society, Mr. Cox goes into the question of the possible and probable future of this State. The fruit interests are predicted to be the chief industry of the State. Mining and general farming may remain profitable, but the fruit production is to be the assured success of the population. A home can be maintained in a limited tract of land where fruit is the product. Large vineyards and orchards are not desirable, and experience teaches us reduces the profits and retards immigration, and prevents the settlement of the State. Small farms are the true solution of the labor question. Where the orchards are small there is always less inconvenience from scarcity of labor. The general advice of the president was for mothers and fathers to direct their sons and daughters towards the legitimate industries, rather than to seek a precarious existence in the large cities. On this branch of the address we quote from the speaker: "The fathers and mothers, sitting by the fireside, debate over the future callings of their sons. The question is of vital moment to them—nay, to the whole State. If the father is a farmer he sees with sorrow the son leave the farm for the city. The boy's eyes are witched by the glitter and sparkle of city life. He will not listen to the voice of wisdom. His future is easily foretold. He sinks into the clerkship, or learns the mere rudiments of a trade, from which he never rises. It is sad that it is so, but nevertheless it is so. There are no trades to be learned to-day. The power of steam has changed the conditions of success from what they were thirty years ago, and the power of the trades unions prevent the majority of our boys from learning trades. I look with deep concern upon the future of the coming generation of youth. There seems nothing offered but the dull, dreary labor of making brick without straw. I honor labor, but I honor that labor most which is directed by intelligence; and that labor is most intelligent which is engaged in an occupation in which the mind can take hope for the future. Horticulture offers the field. There is no industrial vocation which engages or demands so much intelligence. The successful fruit-grower has need of all learning. He needs to be a student of nature, something of a chemist, an entomologist, and a merchant. His daily work teaches him a love of beauty and order. His toil is lightened by the smiles of his wife and the company of his children. He is his own master. No corporation bell tolls his coming or going. He has the sweet hope, aye assurance, that for him the tree shall grow, the bud shall blossom, the blossom expand to fruit, and he shall have the fruition of his labor, while the divine promise stands that seed time and harvest shall never fail. What occupation offers to the young man a wider field for the display of his energy, or the exercise of his intelligence, with a greater certainty of success?"

There are few human passions not shared in by the dog. Reason seems to be an attribute to man's best friend, which is subject to anger, jealousy, envy, love, hatred and grief. There are also pride, gratitude, generosity and fear. No other animal shows a sympathy with man in his troubles. This poor brute discloses an association of ideas, as well as imagination, which fact appears from the dog in its dreams, where we often observe it as though doing its master's bidding in the pursuit of imaginary objects. Its judgment is remarkably correct. Indeed, we are constrained to believe that there is a canine religion, and that man is the god, and his will the rule of conduct, disobedience to which produces an evident feeling of shame and a submission to punishment akin to the self-inflicted punishment of the earlier enthusiasts in religious circles. These attributes have rendered the dog the fit companion of man. Lord Byron knew only one true friend, and that was his Newfoundland dog, upon whose tomb he placed a fervid inscription, in which these lines appear:

"* * * * * The poor dog! In life the firmest friend,
The first to welcome, foremost to defend,
Whose honest heart is still his master's own,
Who labors, fights, lives, breathes for him alone,
Unhonored falls, unnoticed all his worth,
Denied in heaven the soul he held on earth."

In the last North American Review "Ouida" has contributed a splendid article on "Dogs and Their Affections." This gifted writer has paid a just tribute to man's true friend: "It has often been mooted as a vexed question why all men of genius or greatness are so fond of dogs. The reason is not far to seek. Those who are great or eminent in any way find the world full of parasites, toadies, liars, fawners, hypocrites; the incorruptible candor, loyalty and honor of the dog are to such like water in a barren place to the thirsty traveler. The sympathy of your dog is unfailing and unobtrusive. If you are sad, so is he, and if you are merry none is so willing to leap and laugh with you as he. For your dog you are never poor; for your dog you are never old; whether you are in a palace or a cottage he does not care, and fall you as low as you may you are his providence and his idol still. The attachment of the dog to man outweighs and almost obliterates attachment in him to his own race. There is something shocking to our high opinion of him in the callousness with which he will sniff at the stiff body of a brother dog. He will follow his master to the grave, and sometimes die on it, but the loss of his own kind leaves him unmoved." We read in our classics that after the years of wandering by Ulysses, upon his return the only one that recognized him was his faithful dog. Baron Cuvier, speaking of the domestication of dogs, says: "The completest, the most singular and the most useful conquest ever made by man." The dog was in a domesticated state during prehistoric time, and the origin is therefore unknown. There are few people who cannot give experiences of the wonderful sagacity of dogs. Everyone who has ever been the master of one of these canine servants can attest to the wonderful knowledge displayed on occasions by the most ordinary dog.

One of the strange conditions of the country is the fact that there is a tendency to flock to the cities. The country boy and girl are not content to remain in the villages and hamlets, but think the world is in the great cities. The last census has developed the fact that there is a greatly increased percentage in the exodus from the country into the great commercial centers. It is difficult to estimate the serious results both to the city and country by this continued influx of bread-seekers and fortune-seekers into the cities. The country loses its means of proper support, and the cities gain an army of consumers that cannot be producers. Every winter finds thousands of unemployed men and women in the cities on the verge of starvation, with absolutely no means of gaining a subsistence. Certainly the cities would be much better off without this misguided, starving mass of humanity, which has gone to the cities from a prosperous, though quiet, country life. This fascination for city life by the boy and girl of the country is the cause of more ruin, suffering, and crime than from any other source. The problem of the day is found in this unfortunate condition of affairs. A writer in one of the great eastern dailies has given a lucid view on this subject: In a country which is still uncrowded in its rural districts, as is the United States as compared with older countries, it may be assumed without argument that the choice of urban life and occupation rather than farm life and occupation is deliberate choice and not from necessity. Reasons for the choice are glibly given that do not, upon investigation, prove sufficient. It is said that young men do not stay upon the farm because they see no future except that of farm laborer or tenant farmer. But the farms of the New England States have been family possessions for generations; yet now the sons of owners leave them.

It is said the farmer's life is hard, his work unceasing, his profits small or none. So is the life of the mechanic, so is all regular labor hard, and its rewards not greater than those from the tilling of the soil. In country work three things are assured, plenty of food, shelter, and sufficient clothing. These fundamental needs are always satisfied for men sound in mind and body and reasonably industrious who remain in the country the year round. Can they be assured of as much when they turn to the city for subsistence? Clerking was once the future to which the farmer's boy looked with longing eyes. To wear store-clothes and a stove-pipe hat, to learn city ways, one day to carry on a city business himself, was his ambitious dream. But small establishments of business are fewer every year, and the competition of women and girls for clerkships has overcrowded the first steps in the way of his realizing that ambition. Machines take the place of men in the great manufacturing industries, and the farm-born and farm-bred lad who comes to the city for work finds himself in competition with skilled artisans of both sexes, who keep him out of remunerative occupation. Still these chances are taken, and the cities are yearly glutted with the labor for want of which the farm runs down or fails to reach the limit of its possible and desirable productiveness.

What is the reason for this condition of things, and the remedy? Is it not true that the great attraction toward city life is its social features, its amusements, and its entertainments? Are not the best minds among those who reject rural life determined in their choice by these and by the yet higher attractions of libraries, art galleries, lectures, and all those things which cities abundantly furnish for the cultivation of the intellect? It is written: "The life is more than the food and the body than the raiment." Farm life is made, and has always been made, too material. The intellect starves, and the higher sensibilities are cruelly crushed and dwarfed. There are too many farm homes where the physical needs are alone provided for, while in the villages in which the farm roads center little is sold but codfish, and nothing circulates free except gossip. It is the unnecessary barrenness and monotony of this life upon the farm, and not the work itself, nor the remuneration for it, that drives away the ardent young of each generation who feel within themselves an aspiration for something more and higher, and are determined to satisfy it even while they cannot understand it. All that a city provides for amusement and instruction the farm and the farm village cannot secure. A great part of it, and that the more essential, is within the reach of those who dwell in the country. And rural life must be rounded out by these now common accessories to life in cities before it can hold its own. To be happier is the lodestone that draws the young to the cities. Make them happy on the farm, to keep them there.

No one who knows, or for more than thirty years has known, Len Harris will have the temerity to say he was ever other than a brave, fearless man. His life as a policeman in the fifties and sixties in this city threw him into the midst of that kind of society that requires bold, brave, quick men as peace officers; no milksops to parley with the offender, who was as deft with the six-shooter or bowie point as the boy with his top. They were the days that required men of grit, and not feather-bed guardians of the night. No, it can be truly said of this stricken man that he has been through the crucial test and has not been tried in vain; so that only the sincerest praise is due him as an exemplary officer. But while not detracting an iota from the encomiums pronounced on him, can it be said that he acted judiciously and with his accustomed caution on the occasion of the attack on the train at Ceres last week? He left his seat in the car when he learned there was an assault being made, and, not finding anyone to accompany him, sallied forth singly and with only a 38-calibre pistol with which to make an attack or to defend himself. He did not know how many of the enemy there were, how they were armed, and the darkness having fallen, he could not locate their position, so as to know how to fortify himself for the skirmish. In his enthusiasm to do a sworn duty, and to do it as he had always done it in life, without fear or a thought of consequences to himself, he allowed his superhuman disregard for danger to get the better of a mature judgment and to degenerate into a degree of rashness bordering on foolhardiness, which in his cooler moments he could but regret. Had he, under the peculiar circumstances of his ignorance of the real facts as to the numbers of the outlaws and their whereabouts, refused to budge from his seat of safety in the passenger coach, no one on earth would be found to honestly censure him for valuing his life—a life already long dedicated to the protection of life and property and so frequently jeopardized as to have signally distinguished him among the State police. We repeat, Len Harris need not have opened fire with a light weapon on a foe whose strength of numbers he did not know to prove him one of California's bravest, best officers.

Almost as THEMIS goes to press there comes the news from San Francisco of the cold, cruel murder of a brave police officer and a good man—Officer Al. Grant—by a drunken ex-actor, M. B. Curtis, or more widely known as "Sam'l of Posen," a creation in which he distinguished and enriched himself in a few years. The dastardly deed of this man is without defense or palliation, as the officer was in the quest and even gentle discharge of his duty, which was that of taking Curtis to the station, as he was too drunk to be on the street. Will this murderer of a policeman be allowed to escape because he is what the fellow's associates call "respectable," and because he may be able to employ able counsel, and perhaps purchase his liberty? Let us hope not; rather let the police force of that city, with the efficient board of commissioners to lead and direct the cause, unite in a determination to see that this assassin of their brother officer is, not sent to State Prison for life, whence to be pardoned at an early day, but hung by the neck till he is dead, as an example to the brutes who think a policeman the prey of their dirty vengeance on the smallest provocation.

Mme. Tussaud and Her Wax Works.

Mme. Tussaud was a veritable character, a gifted, energetic woman. She was born in Berne, Switzerland, in the year 1760. When a child she was sent to Paris and placed in the care of an uncle, who was an artist, and who taught her to draw and paint, and especially to model in wax, since in the last-named art she showed great talent. She was employed to teach the Princess Elizabeth, sister of Louis XVI., to draw and model and thus spent much of her time at the Tuilleries and at Versailles, where she had opportunity of meeting all the celebrities of the times. When the revolution broke out she was one of the few of the aristocracy who escaped the fury of the populace, and this fact she owed principally to her artistic skill, as the revolutionary leaders employed her to immortalize them by her talents. She made figures in wax of Robespierre, Marat, and others, and was on many occasions employed to take models of heads that had fallen by the guillotine. By these and other means Mme. Tussaud was enabled to form a large collection of models of the most celebrated persons in France. But she was herself at one time imprisoned, and was in danger of the guillotine, though subsequently she was liberated. In 1802 she went to London, and there put her collection on exhibition, and many distinguished persons, admiring her enterprise, permitted her to model them for her collection. She lived in London for forty years, and amassed quite a small fortune through her exhibition. She died April 15, 1850. She was a woman of sterling worth, and much respected by all who knew her. The wax works museum now in London, called after her, is conducted by her descendants. It is one of the sights of the great city.

An Itemized Bill.

An artist who had been employed to repair and retouch the properties of an old church in the suburbs of the city, on being refused payment in a lump for his work, was asked for details, and sent the following itemized bill to the church officials:

Correcting Ten Commandments.....	$5 12
Embellishing Pontius Pilate and putting new ribbons on his bonnet.....	3 50
New tail on rooster of St. Peter and mending his comb.....	2 20
Regilding left wing of Guardian Angel.....	4 18
Washing a servant of High Priest and putting carmine on his cheek.....	5 12
Renewing Heaven, adjusting two stars, and cleaning moon.....	7 14
Re animating flames Purgatory and restoring souls.....	3 90
Reviving Hell, putting new tail on Devil, and several jobs for the lost.....	7 17
Re-bordering robes of Herod and re-adjusting wig.....	4 00
Putting new spotted sashes on the son of Tobias and dressing his sack.....	2 00
Cleaning ears of Balaam's ass and shoeing same.....	2 40
Putting rings in ears of Sarah.....	3 20
Putting new stone in David's sling, enlarging head of Goliath and extending his leg.....	3 00
Decorating Noah's Ark.....	3 00
Mending shirt of Prodigal Son.....	4 00
Total.....	$59 63

Steam Engines.

All steam engines are divided into two great classes—condensing engines and non-condensing engines. The former are supplied with apparatus for condensing the steam that escapes, by contact with cold water pipes and transforming it into water again. The latter are not furnished with the condenser. They are also distinguished as high-pressure and low-pressure engines, the former term being applied to engines supplied with steam of 50 pounds pressure to the square inch and upward, and the latter to engines working under 40 pounds pressure. The low-pressure engines are almost invariably condensing, and the high-pressure engines very generally non-condensing, and the terms high pressure and low-pressure have come to imply the presence or absence of the condensing machinery, though in some instances this understood implication is incorrect. There are many varieties of both classes of engines. All locomotives and most of the engines used on land are non-condensing engines. All marine engines, with the exception of those of the smaller class of tug-boats and Western river steamers, are condensing engines.

The rate at which things are found out in this country may be inferred from the fact that the list of patents granted by the Government has reached the astonishing number of nearly 300,000. There have been no less than 6,686 patents obtained on the plow alone, about as many on the harvester, and over 8,000 on stoves and furnaces. But the most singular thing of all, perhaps, is that the inquisitive genius of the nation has discovered 969 separate and distinct ways of making a corset.

Church and State.

Tradition tells of a fiery Anglo-Indian colonel who, getting into a hot dispute with a portly clergyman, remarked, pointedly, "It is a pity that black ants should not be useful in proportion to their size." Whereon the parson at once retorted, "It is a greater pity that red ants, which are so insignificant, should yet be so offensive."

Another collision of this kind between church and State, in which the church again had the best of it, is said to have occurred at an English public dinner, where a would-be witty officer asked a well-known colonial bishop, who sat next to him, whether he could tell the difference between a bishop and a donkey, and then proceeded to explain that the one wears the cross on his head, and the other wears it on his back.

"Very good, Major B——," said the bishop. "But now can you tell the difference between an army officer and a donkey?"

"No, my lord, I cannot," replied the major.

"Nor can I," rejoined the bishop, quietly.

Even this, however, was surpassed by another passage of repartee between the gown and the sword which is still preserved among the society legends of Calcutta. A certain famous English general, the hero of two Eastern wars, found his health beginning to give way beneath the strain of long and arduous service, and was ordered home by his doctors. On the day of his embarkation for England he was accompanied by a vast crowd of friends, to whom he began to distribute various small tokens of his regard.

"Well, general," asked the Bishop of Calcutta, who was one of the party, "have you no memento to leave to an old friend like me?"

"Oh, I have not forgotten you, my lord," cried the general. "On the contrary, I have bequeathed to you my entire stock of impudence."

"Ten thousand thanks, my dear general," replied the undaunted bishop. "You have given me by far the largest and most valuable part of your property."

And then the bishop's wife turned to her husband, and said, sweetly, "My dear, am glad to see that you have come into your legacy so soon."—David Ker, in Harper's Magazine.

Ozone.

Whenever it is exposed to the action of electricity, oxygen undergoes a contraction of volume and acquires very different properties. This change has been shown to consist in an alteration in the atomic structure of the oxygen. Thus, while each molecule of oxygen contains two atoms, there are three atoms in each molecule of ozone. It follows from this that ozone is half as heavy again as oxygen, and it has accordingly been demonstrated that its specific gravity is 24, while that of oxygen is 16. Ozone has a very peculiar odor, whence its name (from the Greek word ozo, I smell), and this was for many years supposed by chemists to be the smell of electricity, as though the electric force were a substance. Even after the fallacy of this idea was clearly shown, it was many years before the true nature of the ozone was understood. Ozone is obtained by subjecting oxygen to the influence of the silent discharge of electricity. By this part of the oxygen is transformed, but not all of it, for pure ozone has never yet been obtained. Traces of ozone are usually present in the atmosphere, especially in the open country, and there is no doubt that it performs an important part in removing organic impurities from the atmosphere. A limited amount of it in the air is health-giving and stimulating, but an undue proportion of it produces great irritation of the lungs and bronchial tubes. Ozone by being heated is again converted into oxygen. Ozone has found uses in chemistry because of its great oxidizing powers, and is employed to form certain compounds as a bleaching agent and as a disinfectant. It is believed that skillfully and persistently used, it could check the spread of infectious diseases. But no attempt has yet been made to effectively test this power.

Uncle Sam's Land.

At the close of the revolutionary war, when our independence was acknowledged, the treaty of peace made with Great Britain ceded to America territory to the extent of 815,615 square miles. Since then other territory has been added as follows: Louisiana, purchased from France in 1803, 930,938 square miles; Florida, from Spain, in 1821, 59,268 square miles; Texas, annexed in 1845, 237,504 square miles; Oregon, by a treaty in 1846, 380,425 square miles; California, conquered from Mexico in 1847-48, 649,762 square miles; Arizona, acquired from Mexico in 1854, 27,500 square miles; Alaska, purchased from Russia in 1867, 577,390 square miles. This gives a total of 3,678,392 square miles of territory now embraced in the United States, being about four-ninths of all North America, and more than one-fifteenth of the entire land surface of the globe.

It is said that Cleopatra's tomb has been discovered. Now, if we can find where the asp is buried the cause of history will have been materially helped.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

An actor who marries a leading woman can blame no one but himself if he is led for the rest of his life.

A Hindoo princess, the Begum Ahmadee, has distinguished herself in London society as a singer of superior voice, talent and cultivation. She is a descendant of the emperors of Delhi, and possesses a mezzo soprano voice of extraordinary richness and power, which is used with very high artistic taste. She has also great personal beauty.

The eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kendall, says a London correspondent, will, after all, follow in her mother's footsteps, just as the sons of Mr. Irving and Mr. Hare are following in those of their fathers. These three young people will all appear in the revival of Robertson's School, which Mr. Hare, Sr., will produce at the Garrick theater this autumn.

In conferring the degree of doctor of music on Dvorak at Cambridge, Dr. Sandys said: "Witness his songs for two voices, which seems to breathe the very spirit of the Moravian muses; witness his Slavonic dances, rivalling the Hungarian dances of his famous patron and helper; witness his symphonies, now saddened with plaintive elegiac measures, anon all aglow with the tremulous raptures of the strings; witness, last of all, his weird legend, sprung, as it were, from the realm of ghosts, of the bride carried off by night."

The stage is an agency that ought not to be employed alone for the entertainment of mankind. It can be made an engine of power in science, in religion, in patriotism—in every branch of education—that will be felt through the whole stratum of society. In every country and every clime the stage numbers its devotees by tens of thousands. It has been so for ages; it promises to be so for ages to come. Would it not be well for the serious-minded educators of the land, those who aim to use every legitimate influence to form character and elevate the moral tone, to inquire if there is not some way of utilizing this seemingly natural taste for dramatic representations as an engine for good?

One would be interested to know something of the man to whose lot it fell to plant the first seeds of knowledge in the mind of Shakespeare. By consulting the records of Stratford we find that there were three who may have shared this distinction. Curiously enough, one of them, if the name of Jenkins is to be taken as a proof, was a Welchman. It is possible that he may have stood for the character of Sir Hugh Evans. We know how easily school boys are impressed by their master's peculiarities; whether they be those of accent or of manner. It is noteworthy, too, that Jenkins was very unpopular, as in the year 1579 a sum of money was paid him by the authorities on condition that he resign his post as head master. Prof. Baynes has shown that Ben Johnson's famous saying, that Shakespeare had little Latin and less Greek, is hardly a fair statement of the real facts of the case. A critical examination of the poet's works will prove that he had an acquaintance with classical literature, such as would be possessed by a man who had been trained at a school like the old Stratford grammar school. We must not expect from him nice scholarship or a strict attention to details. Knowledge is simply relative, and Ben Johnson's standard was undoubtedly a high one. He would naturally look with contempt upon the classical attainments of one who had received such an education as Shakespeare had, but we are justified in coming to the conclusion that the poet could read Latin fluently and fairly, and that any author he cared for he would be able to read for his pleasure and information. That the instruction in Latin was thorough is proved by a letter preserved by Malone written in that language in 1598 by the son of R. Quiney to his father, then staying in London. It is a very creditable performance for a boy of eleven. This Richard Quiney, one of the aldermen of Stratford in Shakespeare's day, who had certainly been brought up at the school—for his family had been long established in the town—was so well acquainted with Latin that his brother-in-law, Abraham Starley, in writing to him frequently made use of long Latin sentences and paragraphs.

Book Chat.

Robert Louis Stevenson's home has the only fireplace in Samoa.

Mark Twain is an inveterate smoker, and it is said that he consumes 300 cigars a month, besides drawing much consolation from his pipe.

A book buyer has stumbled upon a manuscript containing three poems by Burns, two of which have never been published. One of them, "Grizelle Grim, the Witch of Cluden," is said to be clever, but too coarse for publication.

General Lew Wallace is writing another story, but it is hardly likely to see the light for some time, because he works so slowly and carefully that "rushing copy" is out of the question. It is needless to say General Wallace's slow work is good work.

The history of the world in Arabic is being written by Mahmoud Fehmy Pasha, a companion of Arabi in exile in Ceylon. He hopes to finish it this year. It will be in five large volumes.

A current rumor announces the forthcoming publication of a new book by Queen Victoria. No international copyright law will be needed to protect this work from piracy, if it is of the same general character as the volumes which preceded it from the royal inkstand.

An innovation in the printing world has been introduced into the office of a London paper of which Coppleston, formerly of New York, is manager. The journal is printed with scented ink, which gives forth a delightful fragrance. Any desired odor may be produced.

We Americans are not as materialistic as the world asserts and as we sometimes believe ourselves. The shower of congratulations which descended on the "Poet of the Breakfast Table" as he entered on his 83d year last Saturday demonstrates our recognition of our great men who have neither wealth nor great social or political influence.

Lanoe Falconer, the author of "Mademoiselle Ixe," chose her name with a due regard for the fitness of things. Her true name is Hawker, and her grandfather of that name was a famous sportsman. Miss Hawker herself was born in a shooting lodge near Aberdeen, rented by her father. She began to write when only ten years old.

It has always been strange that a man will not read an article, a paper, or a book that does not accord with his sentiment. What skillful general watches the evolutions of his own army and utterly refuses to observe where the enemy is, or what he is doing? Is it not equally a fault of any man who wishes to defend himself against the attacks of any kind of foe not to post himself in the strength and position of his enemy?

That accomplished English writer James Payn is against church bells. "It is shocking," says he, "to think what hideous sounds can be let loose on the universal air by simply pulling bell-ropes." That there are many who find a solemn peal of happiness in the chiming of morning bells, even rung by random hands, there can be no doubt. And the music of the "Evening Bells" no less a hand than Moore's has made immortal.

The author of "Vice Versa," F. Anstey, published some years ago a short story called the "Black Poodle," which was translated into French and published with proper acknowledgment in the Revue de Deux Mondes. A few weeks ago the author in a Parisian book-shop found a volume styled "Le Caniche Noir," dedicated "by the author" to a lady of rank. It was the "Black Poodle." The scene was changed to France; the poodle's master was now an Italian, not a Frenchman. Mr. Anstey then wrote a letter, in French, to the French author, signing, not his own name, asking permission to render "Le Caniche Noir" into English. The author answered in English that he did not think his book deserved the praises liberally heaped on it by Mr. Anstey. "About your demand of adaptation, I am sorry to tell you that I am my own translator, and that the 'Caniche Noir' exists in English already."

Professional Chat.

Hay-fever victim—Doctor, can't you tell me how I can find relief from this constant inclination to sneeze? Physician—Yes, sir. Sneeze.

The judge called for the crier
To open the court, when said
A witty official: "May it please your honor
(And he humbly bowed his head),
"Permit me just a word to say;
The crier cannot cry to-day,
Because his wife is dead."

The late Mr. Justice Maule, of the English Court of Queen's Bench, was noted for his sprightly humor while administering the duties of his high office. On one occasion, in charging the jury, he remarked in his quiet way: "One of these defendants is, it seems, a minister of religion—of what religion it does not appear; but, to judge by his conduct, it cannot be any form of Christianity."

Squire M——, an elderly man, but a young justice, called at a friend's office one morning, and with much gravity announced: "Judge, I dropped in to get a p'int of law. I want to know the law consarnin' a-puttin' of a badly sp'iled tarrupen in a neighbor's churn. I've got 'Hinnen's Jestices,' an' the Code, an' I've s'arched both from kiver to kiver, an' I don't fin' nuthin' under neither head."

The American Bar Association has done a public service in pointing out a great evil and its remedy. It recommends that a two years' course of study in the newer States, and one of three years in the older, where the laws are necessarily more complex, should be made a legal prerequisite to admission to the bar. The governors of the several States could not do better than indorse this suggestion in their next messages. A half-made lawyer is a great curse to any community.

At the last term of the Butler county, Kansas, District Court a young law student made application to Judge Leland to be admitted to practice. The judge appointed a committee of three to examine him, which is usual in such cases. The student passed the examination and was duly declared a full-fledged lawyer, to the surprise of some of the older members of the bar. "How was it?" asked one of these. "Well," replied one of the examining committee, "we asked him about two hundred questions, and he answered every one of them truthfully." "How was that?" queried the older member. "He simply answered by saying 'he didn't know,' and he told the truth every time. As truthful lawyers are very scarce in this district, we concluded it would be a good thing to admit him, even if he didn't know any law."—Harper's Drawer.

A capital story is told of one of the oldest practitioners. He was arguing a motion at a neighboring county seat, and, as it sometimes happens, was depending more upon his own sound logic than upon authorities for success. At a critical juncture the judge interrupted the speaker with this inquiry: "Yes, I understand; but where are your authorities on the subject?" "If your honor please," retorted our friend briskly, "I will explain the absence of authorities, with your permission, by telling a little story: A young man, freshly admitted to practice, had produced in court, in support of a motion, a wealth of authorities. After allowing the young man to read page upon page of dry decisions, the judge at length interrupted wearily: 'You are just beginning to practice,' said he; 'let me give you some advice. It does very well to cite authorities once in a while, but you must always trust somewhat to the common-sense of the court.'" It was a bold, almost audacious, position to take, but it won our old friend the case.

The following Bacchanalian poem is attributed to Chief Justice Fuller:

I.

Oh, bright is the gleam of the silv'ry stream,
As it leaps from its native mountain;
And sweet to the taste, in the desert waste,
Is the draught from the pure, cool fountain;
But sweeter than this, with its transient bliss,
To me, in the desert roaming,
And brighter still, than the sparkling rill,
Is the wine in our goblets foaming.

CHORUS.

Then fill each glass, as the moments pass.
Let the red wine mantle high!
As pledge we here to mem'ry dear,
The pleasant years gone by.

II.

Oh, hard is the strife of the battle of life,
To the soldier youth contending!
Full soon may fail e'en the plated mail
He fancied himself defending.
Yet we'll on to the fight with hearts so light,
At the stirring trumpet's tone,
And never will yield the battle field
'Till victory is our own.

CHORUS.

Then drink to-night, with hearts so light,
To the untrod world before us,
And gayly laugh, as the wine we quaff,
And join in the merry chorus.

The First Railroad.

The first timid experiment in railroads was a tramway in Quincy, Mass., built in 1826, chiefly by Thos. H. Perkins and Gridley Bryant, of Boston. Its only purpose was for the easier conveyance, by horses, of building stone from the granite quarries of Quincy to tidewater. It was the germ, however, of a mighty movement in the country. The first railway in America for passenger and traffic—the Baltimore and Ohio—was chartered by the Maryland legislature in March, 1827. The capital stock at first was only half a million dollars, and a portion of it was subscribed by the State and the city of Baltimore. Horses were its motive power, even after sixty-five miles of the road were built. But in 1829 Peter Cooper, of New York, built a locomotive in Baltimore, which weighed one ton and made eighteen miles an hour on a trial trip to Elliott's Mills. In 1830 there were twenty-three miles of railway in the United States, which were increased the next year to ninety-five, and in 1835 to 1,098, and in 1840 to nearly 3,000.—Bryant's History of the United States.

There met in a lonely Kentucky road a lovely schoolma'am and a bear. The schoolma'am ran and the bear followed, and, though there was neither stakes nor gate money, both made their best possible time. Then the fair pedagogue had a clever idea. She tore off her hat and threw it down and the bear stopped to investigate. Then she threw away her gloves, her cloak and her jacket, bruin pausing each time to destroy them. When she finally came to a place of safety it was with more gratification than clothes.

NOTES.

The Queen of Italy has a $7,000 dress.

Mme. de Lesseps is forty years younger than her husband.

Some men sleep well because they have good consciences and others sleep just as well because they haven't any conscience at all.

The thrones of Spain, Servia and the Netherlands are occupied by children. In the kindergarten of Europe thrones are but playthings.

The country is richer to-day than it was in 1860. Then there were $13 85 for each inhabitant; now there is $24 10. Republican rule and protection are the cause of the change for the better.

The recipe for Roman punch was long kept secret by the chefs of the vatican, but was given to the rest of the world when Napoleon invaded Italy in 1796.

An Anager farmer has been arrested and fined for assault upon the Danish army. While entering the town with a load of cabbage the war horse of the artillery took fright at his outfit and broke up the whole army.

Sady Tennyson preserves with religious care every pipe her husband smokes, and every oaken stick he carries. In the years to come the people who possess authentic relics of the poet will outnumber the body-servants of Washington.

The freak of the French nobleman, Baron de Sede, in adopting a sailor's life and working before the mast in a voyage to America as the result of a wager has the undoubted merit of novelty. Let him capture some American heiress and he can return in a state-room.

Camping is great fun and to be a success it is imperative that each member of the party makes up his or her mind to put up with all the inconveniences of camp life. Imagine any one going camping without first determining to take cheerfully and make the best of the ups and downs of the life.

News comes from Solomonville, Arizona, that Moses Cluff has been bound over to the grand jury for enjoying the luxury of three wives. What more appropriate place in which a Moses should sport a multitude of helps than Solomonville, named for that same old gentleman who thought five hundred none too many to hug him.

The good folk of San Francisco will now have less champagne and Bernhardt money to sport since they are cited to pay their honest debts to the State that has enriched them. How it does make a fellow squeal when he has to dig up money to settle the score, if it be not the score run for good dinners and midnight dissipation.

There must be some reason why women have so few pockets, and will persist in carrying their money in a dainty little hand pocket, so tempting to sneak thieves. We suppose it is like the wearing of earrings, some habit of our primitive ancestors, when our fore-mothers bore the burden of the household effects in cares and money, while her liege lord did the fighting.

There is a sect down in Texas which believes a man can become so holy that he can commit no sin. We are getting very good in this city—indeed, there are a class here who are so fearful of some immorality that they want to build a wall around the city for fear that something evil might come in. Of course; these "reformers" are incapable of committing any sin themselves.

It is the unanimous testimony of travelers that Port Said is the wickedest small city in the world. "The sink of creation," is the phrase commonly applied to the place by those that know its vices. At Port Said all vessels passing through the Suez Canal are detained from three to six hours, and during that short time sailors and travelers become the victims of vicious men and women who are attracted to Port Said by the opportunities offered by its peculiar character. The outcasts of every great European city find in Port Said a congenial resting place.

The first week of the State exposition has been a marked success. The slight shower and cloudy overcast has cooled and cleared the atmosphere. At the Pavilion can be seen the finest panorama of the products and industries of our State. The art exhibition has never heretofore been equalled. At the Park a new generation of fast horses has developed, the speed of which has completely surprised the old turfmen. Two and three-year-old colts have displayed the most wonderful speed, greater than that formerly accorded to mature racers. The stock show is fully up to the best heretofore made. Next week the exhibition in all departments will be greatly augmented.

"The real cause of the general prosperity of the French farmer," says Colonel Thomas Connolly, an old union veteran, who has lived in France for more than eighteen years, "is their thrift and economic habits. A French farmer wastes nothing, his wife is a good cook and knows how to make the best use of every crust, and while the food is always palatable, a French farmer's family subsists on what is wasted and thrown away on an American farm."

A Chicago clergyman has observed that the rate of speed of carriages at funerals is becoming faster, and where fifteen years ago a walk and only a walk was regarded as the proper pace, now trotting is common, and a rate of six or seven miles an hour has succeeded one of three miles. Perhaps in this fast generation we think it best to rush on funerals, and get rid of the inanimate as quickly as possible. It is always the case that bands play a lively quickstep returning from a funeral.

Somewhere there is a story of a mishap which befell a robber whereby he and a peasant, whom he had robbed, fell into a pit. The robber persuaded the peasant to hold a short ladder, which was found in the pit, upon his shoulders while the robber climbed out with the peasant's treasure, promising, of course, to throw him a rope and to lift him up into the light and restore his treasure in return for the courtesy. It is further recorded that when the robber was safely landed, he reviled the foolish peasant and left him to his fate. This is about the position of Sacramento regarding the bondholders against this city. They promise to assist the water-works by allowing the interest to run for eight months, but at the same time are tightening their hold upon the city treasury.

EDITORS THEMIS—Your suggestions in your last issue as to the removal of the race track and stock grounds outside of the city limits are very timely, and should be kept alive until the citizens arrive at the conclusion that you are correct and should be acted upon as early as possible.

If I remember correctly, at the time of the purchase of the property now used for the above purposes the title was made so it can not be alienated. Now, if so or otherwise, why not keep it for a public park? The avenues which would run through it would be as fully available for reaching the property beyond as streets, and add not only to the value of the surrounding property, but enhance the value of the whole city, and surely add to its attractiveness.

We surely have land enough in the city and its immediate environs for residences for a large increase in inhabitants, and could well spare the park for public use.

The Agricultural Society seems to be in a highly prosperous condition, and prospects of further prosperity and increased patronage. The fair brings more and more people and exhibits every year, and it seems now that the room is scarcely enough to accommodate all the stock that is offered, and it would also seem that the directory could be abundantly able to purchase a new site and move the present improvements to it, if practicable, and increase their size. A desirable location no doubt could be obtained in any of those you mention, which, with the electric roads now in use and that would be built to connect with the new location, could be easily reached, and much more so than when the present grounds were first opened.

You did not mention East Park. It occurs to me that is a more favorable location than any other, and land in its adjoining vicinity could no doubt be purchased to give the necessary room needed at as low a figure, if not lower, than the others. The writer has no interest in any of them.

THIRTY-ONE YEARS' RESIDENT.

September 5, 1891.

The Way to Get Rich.

"It is to trust nobody, is to befriend none, to get everything and save all you get; to stint ourselves and everybody belonging to us, to be the friend of no man and to have no man for our friend; to heap interest upon interest, cent upon cent; to be mean, miserable and despised for some thirty years, and riches will come as sure as disease and disappointment. And when pretty near enough wealth is collected by a disregard of human heart, at the expense of every enjoyment save that of wallowing in filthy meanness, death comes to finish the work—the body is buried in a hole, and heirs dance over it, and the spirit goes—where?"

Mrs. William Astor has a wonderful snake ring which literally writhes in constant motion on her finger. It is constructed of flexible gold wire, each scale being represented by a loop of wire in which a ruby, an emerald, or an amethyst is firmly set. The lightest movement of the fingers sets the wires quivering, and the ring scintillates and seems to go round the finger with a serpentine movement that has something eerie in it. It was made in Egypt.

NEW YORK LETTER.

The Autumn Season and Church Privileges—Chatauqua and Dress Reform—The Mercantile Situation—Compulsory Suffrage—Patti and Her "Farewells."

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 5, 1891.

With the first of September, according to the popular impression, we begin to have cool weather and indoor amusements. But with the usual topsy-turvy perverseness of the nineteenth century civilization and the American weather, neither of these things appear on the assigned date. About the only thing that the first autumn month does bring us is a renewal of church privileges. All through the summer the religiously inclined New Yorker is obliged to draw on his inner consciousness for such inspiration as he may need to aid him in the performance of his religious duties. The churches are closed—that is, seven out of ten of them are, and the shepherds are recuperating their wasted energies in Europe, or at some pleasant resort. The complaint is old that it is almost an impossibility to find ministers to perform the necessary services at city funerals during the summer; but the hint was never taken, and each recurring summer sees more and more churches deserted by their pastors, until the affair has become a nine-days scandal, even in such a complaisant city as the metropolis. That preachers need a vacation no one denies; but it is also evident that the ordinary two or three weeks vacation of the physician, the lawyer, the editor, and the merchant, are enough to recuperate the wasted faculties and freshen a man up for another season's work. The majority of the city churches, however, are closed from the first of July till the first of September without consideration of the needs of the public. New York is indeed seldom charged with being overgood or particular, but the absolute and almost complete cession of work among protestant churches is universally commented upon with cynical humor by many and with sad confession by those interested. Meanwhile the evil grows and the churches refuse to take well meant hints.

While the women at Chatauqua are exerting themselves to organize a reform in dress, it might not be a bad idea for a vigilance committee to go the rounds of this city with Winchester and clubs dedicated to the people who are adding to the depressing effects of the season by their startling combinations in the matter of summer costumes. The crime is nearly universal, but I fear the actors of upper Broadway are the worst sinners. For instance, to see a large and wabbly man parading along Broadway in a frock suit, with a little yachting cap perched on top of a palpably bald head, is enough to make the beholder take refuge in the wilds of Jersey. Then there is the combination of a white suit and a shining beaver hat. Only the other day I noticed a number of men in light shoes, black Derby hats, silk shirts, belted at the waist, and long-tailed coats—a sight for gods and men. But the yachting cap fever is the worst, and the stouter the man, the more susceptible he seems to their fascination, just as very fat women seem to affect the small chip sailor hats. I saw just such a pair the other day, whose combined weight must have exceeded four hundred pounds. The woman wore a chip hat that looked appropriate for a ten-year old girl; the man a yachting cap with polka-dot band. And on the faces of the pair, enlarged about four times by their diminutive hats, there was a smile of childlike triumph, which would have been grotesque if it had not been pathetic.

They tell me down town that with the beginning of the fall the trade that has been dormant all summer will become brisk again. Just at present the mercantile situation is well illustrated by the answer of the Italian fruit peddler on Fulton street, whose reply to the question "How's business?" informed the questioner that "Alla money I maka on peanut I lose on dam banana!"

There is one idea in which I used to think I had a sort of proprietary interest which is now being worked up in some of the papers. I allude to a compulsory suffrage; that is, the making it obligatory on the part of citizens, under a penalty, to register before election and vote on election day. So many of our "best citizens," as they are fond of calling themselves, are only fair-weather voters that it really seems necessary to hit upon some means of compelling them to perform their duty. I am not, on the whole, in favor of exercising undue control over the individual. In fact, I think that in many ways we have not sufficient personal liberty in this country—we are certainly more under personal supervision than the people of London. But aside from this I believe that a compulsory ballot is necessary for the purification of metropolitan politics. The exercise of the suffrage should be regarded as a duty rather than as a privilege, and the Legislature should have the same right to enforce the ballot as it has to enforce jury service. We constantly hear that Tammany Hall has captured all the city offices because the "best citizens" would not vote. Let us apply the proverb about the bird that can sing and will not sing—it should be made to sing.

Locally we have any quantity of excellent musical material, but for years it has been wasting itself in a multiplicity of organizations and consequent differences. Meanwhile the small city of Worcester, Mass., has been showing for years what a thoroughly organized society can do and what we ought to have. This association now announces its thirty-fourth annual festival for the 22d of this month, to last for four days. Not only have they an excellent chorus 500 strong, but they get all the soloists, from Nordica to Del Puente. The question is, Where does New York come in?

The ruling passion is strong in life as well as in death, and it has had innumerable illustrations. About the latest and most curious is the inclination that moves Patti to build an opera house in miniature in her castle home in Wales. When she finally retires (she is to make the effort at our expense next season) it would naturally be supposed that she would be glad to renounce business and all its troublesome associations and take a real rest—one without any suggestions of hard work. But this is not the idea of the Patti. She has provided herself with a real stage under her own roof, where she may reappear in innumerable "farewells" to her own satisfaction, singing Semiramide, Traviata and the others. According to a London dispatch, the theater is 42x27x22 feet and will seat nearly 200 persons. The stage is 24 feet deep and 40 feet wide. But the crowning triumph is the act drop, which is ornamented with a portrait of Madame Patti in the character of "Semiramide," driving a chariot and a pair of horses.

Tara's Hall.

The site of Tara's Hall is in the county Meath, Ireland, and some of the ruins of the old building are still to be seen. Till the seventh century the high King of Erin resided in the palace of Tara. Under the supremacy of Brian Boru in the island, one of his subordinate chiefs, or provincial kings, held the title of King of Tara. These subordinate kingdoms resembled in power the Bretwaldas of the Saxon rule in England. The Tara estate in the thirteenth century belonged to a family of Norman descent—the Repenthynes. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the then Lord of Cabra and Tara, Richard de Repenthyne, was arraigned on the charge of uttering treasonable expressions against the Queen, and though an old man of 70 years, he was condemned and executed. However, about twenty years later, his descendant, Edward de Repenthyne, was restored to the estates by James I. In the civil wars several members of the family were killed, and when Cromwell extended his iron rule over Ireland, the estates of Francis de Penthyne, then the chief of the house, were again alienated. The lands of Cabra and Tara were surveyed in 1657, with the rest of the forfeited possessions in Ireland, and after the restoration of Charles II, were by letters patent, under the act of settlement, bearing date 5th February, 1659, granted to James, Duke of York, the king's brother, afterward James II. From him they passed to Lord Tyrconnel, who also forfeited them. In 1702 they were purchased by a company that had been formed for making sword blades in England, who soon after disposed of their interest to Thomas Meredith, of Dublin, and thus disappeared the ancient estates of the Lords of Tara. But in the latter part of the century part of the estate was regained by the family of Penthyne O'Kelly, who were legitimate descendants of the ancient family. Near the ruins of Tara's Hall a battle was fought May 26, 1798, in which the English forces worsted the Irish. On the same spot Daniel O'Connell held a mass meeting in favor of the repeal of the act of union between Great Britain and Ireland, August 15, 1843, and it is said 250,000 people were present. The ancient character of this ruined hall and its connection with the early glories of Ireland give it a romantic interest, which is touchingly expressed in Moore's poem:

The harp that once thronged Tara's halls,
The soul of music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls
As if that soul were fled.
So sleeps the pride of former days,
So glory's thrill is o'er,
And hearts that once beat high for praise,
Now feel that pulse no more!

No more to chiefs and ladies bright,
The harp of Tara swells;
The chord alone, that breaks at night,
Its tale of ruin tells.
Thus Freedom now so seldom wakes;
The only throb she gives
Is when some heart indignant breaks,
To show that still she lives!

FLASHES.

Honesty is the best religion and whips the devil every time.

Many people these days do not have to go so far as Treves to see a holey coat.

How many of our seaside girls have returned with rings on their fingers—some with a wring in their heart.

It was once believed that hares changed their sex every year. There are females in this city who unsex themselves daily.

The summer girl has fled,
The ice-cream victim's broke,
And in their stead we see appear
The coal and oyster joke.

A poulterer found a cent in an egg laid by one of his hens. We have often found a scent in eggs which would preclude the necessity of advertising the same.

Some people want a land of milk and honey,
Where men get rich who raise no wheat nor wool,
A government to provide the people with money,
And every man to get his pockets full.

Resolution is a fine attribute, but the "resolutions" of our prominent citizens do not come under this head. They can inaugurate more enterprises and build more big hotels, monuments and governor's mansions on paper than any people in the world.

Stars for September.

The Great Bear is now passing toward the north, and getting low down. The pointers are to the right of the seven stars, and the pole-star lies above them, and toward the right. The guardians of the Pole are to the left of, and scarcely higher than the Pole-star. The Dragon passes between the two Bears toward the west, his head being still high above the horizon. Coma Berenices is sitting between northwest and west-northwest. Bootes has passed the west, and forms a fine figure above that part of the horizon. The Northern Crown, with the brilliant Alphecca, is due west, about midway between the horizon and the point overhead.

Above the Crown are the feet of Hercules. His head and shoulders are to the left of the Crown, and at about the same height above the horizon. The Serpent lies between the shoulders of Hercules and the horizon. On the left of "Ophiuchus" (large), toward the southwest, and extending from the horizon half-way, to the point overhead. The brilliant Vega lies toward the same quarter, but much higher up.

Aquila is due south, Altair being about midway between the horizon and the point overhead. Close to the horizon, and extending from south-southwest to south, is Sagittarius. Next to him, on the left, is Capricornus, and next to that again is Aquarius, now covering a wide range of sky between Capricornus and Pegasus. In the zenith is Cygnus, the upright and crossrod of the cross being now about equally inclined to the horizon.

The square of Pegasus has passed the east, the left-hand being still Alpherat, and Andromeda still in a horizontal position. Cassiopeia is in the northeast, and raised somewhat more than half-way from the horizon toward the point overhead.

Below Andromeda, Aries has fully risen; and toward the northeast, low down, we see the Pleiades again. Between them and Cassiopeia lies Perseus. It is well to notice this constellation while in its present position, and also the richness of the background of milky light in this neighborhood. The whole of this part of the heavens is full of beauty, and contrasts strangely with the barren region close by, between the north point of the horizon and Cassiopeia. Auriga is rising above the north-northeast horizon, and Capella is beginning to scintillate less brilliantly as it rises above the denser strata of the atmosphere.

A Mercer county, Pa., sheep farmer was amazed to see a black spot traveling up and down the back of one of his sheep, and upon investigation found that three nests of mice were snugly ensconced in the sheep's wool. The same state of affairs existed in the wool of three other sheep in the herd. The animals did not seem to mind the presence of the mice at all.

M. Rouvier, the French minister of finance, was traveling salesman for a Paris bookseller when he was a young man. Having acquired considerable wealth, he went into politics in 1869, and gained the friendship of Gambetta. After the fall of the empire he was elected to the chamber of deputies, and since then he has pushed steadily to the front.

After all, men are strange creatures. They will waste an hour hunting a collar button, instead of having an extra supply and letting the wife find the missing one. You never see a woman look for the pin she drops. Her husband finds it when he walks around on his bare feet.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Next week those favorites, Jos. R. Grismer and Phoebe Davis, with strong support, will occupy the boards of the Metropolitan. The repertoire will be Beacon Lights, Fern Cliff and The Burglar. Crowded houses are assured.

The Clunie Opera House will have Evans and Hoey, in the Parlor Match, for a short season, commencing September 16th. Since the last production C. H. Hoyt, the author, has rewritten the farce-comedy so as to admit of new business.

Something that you must not forget: If you have your mind made up to buy a Mathusek upright piano do not be induced to change your mind by false representations of parties offering new, cheap, showy and trashy pianos, which will be worthless in this climate in a very short time. Mathuseks sold twenty years ago are as good as ever, and, tuned properly ever few years, sound as well as the day they left the factory. See the new improved ones at Cooper's.

Writing in the Presence of Death.

"My hardest hour," said a small woman whose newspaper work is known far and wide, "I'll tell it to you."

"My husband was dying. He was 28 years old and I was 19, and we were strangers in a strange land. Because we were so poor I had been doing some odd sketches here and there for the newspapers, for gentle people don't beg—they work. I was sitting beside the bedside of my husband, expecting every hour that the breath would go from his body, when a messenger came from an office down town with the request that I would write them a funny article of about one thousand words! I looked at my husband, and then God help me, I looked at my purse, and I concluded I had to write that article. So, while the boy waited, I held my dying love's hand with my left one and wrote with my right. And wrote a funny article. I was about an hour and a half doing it, and when I think of it now I see those two dark brown eyes looking at me in an inquiring way, I see that messenger boy waiting with an expression that was half curiosity, half sympathy on his face, and I see myself with tears rolling down my face, working out the funny article.

"Weeks after that, when I was all draped in mourning, and the man I loved slept that quiet sleep which knows no present awakening, I met the editor of that paper, and he said to me: 'That article of yours was funny enough to kill,' and I said, 'Was it? Well it nearly did.' But to this day he doesn't know under what circumstances it was written' and the $25 I got for it went to help get a resting place for the one I loved."—(Bab.)

The Common Fly.

How many people are there whom the harmless but annoying little house-fly does not only worry, but sometimes drive to distraction, and yet how few there are whose entomological knowledge is of sufficient breadth to allow of their tracing it from its first existence to a full grown fly.

Does not the question often arise as to its mysterious and sudden appearance? Summer after summer they present themselves for personal annoyance, in great abundance, and strangely enough appear always in fully-developed proportions; yet, with the same yearly regularity, they as mysteriously disappear, leaving no trace of their existence behind.

Let us follow one of these little dipterous insects through its metamorphosis.

During the month of August the fly lays its eggs in clusters or bunches in decaying animal or vegetable matter of almost any kind, such as manure or other filth. The eggs remain unhatched usually for a period of six months, after which their hatching will depend upon the degree of heat to which they are subjected.

A day or two of moderate heat will bring the eggs to life in larva form—a maggot without head, tail or legs.

These crawl or some dry place to pupate. In less than two weeks, with neither food nor sustenance, the puparium will grow from its tiny shape to the size of a small pea, when the perfect fly emerges.

Their lives are of short duration, for they only thrive through warm seasons of the year, when they are more plentiful, and as the colder weather returns they die.

Fragile in their composition, which contains nearly 80 per cent. of moisture, they greatly diminish in size when dead and dry, and their matter in consequence most brittle, easily crumbles, turns to dust, and blows away.—Philadelphia Record.

The largest circulation attained by any newspaper published in America at the present time is now enjoyed by the Chicago News, which claims a list of 226,064. Next is the New York World, which boasts a list of 181,930. The Boston Globe comes third with 138,880, followed by the Philadelphia Record with a circulation of 122,780. The Boston Globe has the honor of the largest list in proportion to population.

Items of Interest.

"The 'dark ages' lasted from the 6th to the 14th century.

The earliest monasteries were established in Egypt in the year 306.

The census of London, just completed, shows a population of 4,211,000.

The song "Old Grimes" was written by Albert G. Greene, of Rhode Island.

In the Black Range, Australia, has been found a gum tree 500 feet in height.

The law for establishing public schools was first passed in 1645 by the colonists of Massachusetts.

The word abbott is derived from the Hebrew ab. father, and signifies the superior of a monastery or abbey.

A well 16 feet in depth at Jacksonville, Fla., yields a supply of water that rises and falls with the tides of the ocean.

The first permanent English settlement in America was established in 1607 by the London company, at Jamestown, Va.

Herodotus, the "Father of History," was an eminent historian, born about 484 B. C., and died in Italy about the year 520 B. C.

There are twenty common bricks to a cubic foot when laid, and fifteen common bricks to a foot of eight-inch wall when laid.

The Colosseum is in Rome, Italy. Its capacity is 87,000. Capacity of St. Peter's at Rome, 58,000. St. Paul's at Rome, 38,000.

The compass is said to have been invented by a Chinese emperor, Hou-ang-to by name, 2634 B. C. The first mention of its use at sea is about 300 A. D.

In the Blue Laws of Connecticut, "whosoever says there is a power and jurisdiction above and over this domain, shall suffer death and the loss of his property."

In August, 1680, twenty negroes were brought into Jamestown by a Dutch vessel and sold for slaves. This was the first introduction of slavery into America.

The influence of the tides is felt for 400 miles up the Amazon, and the current of the river is distinctly perceptible on the ocean for more than 200 miles from the shore.

The direct cable from Ireland to Rye Beach, N. H., is 3,060 miles. The length of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad, extending from Omaha to San Francisco, is 1,916 miles.

It is a good thing that God removed the tree of life from the Garden of Eden when Adam and Eve fell from grace. Nothing would make a man so brave in sin as to think he could live on earth forever.

When a man begins to grow old his eyebrows grow thick and bushy; a woman's eyebrows grow thin and fall out. This is an unfailing sign of age, no matter what other youthful indications one may possess.

The highest dwelling place for man is a Buddhist monastery at Haine, Thibet, which stands 16,000 feet above sea level. There is a railway station on the top of Pike's Peak, Col., 14,143 feet above sea level.

The largest gun ever made in this country has just been completed at West Troy, N. Y. It is 32½ feet long, will throw a distance of fifteen miles, with 440 pounds of powder and will penetrate wrought iron thirty-two inches.

In 1818 President James Monroe signed a bill for reducing the stripes in the United States flag to thirteen for the original states, adding a star to the blue ground for every new state that should be admitted into the union. There are now forty-four stars in the blue.

Common window glass is powdered and sifted through sieves of varying fineness, for coarse and fine sandpaper; then any coarse paper is covered with thin glue, and the powdered glass is sifted upon it. After standing a day or two the refuse sand is shaken off and the paper is ready for use.

A New York surgeon who has made a specialty of nerve centers says the music of a hand-organ is pleasant to at least ninety-nine out of every hundred people, falling upon the nerve centers and tympanum of the ear with soothing effect. He says that when you meet a person that cries out against this sort of music you can safely put him down as a falsifier and deceiver.

Steamboat building was begun at Pittsburg by Fulton and Livingstone in 1811. These were the first steam vessels to ply on the lakes. The Sheldon Thompson, which brought a boat-load of soldiers for the Black Hawk war, and also the Asiatic cholera, July 10, 1832, was the first steamer to run from Buffalo to Chicago. A regular line of steam vessels between these two ports was not established until 1834. Captain Ericsson obtained patents on the screw propeller in 1837 and began the construction of a vessel in 1838, but the first vessel with the screw to be put successfully to work was the Archimedes, built by H. Wimehurst, and launched on the Thames in 1838.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor. E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor, having applied to this Court for a discharge from his debts, it is hereby ordered that the Clerk of this Court give notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, to appear before this Court, at the court-room thereof, on the 2d day of October, 1891, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock, P. M., and show cause, if any they have, why said E. M. Stevens should not be discharged from all his debts, in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided. It is further ordered, that notice of said application be given to the creditors by mail, and by publication for four weeks in the THEMIS, a newspaper published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated September 3d, 1891.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. sep5-4t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of F. L. Bates, an insolvent debtor. F. L. Bates, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said F. L. Bates is hereby declared to be insolvent. All persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association, for his use, and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the county of Sacramento, on the 9th day of October, 1891, at 1:30 P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, September 3d, A. D. 1891.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Filed September 3d, 1891.
W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
CLINTON L. WHITE, Attorney for Petitioner. sep5-5t

O, You
Sun-Browned
Girl!

Why do you not have the Tan and Freckles removed from your skin by using

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

Which makes the Skin pure and white and clear, and free from every blemish as it was when nature made it. Don't be careless about your complexion. It is a woman's chiefest physical charm. Face Bleach, $1.50 per bottle; three for $4. All Druggists sell it.

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

J. FRANK CLARK,
UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL O LOAN O OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

SHE SAVED HIM.

The Strange Tale of a Mentone Physician.
[From the French of Guy de Maupassant.]

I.

I once knew a woman, one of my patients, now dead, to whom the most extraordinary thing in the world happened, and the most mysterious and touching.

She was a Russian, Countess Marie Baranow, a very great lady of exquisite beauty. You know how beautiful the Russians are, or, at least, how beautiful they seem to us—with their delicate noses, their sensitive mouths; their eyes so close together, of an indefinable color, a blue gray; and their cold, rather hard charm. They have something wicked and seductive, haughty and melting, tender and severe, utterly charming to a Frenchman. At bottom, perhaps, it is only the difference of race and blood that makes us see so much in them.

Her doctor had during many years known that she was threatened by a disease of the chest, and endeavored to persuade her to come to France for the Winter, but she obstinately refused to quit St. Petersburg. At last in the autumn of last year, the doctor compelled her to leave for Mentone.

She was alone in her compartment of the train, her servants occupying another. She leaned against the window a little sadly, watching the country and the villages as they whirled past, feeling very isolated, very lonely in life.

At each station her footman, Ivan, came to see if his mistress had everything she desired. He was an old servant, blindly devoted, ready to obey any order she might give him.

Night fell, the train rolled on at full speed. She could not sleep, she was totally unnerved. Suddenly the idea occurred to her of counting the money given to her at the last moment in French gold. She opened her little bag and emptied on to her lap the glistening stream of metal.

But, of a sudden, a breath of cold air caught her cheek. She lifted her head in surprise. The door opened. The Countess Marie, in dismay, threw a shawl over the money spread out in her lap and waited. A moment afterwards a man appeared, bare-headed, wounded in one hand, panting, and in evening dress.

He reclosed the door, sat down and looked at his neighbor with a glittering eye, then wrapped his wrist in a handkerchief.

The poor woman felt faint with fright. This man must have seen her counting her money, and had come to kill her and steal it.

He still fixed his gaze upon her; breathless, his face drawn, evidently waiting to spring upon her.

He said brusquely—
"Madam, have no fear."

She answered nothing, she was incapable of opening her lips, she heard her heart beating and a buzzing in her ears.
"I am no malefactor, madame," he continued.

Still she said nothing, but in a sudden movement she made, her knees knocked together and the money poured on to the carpet like water from a spout.

The man stared in surprise at this flow of gold and at once stooped to gather it up.

She, terrified, rose, casting all her gold on the carpet, and rushed to the door to throw herself on to the line. But he perceived her intention, sprang up, seized her in his arms, and forced her on to the seat, holding her by the wrists.

"Listen to me, madam. I am no thief. As a proof I am going to gather up this money and restore it to you. But I am a lost man, a dead man, unless you help me to pass the frontier. I can tell you no more. In one hour more we shall be at the last Russian station, in one hour and twenty minutes we shall be on the other side of the boundaries of the empire. Unless you aid me I am lost. And yet, madame, I have neither killed nor stolen, nor done anything dishonorable. That I swear to you. I can tell you no more."

And, going down on his knees, he collected the money, feeling under the seats, and looking into the furthest corners.

Then, when the little leather bag was once more full, he handed it to his neighbor without a word and returned to his seat in the other corner of the carriage.

Neither moved. She sat motionless and mute, still faint with fright, but recovering little by little.

As to him, he moved no muscle, he sat erect, his eyes fixedly looking straight before him, very pale, as though he were dead. Every now and then she threw him a glance, which was quickly averted. He was a man of about thirty, very handsome, with every appearance of being a gentleman.

The train tore through the darkness, throwing its ear-piercing whistles into the night, now slackening speed, now off again at its fastest. Then it calmed its flight, whistled several times, and stopped altogether.

Ivan appeared at the door to take orders. The Countess Marie looked for the last time at her strange companion. Then in a voice brusque and trembling, said to her servant:

"Ivan, you will return to the Count. I have no further need of your services."

Amazed, the man opened his enormous eyes. He stammered—

"But—but—"

She continued—

"No, you need not come. I have changed my mind. I wish you to stay in Russia. Here, here is money for the journey. Give me your cap and mantle."

The old servant, bewildered, took off his cap and mantle, with unquestioning obedience, accustomed to the sudden whims and strange caprice of his mistress. He walked away with the tears in his eyes.

The train started again, racing to the frontier.

Then the Countess Marie said to her companion—

"These things are for you, monsieur; you are Ivan, my servant. I make but one condition; it is that you will never speak to me, that you will say no word to thank me on any pretext whatever."

The stranger bowed without a word.

Soon a fresh halt was made, and the officials in uniform entered the train. The Countess handed them the papers, and, pointing to the man seated in the far end of the carriage—

"My servant, Ivan; he is the passport."

The train started again.

During the whole of the night they remained tete-a-tete, dumb both.

In the morning, on stopping at a German station, the stranger alighted. Then, standing by the door, he said—

"Pardon me, madame, that I break my promise, but I have deprived you of your servant; it is only fair that I should replace him. Is there anything you require?"

She replied coldly—

"Go and send my maid."

He went. Then disappeared. Whenever she alighted at a refreshment-room she saw him watching her from a distance. In due course they arrived at Mentone.

II.

One day, as I was receiving my patients in my study, I saw a tall man enter. "Doctor," he said, "I come to ask news of the Countess Marie Baranow."

"She is beyond hope," I replied. "She will never return to Russia."

And this man fell to sobbing; then he arose and went out staggering like a drunken man. That same evening I told the Countess that a stranger had been to me to ask after her health. She seemed touched, and told me the tale I have just told you. She added—

"This man, whom I do not know, follows me like my shadow. I meet him every time I go out. He looks at me very strangely, but he has never spoken to me."

She reflected, and then added—

"Look, there he is, below my window!"

She rose from her sofa, drew the curtains aside, and showed me the man who had called upon me, sitting on a bench on the promenade, his eyes raised to the hotel. He saw us, rose and walked away without once turning his head. So it was that I took part in a strange and incomprehensible episode—in the love of these two beings, who were quite unknown to one another.

He loved with the devotion of a rescued animal, grateful and devoted until death. He came every day to ask me, "How is she?" knowing that I had guessed. And he wept bitterly when he had seen her pass, paler and weaker every day.

She said to me:

"I have spoken but once to this singular man, and it seems to me I have known him for years."

And when they met she returned his bow with a grave and charming smile. I knew she was happy—she so lonely and dying. I knew she was happy to be loved with such constancy and respect, with this exaggerated poesy, with this devotion ready for all hazards. And yet, faithful to her obstinate though high-minded resolve, she absolutely refused to receive him, to know his name or to speak to him. She said, "No, no, that would spoil our strange friendship. We must remain strangers to one another."

As to him, he was of a certainty a kind of Don Quixote, for he took no steps to approach her. He was determined to keep to the letter the absurd promise he had made to her in the train.

Often during the long hours of weakness she rose from her sofa to draw back the curtains and look if he were there below the window. And when she had seen him, always immovably seated on his bench, she returned to her couch with a smile on her lips.

She died one morning about 6 o'clock. As I left the hotel he came to me, his face distorted; he had already heard the news.

"I should like to see her for a second in your presence," he said.

I took his arm and re-entered the house.

When he was by the bedside of the dead he took her hand and kissed it—a long, long kiss. Then he fled like a madman.—The Strand Magazine.

Do not admit that you believe some doctrine that you do not believe merely for business sake. Stand pat on the truth, even if it reduces your bill of fare to do so.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Guttenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT
BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.

M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars.
ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B. PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

Capital Coffee House

J. H. BRUNING, Proprietor.

509 K STREET,

Between Fifth and Sixth, SACRAMENTO.

Fine Coffee, Tea or Milk, { With Pie }
or Cake, } 10 Cents.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS.

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,
WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS
AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

Grubler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET,

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & CO.

410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

RHODES & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

A Warning to Schoolmarm.

To the Board of Education
A fair young maiden came,
And she had an air of sweetness,
And of delicate completeness;
A most rare and classic creature,
And she craved a place as teacher;
Then the Board, with breath suspended,
Asked the charming maiden's name.

Eyes of soulful blue bent on them,
Till their hearts went pit-a-pat,
Made she answer (little knew she
It had better been Jerushy):
"Kittie Brown from Vassar College,
With my range of useful knowledge
I am sure that I can please you."
But the Board like statues sat.

To the Board of Education
A raw-boned maiden came
This antique in-form-and-feature,
This attenuate weird creature,
Robed in bifurcated raiment,
With an eye to future payment,
Like King Solomon made answer
When the Board required her name.

Eyes transversely bent upon them
In a most bewildering way.
Capping college law completely,
Made she answer most discreetly:
"Pet names, as you must opine, sirs,
To no document I sign, sirs,
And I'm pleased to say my name is Sarah Ann Miranda Gray."

So sweet Kittie was rejected,
Wrecked her pedagogic dream,
Turned to snow her rosy blushes,
By a fate that young life crushes,
And her rival, tall and scraggy,
In her garments loose and baggy,
Cross-eyed Sarah Ann Miranda
In the schoolroom reigned supreme.

Scotland Yard.

The late chief office of the police force is said to have derived its name of "Scotland Yard" from the fact of its being the site of a palace in which the Kings of Scotland were received when they came to England. The Saxon King Edgar granted this portion of land to the south of Charing Cross to Kenneth III, King of Scotland, in 959, and here the latter lived when he came to do homage to the English crown. The palace reared on this spot was for a long time the town house, so to speak, of the Kings of Scotland, its last inhabitant being Margaret, Queen of Scots, who visited London after the death of her husband at the battle of Flodden Field. The palace after this became neglected, and during the reign of Elizabeth its existence as a palace terminated and Government officials became its inhabitants.

Here the bard of "Paradise Lost" lived while occupying the position of secretary to Oliver Cromwell, then Protector, and here Beau Fielding, Inigo Jones and Sir John Denham, of Cooper's Hill notoriety, lived and died. At the beginning of the present century the palace court was held in Scotland Yard. When that came to an end nobody paid any attention to the place until Sir Robert Peel, in 1829, established the present metropolitan police force, the headquarters of which were fixed there.

In February, 1866, when Gen. Grant was stationed in Washington as commanding general of the army, the French Minister, who still occupied the Corcoran House at the legation, issued invitations for the most magnificent ball which has probably ever been given in Washington. M. Montholon, being a warm personal friend and admirer of Gen. Grant, issued orders to his steward at the outset of the ball that the General was to be treated as a special guest of honor, and the best wine that the cellars afforded placed at his disposal. The next day the steward approached the Minister in great perplexity and inquired in an amazed way who was this Gen. Grant to whom he was to give the best of everything, and who had shown himself so far appreciative of the honor accorded that he had called for no less than sixteen bottles of champagne, nine bottles of brandy and whiskey ad libitum. The explanation which shortly transpired was that the order, having been overheard by a party of young fellows, they took advantage of the steward's credulity, prefacing every demand for the choicest liquors with the magic announcement that it was for Gen. Grant.

"I'd rather have brains than beauty," said Ned,
To Miss Sharp, as he sat by her fishing.
"It is a misfortune for you, then," she said
"That you cannot have either by wishing."

"That's true," he replied, then deeming a bold
Retort to the maiden a duty,
He added, "But if I had plenty of gold
I'm certain that I could buy beauty."

"You need a change," the doctor said,
"And you ought to have more relaxation."
The patient smiled and shook his head,
Then gasped as he turned o'er in bed,
"I've just returned from a month's vacation."

The Liberian Dream.

A slight revival of the old scheme of colonization brings that amicable but abortive effort to reverse the eternal order of things once more up for discussion. The doctrine is seen nothing impracticable in the scheme to deport the freedmen to Africa; on the contrary, to such a person it seems the most natural solution of the race problem. To the student of history and to the philosopher the proposition seems to have nothing to stand on. It has nothing to stand on beyond the apparent fitness of the African for Africa. But the freedmen are Africans exactly as the descendants of English, Irish, Scotch, German, Polish and Italian parents will be assignable to the several nationalities of their ancestors a century or two hence. There is probably not an African in the country since Mr. Stanley's body-servant departed; or, if there are Africans, they are probably Mohammedans. No person born in this country and here reared can be an African or an Englishman. The freedmen are Americans.

It is proposed, then, to deport Americans to Liberia because more than two centuries ago their ancestors inhabited some part of Africa. It appears to be understood by the proponents that because a man is black he's an African, and that all Africans are black. Well, neither of these understandings is true. There is a greater variety of the human family in Africa than there is in America; and as to language, there are wider gaps between the languages of the African tribes than there are between the tribes of North American Indians. So far as ability to endure climatic stress is concerned, the Anglo-Saxon and the Gaul of this time far outrank the American negro. The negro has nothing in common with Africa except the color of his skin and the kiuk in his hair; and the scheme of colonization, so far as it embraces the ten millions, more or less, of freedmen, is wholly absurd.

Ex-Senator Bruce, of Mississippi, in referring to the scheme, pronounces it wholly impracticable. He is an African by derivation. What he may think about it must have weight. He says the freedmen have made marvelous progress since their emancipation, not only in the art of taking care of themselves, but in education and wealth. They have actually accumulated more property than an equal number of poor whites since their liberation. They are American in feeling and in aspiration, knowing no other country and desiring to know no other. Mr. Bruce says that the freedmen have suffered some hardships at the hands of the rough element, but that the master class have in the main given their former slaves as good a chance as they were able to give. At first poverty was almost universal, pinching all alike. But in the main the recent slave was employed at wages and allowed to shape his life about as he pleased. And that the progress of the freedmen demonstrates his ability to profit by the influences and privileges of civilized life is not to be seriously denied. The negro has, in fact, since his liberation, made more progress than any white race ever made under disadvantages in the same space of time.

Of course the return of the Israelites to their native heath is the basis of the colonization scheme. But the cases are not analogous. The Israelites had experienced a species of nationalization before they were led away into captivity. The national impulse had not been destroyed, but only suppressed. The ancestors of the freedmen had never enjoyed national life, had no idea of nationality. The freedmen have grown into habits of national life during two hundred years, and their growth is mingled with our own. To deport is to denationalize them, not to restore them to a lost estate. Fond as some persons may be in fancying analogies between the Israelite of Egypt and the African in America, it is all in the air, and very thin air at that. The only analogy is that both were bondmen and bondwomen, which in this case is as if we should construct an analogy out of the swarthy color of the skin. There is no other.—North American.

Massachusetts can now lay claim to the distinction of having a king born within its domain. A child was born in the woods of Newton, who will be proclaimed King of all the Gypsies of the United States, Canada and South America. His mother, Tryphena, is the thirty-fourth queen of the Zut tribe of Romany Umchiels. His father has no royal blood in his veins, but he is an expert horseman. The young king is the fifth child, and his title comes from his mother, by reason of his being first son born of Queen Tryphena.

All men act alike when waiting for a train that is behind time. They begin with pacing up and down the platform and saying hard things against the railroad. A look of joy spreads over their features as they hear the whistle of an approaching locomotive, but when it turns out to be only a dummy engine coming from the other direction, the joyful expression turns to one of anger and disappointment. Then the depot men catch it. They begin with the night superintendent and proceed to worry everybody down to the railroad job—the gateman.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

Assets.
Aetna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn. $10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co. 5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York 11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and
Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York 774,550 20

KEEP YOUR EYEOn the Window.

CHANGED DAILY DURING FAIR WEEK.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 18th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

A. P. CATLIN,

Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated August 13th, 1891.

JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and 4/100 Dollars alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for $1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHODES, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHODES, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jyl8-8t

OCCURS AT

SACRAMENTOSEPT. 7TH TO 19TH 1891

THE EVENT OF THE YEAR.

DON'T FAIL TO EXHIBIT.

WRITE THE SECRETARY

FOR INFORMATION.

FRED'K COX, PRESIDENT.

EDWIN F. SMITH, SECRETARY.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh,
Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

A. L. HART,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON, ALBERT M. JOHNSON,

HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,
LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.CHAS. N. POST,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.R. M. CLARKEN,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.MATT. F. JOHNSON,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.W. A. ANDERSON,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.JAMES B. DEVINE,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street.W. A. GETT, JR.,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.C. W. BAKER,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.S. SOLON HOLL,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,LAWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, 1007 Second Street.J. W. HUGHES,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.MCKUNE & GEORGE,ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.ROBT. T. DEVLIN,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.CHAS. H. OATMAN,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.L. S. TAYLOR,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.J. W. ARMSTRONG,LAWYER,
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.GEORGE G. DAVIS,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Room 26 Postoffice Building.PHILIP S. DRIVER,LAWYER,
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.H. L. BUCKLEY,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.E. C. HART (City Attorney),ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.ISAAC JOSEPH,ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

The Confederate Flag.

In the flag museum at Washington, in the War Department Building, may be seen the first flag raised over Charleston in 1861, literally the first banner of secession. It is a perfect caricature of a flag. It is made of bunting—once white, no doubt, but now dingy with time and dust—and upon it is sewed a poor representation of a palmetto tree; this has eight branches and no leaves, and looks more like a huge spider than anything else. On it are also sewed eleven red stars and a red moon just rising. This flag was used at Forts Sumter and Moultrie at the outbreak of the war. Just as the palmetto flag was used by the State of South Carolina when it seceded, the palmetto flag was used by Louisiana, and flags of other designs were used by other States. But the first Confederate flag legally established was adopted at Montgomery March 4, 1861. It had a red field, with a white stripe through the center, one-third the width of the flag, and the union was blue, extending down through the white space to the second red space, and in the center of it was a circle of seven white stars, indicating the number of States in the Confederacy. This was the famous "stars and bars." But it was too much like the United States flag, so that on the battle-field of Bull Run the one was frequently mistaken for the other. At the suggestion of General Beauregard, therefore, the "Southern Cross," or battle-flag, was adopted for field service, and used to the end of the war. This had a red field, with blue bars diagonally across it, in the form of a Greek cross, with seven stars in white or gold. The bars were separated from the red ground by a white fillet inserted. This flag for infantry service was made four feet square; for cavalry three feet, and for artillery two and a half feet square. It was never used for sea service, as it had no union, and could not be reversed as a signal of distress. The "stars and bars" was, therefore, used by the navy. Another flag was adopted by the Confederate Congress May 1, 1863. The length of this flag was twice its width, and it had a white field, with the battle-flag as its union. The first vessel to use this flag was the Atlanta, the Confederate ram, which left the port of Savannah in May, with the hope of winning laurels for the new standard. She was met, however, by the monitor Weehawken, June 17, and after an engagement of fifteen minutes she was so battered that her officers hauled down her flag, tore off a square of the white and displayed it as a flag of truce. This second flag was objected to because it was so much like the British standard, and also because it resembled a flag of truce. The latter objection was regarded as so valid that a broad strip of red was attached to the fly end of the flag. The third and last ensign of the short-lived Confederacy was adopted by the Confederate Congress Feb. 4, 1865. Its width was to be two-thirds of its length, and its union, for which the design of the battle flag was still used, was three-fifths the width of the flag. Its field was white except the outer half from the union, which was a red bar the width of the flag. Three months after the adoption of the ensign, its raison d'être perished in the utter overthrow of the confederate armies.

The Old Santa Fe Trail.

Thirty-five years after Columbus discovered this continent, Alva Nunez Cabeza de Vaca sailed from Spain and landed in Florida or in the region now called by that name. From there he made a wonderful overland journey to the City of Mexico. On that journey a part of the way he traversed a route which ever since has found great favor with travelers to New Mexico. Just think of it! There is a road 800 miles long, rising so imperceptibly for over six hundred miles of the distance as to seem absolutely level, and without a single bridge from end to end! What wonderful tales that road could tell—of the bearded followers of De Vaca; thin and worn by privation and the fatigue of their long journey through a wilderness until then pathless—of the after settlement of the neighborhood by the Spaniards—of the coming of the hardy American pioneer, traders, soldiers, settlers, and last, but most important of all, the railroad engineers. Many an exploit of soldiers, scout and Indian warrior has that ancient trail witnessed. Phil Kearny knew it well, for had he not fought over nearly its entire length? Kit Carson achieved much of his fame in its vicinity, and in the early fifties F. X. Aubrey, a young man, made a famous ride against time over the same route, from Santa Fe to Independence, Mo.

Rhode Island formerly consisted of two settlements, known respectively as Providence and Rhode Island, the governments of which were united by a patent obtained by Roger Williams in 1643, which remained in force until 1663, when a charter was obtained from Charles II incorporating the colony of Rhode Island and Providence plantations, which was the only constitution of government until 1842. In colonial times the assembly met alternately at Newport and Providence, and when the new constitution was adopted the two capitals were retained, the legislature holding its regular session in Newport, commencing in May, and a session by adjournment in Providence.

W. D. Comstock, 501--507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

GALLERY,

No. 415 J Street,

Between Fourth and Fifth,

SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,

Photographic Art Parlors

426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK

Restaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice,

SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6:30 A	Calistoga and Napa	11:05 A
3:05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8:10 P
12:50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4:20 A
4:30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7:00 P
7:00 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7:40 A
10:50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9:35 A
11:50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2:25 A
11:00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5:25 A
3:00 P	Oroville	10:30 A
3:00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10:30 A
10:35 A	Redding via Willows	4:00 P
2:50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11:25 A
4:35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12:30 A
6:50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11:05 A
5:40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10:40 P
3:05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8:10 P
*10:00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	*6:00 A
10:50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2:50 P
10:50 A	San Jose	2:50 P
4:30 P	Santa Barbara	9:35 A
6:50 A	Santa Rosa	11:05 A
3:05 P	Santa Rosa	8:10 P
8:50 A	Stockton and Galt	7:00 P
4:30 P	Stockton and Galt	9:35 A
11:50 A	Truckee and Reno	2:25 A
11:00 P	Truckee and Reno	5:25 A
6:30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2:30 P
6:50 A	Vallejo	8:10 P
3:05 P	Vallejo	8:10 P
*8:20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2:40 P
*12:15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10:20 A
*4:45 P	Folsom	*8:00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED K. COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5½) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento.

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR
a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,
CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE EMERSON

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1891.

No. 31.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

One day we have the telegraphic news that the British have seized Mitylene, the next day it is pronounced a hoax. Yesterday, it is announced, that war is the final resolve in Europe; to-day the wrinkled front is smoothed. So we show our advancement in journalistic enterprise by contradicting to-day what was assured yesterday. It has become proverbial that little or no reliance can be placed in our telegraphic news. The impulse of the sensational news gatherer governs the associated press items; fact and truth form no ingredient. The eager haste to get something to telegraph precludes the careful investigation or search for the true facts of the case. This desire for haste and sensation is not confined to the telegraphic news. It is rare indeed that newspaper reporters make the least endeavor to get at facts, but secure a slender thread of a subject, trusting to imagination and a large degree of exaggeration to create a small temporary sensation, which is very soon exposed by the true facts, but which often causes personal injury and suffering to the innocent. It is difficult to understand what evil propensity prompts the news reporter to repeat a thing that he is compelled to deny or retract within twenty-four hours. A few reckless words in this way, often bring untold sorrow upon whole families of innocent people. With regard to truthful journalism, we could take profitable lessons from the past.

Gertrude Atherton in the Examiner, has made some bold and truthful, as well as timely thrusts at the exclusiveness of alleged good society. When this doubtful class sets itself up as the judge of good manners and good breeding, and at mere rumor attempts to ostracize their fellows, it is time to apply the steel to their souls—if there is such a thing among them. Here is what the witty and accomplished writer says: "Some time ago a number of society women were invited by a woman of their own set to meet another about whom many stories, spiked with exclamation points, were in circulation. It would be almost impossible to verify any of these anecdotes, as all of them were supposed to have had their instigation on another continent; her life in this city has been extremely quiet, not to say stupid. But all the women, without a single exception, declined to go to the luncheon, making no secret of the reason. There are few social problems more interesting than this. Had all the women taking this uncompromising and damaging stand shown themselves spotless as lilies in the garden of the Lord the question would still arise: Had they any right to publicly declare a woman unfit for association on mere rumor, being well aware that they would require the services of a detective to verify the cause of disapproval? When, on the other hand, it is taken into consideration that more than one of the women declining had reputations that would not bear the scrutiny of a lorgnette the question becomes complex indeed. Each of these women knew as well as I can tell her here that her peccadilloes are ignored on account of her wealth; that if the cast-away were gilded she would be received did her pores exude ink. So far, so good. If the line must be drawn, let it be drawn at wealth or want of it, by all means. Rich people are useful, at least; they have floors for less favored to dance on, and they furnish grub for sycophants to eat and criticise. They are material for the striking fraternity to hang their screeds on, and they elevate art by purchasing any picture that is sufficiently high in price. So, by all means, let us have a statue of virtue molded of virgin gold, naked though it may be."

We must think well of ourselves, else no one will think well of us. Self-pride is the chief attribute of intellect, and is the heritage of humanity. We do not mean that variety which is given to some personal attainment and which its possessor flaunts as a distinction over his fellows. Not the variety of dress or personal beauty. It is natural for one gifted with intellect and rare accomplishments to feel a just pride therein, but it is not an evidence of the individual good sense and judgment to speak of these himself. It is for others to discover and mention. We know of persons who are endowed by nature with the brightest minds, who detract from their merits by a constant reminder on all possible occasions of their accomplishments. Such vanity is worldly, and the otherwise good effects are lost by their boastful acts; this, then, becomes vulgarity. Self-love should be tempered so that, with the truly accomplished, it may become the admiration of others. When the actor creates a sensation by his brilliancy, the praise must come from others, and self-adulation ignored. The author or writer who adds to the literature of the world must permit the readers to herald that fact, without inflation from his acts. We must all have sufficient self-pride to hold faith in ourselves. That element which amounts to a petty sordid vanity, or vain glory, cannot stand for the genuine article. There is a wide difference between egotism and vanity. The egotism of some is often mistaken by the uninformed for ability. One of the dangers to the administration of our government—national, state, and municipal—arise from the intense egotism of wealthy bores and ignorant persons who have managed to secure that greatest of all evils, "the pull. Patient and silent merit is forced to yield to these influences in many of the important positions of government—administrative, legislative, and judicial. A little more vanity and push in the truly meritorious, would check-make this influence and give us better officers of government in the departments above mentioned. An ignorant person who may have attained positions or wealth is generally of the petty vain class, and causes the masses to decry proper self-love and vanity. Junius Henri Browne, in the North American Review, gives a beautiful offering to true vanity, from which we cull the following: "What an incentive to conduct, distinction, celebrity it is! It often supplies the place of moral principle. It restrains the vicious, refines the coarse, supports the weak, disarms the malignant. By it the ignorant are made learned, the mean generous, the timid brave. All ambition, even the most laudable, is largely composed of vanity; for it yearns for the applause of the multitude. Where would have been our great names but for its urgency? History would not have been written; there would have been neither authors to write nor heroes to commemorate. We are all actors on the stage of the world, though the great mass of us are mere supernumeraries. But even these, though they may never have a speaking-part, may never utter a word, look forward to the time when they shall draw crowds as Hamlet, when the alert critics shall fill columns in discussing their Othello. This is vanity whispering in their ear and conjuring dreams that will never greet the dawn. But the fancy is a comfort and will sustain them through many a weary day and toilsome night. No matter if it be but vapor. It is as substance while it lasts, and it may last as long as they. Dreams and vapors are often the best part of existence; for though they deceive, they may continue while deception is needed, and may instill a modicum of content. The actors who rise, who play grand personages with loud acclaim, who realize their visions, are haunted by vanity also. But we cease to hear of this after their ascent. It is constantly put forward, and frequently thought, that those who have attained greatness are without vanity. The name is then changed to self-knowledge, self-appreciation, self-esteem; but it is vanity, nevertheless. The public seem determined to regard vanity as something small, belonging to small natures. But it may be big, even majestic; it animates heroes as well as underlings. The great have no need to show their vanity—performance has rendered its showing superfluous—and hence it is presumed to be unborn. While we are actors on the stage of the world, were it not for the footlights, the scenery, the costumes, the audience particularly—all emblematic of the machinery of self-love—the drama would be a lost art."

Political excitement runs high in the Empire, Buckeye, and Bay States. The great contending partisan armies are drawn up in battle array. It may be conceded by our friends, the enemy, that McKinley and protection will carry the Buckeye State. Should the champion of protection sweep the State of Ohio by a very large majority, it might have an effect on the status of candidates for the presidency. New York is the scene of a wonderful contest. Fassett and Flower are the respective leaders, and the contest promises to be lively. Some of the leaders of the Democratic party are in open rebellion against the party nominees, particularly is this the case with Lieutenant-Governor Jones, who proclaims decidedly against Flower, and the methods resorted to in securing his nomination. The old Bay State can be counted as a certainty for the Republican cause. In all the Republican conventions thus far, there has been a marked disposition in favor of James G. Blaine. No man seems to have such a hold on the American people as this matchless statesman.

An election of importance will transpire in this city in December. There will then be elected a School Superintendent and one half of the members of the Board of Education. The rule has been that but little attention has been paid to this annual election, and the votes cast have always been very small—so small as to indicate an almost unpardonable apathy on the part of the people. It is of surprise that the selections that have been made have been so good, particularly in view of the fact that candidates are nominated by political committees, and that as a rule two committeemen absolutely name the candidate from one of the four wards. We direct attention to this election not with an intention to reflect upon the present conduct of the school department; to do so would be unjust, for we appreciate, as doubtless do the people, that the present Board of Education is composed of gentlemen who are able and conscientious, and we are not aware that at any time in the past the management of the school department has been more satisfactory. The Superintendent, Albert Hart, has given his entire time to the performance of the duties of his office, and he should be renominated. There will be no question but that the people will elect him. So far as directors are concerned we suggest that the political committees act with the very best of judgment, and particularly do we hope that the Republican Committee will not repeat the blunders that have been made in instances in the past. That body, if it acts judiciously, can name a ticket that will be successful. We have always favored the nomination of candidates for school offices by a large convention; and truly it would be better if at the elections votes would be received only from the parents, and that mothers should be permitted to express their preference as to who will have the general control of the education of our youth. The tendency of American legislation of late years has been to recognize in large degree women as a potential factor in educational matters. She is permitted to hold the office of School Superintendent. We are not aware that any instance has occurred where a woman has filled an important educational station, as that of superintendent of county schools, or as principal of a large school, there has been a failure. It would seem that at educational elections a most excellent judgment would be exercised by mothers; it might be said it would be a selfish judgment, for they of all others are concerned in the promotion of their children. However, the best must be made of the circumstances that do exist, and let the men act with that discretion that they would expect were the matter determined by the weaker sex.

The great State exposition will close to-night. The racing programme for this afternoon is the finest yet presented. It is probable that the closing scenes will be most attractive and interesting, both at the pavilion and the park. We feel justified in saying that the fair has been a success. There are, however, some lessons to be learned by the experience of the past two weeks. It is evident that there are too many small district fairs in the State. These do not materially benefit localities, as is the intention, and the fact is now demonstrated that they have a tendency to detract from the State exhibition. A wise reform could be inaugurated by the next Legislature, in departing from the custom of making appropriations for these district fairs. It is due the State, as a matter of State pride, that there should be an exhaustive display of the products and industries of the entire State. Under the present system of district fairs this object cannot be attained to its fullest extent. By the time the citizen has contributed to the patronage of a dozen or more district exhibitions, his time as well as his purse is exhausted before the State fair is reached. This is a matter that should address itself to the people of the respective districts. A just, a due amount of local pride is always commendable, but when it is apparent that no real benefit can accrue, the proper thing to do is, to all join hands and make the one great State exposition a success.

How prone is the daring mind to assert its individual rights! how seldom does it recur to its personal duties!—as if the more abstract power implied the necessity, admitted the fitness, gave permission, or, in fact, brought apology for deviation of any kind. Since to every individual right there is morally annexed a relative duty: if the wife or daughter of a prosperous man may have the right of subsistence from his income, or through his exertions, there is equally due the returns of attention, assistance and obedience. Even as political protection claims allegiance, support implies dependence, and benefits call for every possible remuneration. Mary Wolstoncroft, by her pernicious precepts, and still more pernicious practice, in proclaiming "the rights of woman," involved the sex in more real wrongs, and was the occasion of greater restraints upon their intellectual character, than the whole host of masculine revilers could accomplish; since if those who are most capable of comprehending the perfection of moral beauty turn aside, in preference, to the deformity of vice; if the clear light of knowledge prove to the female vision a mere ignus fatuus, leading on and plunging down to deep depravity and hopeless perdition, it would be better, infinitely better, to remain amid the darkness of folly or in the vacuity of ignorance. Yet if one presumptuous woman possessed of mind, and cultivating its attainments, has vainly rejected the good in weak preference of evil, not only by personal error, but by profligate opinion, wandering from the straight path, with endeavors to seduce the innocent and mislead the unwary, let her remain the landmark and not the model of her kind; while the correct and capable translator of Epictetus, the pious and enlightened Barbauld, the instructing and delighting Edgeworth; the profound, the eloquent, the admired Lucy Aikin, with the many and nearly innumerable female writers, whose genius, virtues and feminine graces, having improved and embellished the sex and the species, still remain, exemplars worthy of applause and meriting imitation. Let these, and such as these, be seen effectually convincing, and eventually converting, the disclaimer and the skeptic; by their own incontrovertible evidence be it admitted that cultivated talents and literary endowment may, in meliorating the condition of the individual, instruct the mind, improve the heart and protect the morals, even of the least powerful portion of the human family.

Mary Wolstoncroft, affecting to appear a hot-headed republican, resorted to revolutionary France, and in the levity of her restless and unsubdued spirit, among jacobin compatriots, learned to distort and to distract, like those architects of ruin, was ambitious to overthrow and destroy; but how did the daring experiment end? Even by a life of menial extravagance and counteracted passions, an attempted suicide, and a disastrous fate. In fine, misery, ignominy and destitution. In throwing aside the regulations, and disdaining the consolations of Christianity, the morals and the destiny of this woman would have dishonored the principles and disgraced the profession of a pagan. Most surely, neither the physical, the mental, nor the moral constitution of woman admit of her leading armies or directing navies. To hold the helm of command either upon the ocean or the soil, she cannot acquire the hardy nerve of the surgeon, nor the bold voice of the public orator; debate does not become her, and her authority is never to be maintained by coercion. Yet her station is high and important; her influence and her duties lasting and mighty; the enchantment of beauty, the delight of kind and healing conciliations, the world of literature, the fine arts, the eloquent superiority of conversation, with the homage of admiration, respect and attachment, are supremely her own. Also, the first ideas of filial infancy, the early impressions of maturing youth, and the late consolations of departing age are her peculiar attributes.

What is man, deprived of honorable, affectionate woman? A brutal sensualist, or a gloomy misanthrope, whom individuals do not respect, and the best portion of society derides and deserts. Neither has it been thought that political opinion, the sciences, nor any of those themes that interest the feelings and occupy the understanding of her companion man, are so far out of her department as to be regarded by woman with indifference, provided violence and supercilious demeanor be not permitted to carry their disgrace to her person. When high endowments and decided talents are united with mild manners and modesty of deportment, they will please in either sex; and for woman, when the despotic reign of beauty has faded away, the influence of such talents, and such manners, will remain powerful and attractive, ever honored and always admired. If the coarse conduct, plain person, and neglectful habits of some literary women, are decidedly repulsive, those defects, and not the additional accomplishment of understanding, are the cause of that repulsion; for the mind of woman is degraded only when, forfeiting her real rank and forgetting its influence, she endeavors or affects to steal upon the bold occupations, the active professions, the exclusive dictatorship of man.

To conclude: The high station which woman sustains in the Christian world, is surely due to the benign influence of the Christian religion. What is woman in Barbarian, Pagan, and Mahomedan countries? What was she in the polished region of enchanting Greece, or in the glorious empire of triumphant Rome? With the exception of ten or twelve solitary instances, a slave or a victim. Amid the civilized blessings of Christianity she is the companion, the confidant, the adviser and the consoler of man—the guide and guardian of his happiness, the comforter of his affliction, upon whose attractions his eye dwells and his hope rests, from the first dawn of awakened reason to the last shade of declining memory. And from that ever sacred source we are taught that the true rights and the real happiness of woman are to be protected and enlarged only by her conforming to its divine precepts of forbearance and reliance, remembering and regarding the reasonable limitation of her power as the honorable extent of her duties.

Yema, Buddhist God of Hell.

Most Buddhist temples in Corea, China and Japan are filled up with a representation of hell according to Oriental ideas; especially is this true of the temples and pagodas known as the "Abode of the Five Hundred Gods." To make this hellish idea more real it is always placed at the end of a long, dark hall, dimly lighted, the uncertain flicker of the lamps giving Yema, the god of hell, whose black image towers above the supposed horrors in the attitude of one whose sway is absolute, the most horrid aspect imaginable. Yema sits upon a massive throne, with his pencil in hand, ready to write out the sentence of the condemned. His grim visage is of the sablest of sable hues; his eyes are as large as saucers, their color being mainly red and white, their hideous, stony stare not detracting in the least from the dreadful picture, even though you struggle to convince yourself that the whole scene is fanciful and ideal. But, as if general dreariness of surroundings were not enough to cause the Buddhist devotee to realize the terrors of this ideal hell, Yema's features are horribly distorted and malformed. His monster eyes of red and white are three in number, his nails are long and fiend-like, he has hoofs, horns and hair, and is in many other particulars like the Christian devil, with the exception of a spiked tail. On either side of this god of hell sits two figures supposed to keep records of the misdeeds of men, and in front, sits the executioner, ready to cast the condemned into perdition. Hell itself, according to the Buddhists, is even more terrible than Christian nations suppose it to be. First, the wicked are beaten into a jelly; secondly, they are dragged limb from limb, chopped to pieces, pounded in a mortar, nails, tongue and eyes gouged out and the body sawn or planed into various shapes. In the third stage they are supposed to be beaten like animals in a pen; the fourth is the stage of great weeping, and the fifth that of "sorrowful lamentation." In the sixth stage the body is partly roasted. In the seventh the unfortunate victim of Yema is forced to walk for ages over hills covered with long needles. At the end of the long and painful march the candidate for hell is thrown into the bottomless pit of perdition.

Immortality of Sin.

Immortality in the thoughts of the world is indeed surest won by crime. It is the sins of the men and women about us, and not their virtues, which interest us. If the whole truth were told the world is too often sadly bored by the virtues of its neighbors. It is often said, in one of those jests which is the shame faced truth, that "good people are tiresome!" This morbid taste, which can in a measure be explained by the fact that virtue is so often passive and vice so seldom, was never so pitifully prominent as it is at present; never did the vicious effect of this incurable error have a more prevalent example than it has to day. Though the evil deeds of old have lived in more heroic wrongs than were ever inspired by ancient virtue, it must also be said in justice that with the tales have come down to us the violent wrath and the quick revenges with which they were met by their contemporaries. There is no legend to claim that curiosity even in those days overcame decency. Though the treason of Tarpeia has been sung in verse, neither her beauty nor her youth softened the contempt of those who profited by her sin; and when the Sextus came back to Rome in the train of the Clusium warrior who proposed to reinstate him in the power his sin had lost, the populace spat upon the splendid Tarquin, and with hisses pointed the way back to Rome. It was with contempt the Tarquin was viewed by the people, though he was born in purple in the days when the people were humble in the presence of rank, but in days, too, when men were men, however humble, and sins aroused indignation and not curiosity. This would be just if they were remembered with aversion, but they're not. The Tarquin has had his apologists, as the Cenci her detractors; and after resting under centuries of evil fame, it has been asserted that the Borgias were heroes and virtuous—sufferers, not sinners. Yet all these criminals exert a fascination, such as the first great sinner has. They do not offend posterity, they divert it.—Boston Home Journal.

One of Ingersoll's Gems.

One of Ingersoll's brightest sentences is the following tribute to womanhood: "I tell you, as a rule, women are more faithful than men—ten times more faithful than men. I never saw a man pursue his wife into a very ditch and dust of degradation and take her in his arms. I never saw a man stand at the shore, where she had been morally wrecked, waiting for the waves to bring back her corpse to his arms; but I have seen women with their white arms lift men from the mire of degradation and hold him to her bosom as though he was an angel."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Gold has already begun to return from Europe. Patti will arrive later; hence she will come after it, as it were.

The French author, Auguste Vitu, who died lately in Paris, was for twenty years dramatic editor of the Paris Figaro.

Manager (to a man leaving the theater)—But, sir, there are two acts to come yet. "I know. That's why I am going."

A woman of extraordinary beauty is said to be Mlle. Teleky, a Hungarian singer, who has appeared in Covent Garden in Traviata.

Mr. Francis Wilson, the actor, will publish early in October a volume of verse by Eugene and Roswell M. Field. The edition will be limited to 100 copies. The title of the book will be, "Echoes from the Sabine Farm; being Certain Horatian Lyrics Discreetly Done Into English Verse by Eugene and Roswell M. Field, with many little picturings by W. H. Garrett. Published in This Seemly Wise by Francis Wilson, New-Rochelle, 1891." These volumes will be printed upon Japan vellum, will be rubricated throughout and embellished with original vignettes and tail-pieces.

The galleries; ah, yes, thank God for these!

Here you have rest the world may never know;
You feel the jeweled splendor down below,
The scent of flowers upon the silken breeze;
But fashion rules not in the galleries!
Soft, through a stained but broken window pane
Come prayers of fluttering leaves, chorus of rain,
With swallows' twitter and the chant of bees.
Blest be the inspired architect—the seer
Who dreamed a holy dream for poverty,
Whose waking thought wrought out the balcony!
He felt the upward step was sweet and broad;
He saw the light above was true and clear,
And knew the gallery was nearer God!

"Momus and matrimony," wrote a cynical philosopher, "are as irreconcilable as anarchy and capital." However that may be, Mrs. Kendal, when here last year, advised actresses not to marry outside of their profession. Thus there seems to be a fixed opinion in certain circles that marriage between ladies of the stage and ordinary mortals of the every-day, outside world should not be encouraged. Such marriages, say skeptics, rarely end well. Actresses, even when retired and amid the domestic surroundings of home, long for the glare of the footlights, the dazzle of the stage costume and the sound of tumultuous applause. The fact remains, however, that certain footlight favorites have married men in other than theatrical walks of life, and, as the story books say, have lived happily for ever afterwards.

A colonial bishop, when an Oxford undergraduate, remarked that after reading Shakspeare he almost invariably sat up the following night to write a drama. A similar infatuation has in thousands of instances led to waste of time and wrecking of valuable talent, without arriving at Schiller's conviction that "he wrote plays before he knew men," or without any knowledge of play-writing for the stage, or of theatrical managers, on the part of writers. A veteran of over fifty years' standing in connection with London theaters, who has written seventy odd plays and had fifty printed and acted, states, in the broad manner peculiar to his vocation, that the manuscripts of unacted plays which have passed through his hands, piled upon each other, would exceed the height of the Monument. The supply of new plays from the three to five hundred playwrights in London alone is, at this same rapid rate of production, going on daily; while it may be fairly calculated that not one in a hundred is read, and many are lost.

Book Chat.

Jules Verne completes two volumes every twelve months, and is one of the European writers whose income will be quadrupled by the passing of the American law of copyright.

An American perpetrated the following joke on a London bookseller, which fell flat at the time: Going into a bookstore, the American asked for "Hare's Walks in London." The clerk handed him the book, which happened to be broken into two volumes. Accustomed to seeing it in one volume, our countryman remarked, facetiously: "Oh, you part your Hare in the middle over here; we don't!" The clerk looked perplexed, but made no reply, nor did his countenance illuminate at the jest. A week later, however, when our American went into the shop he saw that the clerk's face was pervaded with smiles as he came to attend to his order, and he assured him in every possible manner that he had discovered the point of the joke.

The Carnegie Free Library in Allegheny, Pa., has become the fortunate possessor of a copy of Audubon's "Birds of America," the gift of Mrs. William J. Alexander, of Monongahela. The work is one of considerable rarity and of great value, copies of the original edition of 1844 selling at from $2,500 to $4,000. Some of the plates are nearly three feet square and contain life-size paintings of the largest birds. It is not generally known that the great naturalist's daughters live in the old homestead near Audubon Park, overlooking the Hudson. They were once possessed of considerable wealth, but it was lost through unfortunate investments, and they are now in somewhat straitened circumstances. Some of the big, handsome plates from which Audubon's monumental work was printed are preserved in the Museum of Natural History in Central Park.

The world has lost its taste for elaborate studies of character, in which strict methods of psychological analysis were applied with the rigor of science, to the exclusion of the imagination and the starvation of incident. If character were less conventionally monotonous, or if life were less flatly unpicturesque, the subject might yet have triumphed over its treatment and the matter have pardoned the method. Self-consciousness may prefer the looking glass to a picture, but it has its limits, which are passed when once self-satisfaction is wounded in its one vulnerable point. A generation of Narcissuses might contemplate their own images in the pool with so self-complacent an admiration that they "die of their own sweet loveliness." But the mirror which novelists hold up to view at the end of this present century gives back a soured, cynical, anxious, discontented face, from which the enthusiasm, faith and hope of youth seem to have entirely fled. The features are no longer pleasing to contemplate. The world wishes to look elsewhere; it breaks the mirror and turns to the picture.—Edinburg Review.

Extraordinary as it may seem, there are actually writers of standing, of success, and even occasionally of talent, who believe in cliques of cruel and ruthless enemies. To many authors, every man who does not praise them, because he does not happen to care for their performances, is a personal foe, animated by some bitter motive. If these unlucky, credulous authors would ask themselves why So-and-so should hate them they might begin to see their own fallacy. Probably the critic and author seldom meet, have never had any cause of quarrel; yet, because Brown does not care for Jones's poems or novels, Jones avers that Brown is his private foe. Unluckily, it is true that some men and some reviewers hate all success of every sort. It seems odd that they should do so, as they have no right to be jealous. They must know that success is so utterly out of their own reach that they might as well detest the queen for owning the unlucky Koh-i-noor as hate Jones for writing a popular book. However, this viperous kind of human being exists. It was said of Samuel Rogers that he was jealous of the triumph of a pretty girl, to which, of course, he could never have aspired. There are also press-men of this temper. But the author who believes in hostile cliques holds that every mortal who cannot praise him belongs to a clique banded for his ruin.—Andrew Lang.

Professional Chat.

That's a great discovery of Dr. Sleich, in Berlin, that water can be used as an anæsthetic; but for the general purposes of voluntary paralysis beer will hold its own in the German capital and elsewhere.

A Church of England clergyman was recently asked why he engaged in outside work. "To increase my starving," was the odd reply, which he explained by saying that he called an income of £95 a year a "starving" rather than a "living."

A clergyman was asked to solve the following puzzle: If all the children that King Herod killed were buried in such a manner that only their arms from the elbow to the tips of their fingers were visible above the ground, how could you distinguish the arms of the boys from those of the girls? The reverend gentleman worked at it faithfully, but was obliged to give it up. "For shame, doctor," cried the interrogator. "The idea that you should forget that the children that Herod killed were all boys."

"Diseases become fashionable just like styles of dresses," says a physician. Look, for instance, at the remarkable run that malaria has made. About two dozen distinct ailments, not one of which is due to bad air (malaria), now go by that name. Even the physicians humor many of their patients by using the word when they know that something else is the matter. Then take heart failure. A few years ago there was no such thing as heart failure. There is no such thing now outside the newspapers. Or rather, to speak more accurately, every death is due to heart failure; that is, to the inability of the heart to work any longer.

Chicago's favorite pulpit orator, Dr. Gunsaulus, has just returned from a trip to England and has been giving a reporter his impressions thereof. He heard Gladstone speak, and was impressed with his lofty and impassioned eloquence. Then he heard the Grand Old Man read the lessons of the day when his son preached at Hawarden church. According to Dr. Gunsaulus, Salisbury is the British nation's favorite statesman. He is a typical John Bull, and has a way of constantly flattering the public. Like Sir Robert Peel, he knows the value of being able to state on Monday night what the British people will be sure to think on Tuesday morning.

Ex-Gov. Furnas, of Omaha, tells a story on Judge Broady which, coming from anyone else, might demand some corroborative evidence. Gov. Furnas's story is, that on one occasion Judge Broady left his office and on the outer door posted a card with the words: "Back again in ten minutes. Take a seat and wait." "At the foot of the stairs," says Gov. Furnas, "Judge Broady happened to remember that he had forgotten something. Slowly he climbed the steps and once more he became submerged in his own thoughts. At the door of his own office he paused and read the card on the door. Then the judge deliberately sat down and waited for himself to come back."

An eminent Lord Chief Justice who was trying a right of way case had before him a witness, an old farmer, who was proceeding to tell the jury that he had "known the path for sixty year, and my fether told I as he heered my grandfether say—" "Stop!" said the judge. "We can't have any hearsay evidence here?" "Not?" exclaimed farmer Giles. "Then how dost know who thy feyther was 'cept by hearsay?" After the laughter had subsided the judge said: "In courts of law we can only be guided with what you have seen with your eyes, and nothing more nor less." "Oh, that be blowed for a tale!" replied the farmer. "I ha' got a bile on the back of my neck, and I never seed 'un, but I be prepared to swear that he's there, dang 'un!" This second triumph on the part of the witness let in a torrent of hearsay evidence about the footpath which obtained weight with the jury, albeit the judge told them it was not testimony of any value, and the farmer's party won.

Red Haired Girls and White Horses.

The popular jest about the necessary contiguity of red headed girls and white horses is by no means modern, though in its recent revival it has swept over the country as a novelty. Some of us remember that our grandfathers used jocularly to assert it to the wondering ears of youth as a well settled fact. In all likelihood the saying took its origin in the old English game called sometimes the "game of the road," but more often "ups and downs," which is still a favorite among the children and traveling salesmen in Great Britain. One party takes the "up" side of the street or road, and the other the "down," counting one for every ordinary object, and five for a white horse (a piebald counting as white), until a certain number agreed upon carries off the victory, but a red headed woman or a donkey wins the game at once. Another explanation refers the phrase to a North of Ireland superstition that the sight of a red headed girl brings ill luck to the beholder unless he retrace his steps to the starting point; but if he sees a white horse at any point on his backward progress the spell is ipso facto averted. In the midland counties of England on the other hand, it is ill luck to meet a white horse without spitting at it. In Wexford an odd cure for whooping cough is suggested by current superstition. The patient trudges along the road until he meets a piebald horse, and shouts out to the rider, "Hello, man on the piebald horse, what is good for the whooping cough?" and no matter how absurd the remedy suggested he will certainly be cured. In Scotland to dream of a white horse foretells the coming of a letter. The prejudice against red hair is as widespread and deep rooted as it is unaccountable. Tradition assigns reddish hair to both Absalom and Judas. Thus Rosalind (complaining of her husband's tardiness) pettishly exclaims: "His own hair is of dissembling color!" and is answered by Celia: "Somewhat browner than Judas." Marston, also, in his "Insatiate Countess," says: "I ever thought by his red beard he would prove a Judas; here am I bought and sold." Leonardo de Vinci, it may be noted in passing, paints Judas with black hair in fresco, "The Last Judgment."—Notes and Queries.

The horse is involved in the most ancient superstitions of the people of Arabia. They believe him to be endowed with a nature superior, not in degree only, but in kind, to that of all other animals, and to have been framed by the Almighty with a special regard to the convenience of man. One of the oldest proverbs tells them that the horse is the most eminent of dumb brutes, and that the most meritorious of domestic actions is that of feeding him. Mohamet himself inculcated a lesson of kindness to the horse when he said: "As many grains of barley as are contained in the food we give a horse, so many indulgences do we daily gain by giving it." The belief is widespread in the East that all pure Arabian horses are descended from Mohamet's five favorite mares, upon one of which the prophet fled from Mecca to Medina.

NOTES.

This is a great country. It can feed the whole world and still give its own meat three times a day and bread and butter between meals.

There are 1,000 women to every 949 men in England. Yet the Englishmen will insist on marrying American girls, and so continuing the disproportion.

There are some people who are so set in their ideas—if they can be called ideas—that unless you are constantly praising them you are denounced as their personal enemy. Even the charity of silence is not accepted with gratitude; it must be praise or open war.

Congressman McKenna has waited upon President Harrison in behalf of Judge W. C. Van Fleet for the United States District Judgeship, and Hon. W. W. Morrow for Circuit Judge. It is a certainty that both gentlemen will be appointed for the respective judgeships.

The modest little Scotch girl who astounded the sixteen hundred male students at the University of London by carrying off the honors of entrance is named Charlotte Higgins. It was her widowed mother gave her the education needed to encompass her brilliant ambition. Miss Higgins is twenty years old, but does not look it.

Judge Pruden, of Ohio, who has been making an extended tour of Alaska, says that he thinks the natives of that land are of Chinese or Japanese rather than of Indian descent. They have many of the pronounced mental characteristics of the Mongolian race, while they bear absolutely no resemblance to the typical Western Indian.

It is a serious matter in Armenia should a maiden attain her seventeenth year with no prospect of marriage, for so surely as the festival of St. Sergius comes round she is obliged to fast three days and then eat salted fish, without the right to quench her thirst unless some kind swain be found who will promise to take her and be her "master."

The free schools of England must be made like our own—not only free to scholars, but free from any kind of sectarian control. And the Church of England will be wise in its generation if it recognizes that fact and yields to it gracefully. If not, sooner or later it must yield under compulsion, and its resistance may only hasten its own disestablishment.

When some men are, by the grace of the Police Commissioners, permitted to wear a star they think their authority is unlimited and that they can remove tenants without further process, break open houses at their mere pleasure, arrest men and throw them in prison at mere caprice. Some day there will be a funeral of an officer, and then, perhaps, they will take heed of the rights of citizens.

The Chinese have no straight streets or walls. The reason for this peculiarity is that they believe that the devil always travels in a straight line. This theory is not consistent with his plutonic majesty's general character—he is always pictured as rather a crooked fellow, and his work is anything but straight. The devil often goes on the byways to secure his victims, over amid the labyrinth of the churches and cathedrals.

We have been taught that the world is a pretty good place to live in; that it is not the intention of the Being who made it that we shall have rheumatism and gout, malaria and typhoid, but that we shall live long and be happy; that the laws which govern us are so arranged that if our lives are in accord with them we remain strong and healthy, but if we disregard them we suffer severe consequences for which we alone are to blame; that when a man has the seeds of consumption or of any other disease, either he or his ancestors have broken in on the law of nature.

We have a strong suspicion that two-thirds of the reported robberies are pure fictions. The pretended victims either get drunk and lose their money while in this condition or make vigorous attacks on the tiger in his lair and get worsted. Not wishing to give the true facts, invent the robbery stories for the purpose of clearing themselves to their families or friends. There is no doubt that pickpockets and petty thieves abound during fair time, but the bold reckless robberies reported are not in accord with reason or common sense. Sneak thieves and petty burglars are plentiful, and have perpetrated a number of thefts.

Why do women get married after remaining single till they have passed their forty-fifth birthday? If it be true, as Cicero said, that men in advanced life should forswear love as they would a savage and fatal monster, it is even more certain that the attempt to gather roses amid the chills of autumn must end in disappointment for women. Alas! the leaves of those belated blossoms fall at a touch, though they look never so fair and full of sweetness before they be grasped. Married life, with its give and take, its bear and forbear, its daily self-restraint and mutual consideration, is a state to which one needs to be broken in early.

From the late census returns on church statistics we learn the following concerning the Roman Catholic Church in America: The Roman Catholic was the first Christian worship established in the territory now constituting the United States. As early as 1512, only twenty years after the discovery of America by Columbus, Spanish priests began a mission tour in Florida and the Mississippi valley. In the same century the native tribes of the Rio Grande, in the territory now known as New Mexico, were converted by Spanish priests from Mexico. The Catholic population in the archdiocese of Santa Fe is therefore said to be the oldest body of Catholics in the United States. French priests established a mission on Mount Desert island, off the coast of Maine, in 1612, and there were other beginnings in different parts of the country. The first Catholic see erected was that of Baltimore, which dates from 1789. In 1808 it was constituted an archdiocese. There are now thirteen provinces, the metropolitan sees being those of Baltimore, Oregon, St. Louis, New Orleans, Cincinnati, New York, San Francisco, Santa Fe, Philadelphia, Milwaukee, Boston, Chicago and St. Paul, which were created in the order named. Connected with these provinces are 66 dioceses, 5 vicariates apostolic and 11 prefecture apostolic.

Steam Printing.

It is remarkable that the steam engine was not called to the aid of the printing press sooner than it was; but it had long been used in many of the industrial arts before it became the handmaid to "the art preservative of all arts." The first printing by steam was on the issue of the London Times for November 29, 1814. The improved hand presses of that day could only strike off from two to three hundred impressions an hour, with one man to ink the types and another to work the press. At that rate a very large edition of a daily paper was simply impossible, for one day's work could not be completed before the next day's must begin. The Times then printed from three to four thousand copies daily, and Mr. John Walter, the proprietor (the second of that name), began as early as 1804 to consider whether the work might not be expedited in some way. In that year, Thomas Martyn, a compositor in the Times office, got up a model of a self-acting machine for working the press, and Walter furnished the money for the continuance of his experiments. As usual in the early history of labor saving machinery, this attempt met with bitter opposition from the workmen, who supposed their craft was in danger. Martyn was in fear of his life because of the threats of the pressmen, and partly on that account, and partly because Walter had small capital at the time, the scheme was given up. As soon, however, as König's printing machine was invented, in 1813, Walter consented that it should be tried on the Times; but for fear of the workmen the experiment was made, not in the regular printing office of the paper, but in an adjoining building. Here, König and his assistant, Bauer, worked secretly for several months, testing and perfecting the machine. On the 29th of November everything was ready for actual work on the paper, and the result is thus told in a biographical sketch of Mr. Walter, which appeared in the Times in July, 1847:

"The night on which the curious machine was first brought into use in its new abode was one of great anxiety and even alarm. The suspicious pressmen had threatened destruction to any one whose inventions might suspend their employment, 'destruction to him and traps.' They were directed to wait for expected news from the Continent. It was about six o'clock in the morning when Mr. Walter went into the press-room and astonished the occupants by telling them that the Times was already printed by steam; that if they attempted violence there was a force ready to suppress it; but if they were peaceable their wages should be continued to every one of them until similar employment could be procured. The promise was no doubt faithfully performed; and having so said he distributed several copies among them. Thus was this most hazardous enterprise undertaken and successfully carried through, and printing by steam, on a gigantic scale, given to the world."

A profound and inextinguishable melancholy afflicts the funny man. Some attribute to the remorse at the fossil and fraudulent jokes he occasionally foists on a confiding public; others are of opinion that he thinks his true sphere tragedy, and revolts at being a mere literary clown. But neither supposition is correct. The funny man is a man of infinite compassion. He sorrows for those who are compelled to read his productions. He rises up with a pun and comes down with a pang. He sledge-hammers together a witticism, and when it is laughed at goes off into a corner and gives himself up to grief. Philanthropy, not facetiousness, is the funny man's strong point.—World.

Animals Domesticated.

These have been extremely few. It is a very long time since the horse walked on five toes through the spongy soil of rain-soaked primitive earth. The change from five toes to one toe, that the horse now walks on, has necessarily taken place since not only hard, dry ground constituted wide regions, but became fixed as the permanent condition of the animal's existence. With the change from five toes to one on the fore feet, and from three to one on the hind feet, the instinct of the horse has also changed. Now he prefers open fields and wide plains, if possible, where at once his sight and swiftness may be available. It must have been at some period previous to the complete change that the horse first became the companion of man. At no time within the reach of history has the horse been any other, in form or habits, than he is now. Solomon's horses were famous for beauty and swiftness. The Arab horse seems to be as ancient as the Arabs themselves. There is no indication whatever that civilized man has made the addition of this splendid animal to domestic life. In fact, every analogy would sustain the principle that it was wild man, who lived among other creatures almost as one of themselves, and of whom other animals had not acquired any fear, who became so much the companion of four-footed creatures as to be able to identify them with himself. As men have progressed they have moved further away from wild creatures and have exhibited less capacity to associate with them as friends. The camel has been in captivity since long before the dawn of history. No wild individual of these species has ever been heard of. Yet the camel must have been wild at one time. A few wild asses still roam over the wastes of the orient, but civilized man possesses no skill whatever to domesticate them. The zebra is a beautiful creature, and might be made extremely useful, but hitherto he has baffled all attempts to make him a member of modern society. A few, within very recent years, have been taken and broken to harness, but not one has yet been domesticated. Hogs seem to have become associated with men when the latter were wild and lived in caves and such places. Then the man and the hog were not so far removed in domicile as they are. The llama cannot be shown to be an exception. Whether this wild creature became the servant of the primitive natives of Peru, or of the invaders, by direct subjugation is not known. No quadruped of any kind can be proved to have been taken from the wild state by man since the era of civilization. The present Earl of Derby's grandfather at his death presented a herd of llamas to Queen Victoria. These ponderous antelopes larger and heavier than our modern, average ox, have hitherto resisted the utmost efforts for their domestication. They are mere captives. The red deer must have the range of the mountains. Place him in even the most spacious park and he's only a prisoner. He does not multiply. The domestication of wild animals seems to be another of the lost arts.

The only creatures that seems to have accepted a permanent condition of servitude and to multiply in it are a few birds. The turkey is a native of America. It has become known to Europe only since the beginning of the sixteenth century. Its origin being unknown, it was baptized by the most foreign title then generally accepted. It was supposed to come from Turkey and this utterly inappropriate name has been fastened on the splendid bird ever since. The Turks generally know nothing whatever of the turkey. The guinea fowl has been domesticated within a very recent time. The pea fowl, still wild in the forests of South India, and, as in the case of the turkey, a much smaller bird generally when free than when tame, has been known in Palestine since the days of Solomon, where with Abyssinian monkeys, it was imported as a curiosity. But the pea fowl is the deadly enemy of the turkey poult to this day, and will viciously peck the latter in the eyes at every opportunity. He thus, so far, refuses to consider himself a full member of our barnyard life, and retains a large share of his wild disposition. The same remarks apply to the wild sheep and goat. These creatures were first tamed by men almost as wild as themselves; men whose habits and outdoor life enabled the creatures of the forest and mountain with slow step to adapt themselves to the restraints of domestication. The ostrich is now under process of training—but only its native soil and climate are suited to its constitution. Wild, vigorous exercise and the sense of freedom and security combined secure the conditions of the propagation of any wild species of quadruped.

Something that you must not forget: If you have your mind made up to buy a Mathusek upright piano do not be induced to change your mind by false representations of parties offering new, cheap, showy and trashy pianos, which will be worthless in this climate in a very short time. Mathusek sold twenty years ago are as good as ever, and, tuned properly ever few years, sound as well as the day they left the factory. See the new improved ones at Cooper's.

Almost a Tragedy.

A negro, about twenty years of age, sat in the sun, with his back to the freight shed, on an Alabama railroad. He was sound asleep, when another young man of his color drove up to the platform with an old horse and wagon. The newcomer saw a chance for sport, and he used his whip to "nip" the other until he finally awoke and demanded:

"Who dat pusson who kept tetchin' me all de time?"

"I spects yo' am lookin' right at him, sah," replied the one with the whip.

"Julius, Ize a mind to broke yo' in two fur dat!"

"Shoo! Yo' couldn't hurt nobody!"

"Couldn't, eh? I let yo' knock, sah, dat I killed a man ober in Opelika so dead he nebber breathed agin!"

"Doan' yo' go fur to threaten me, Moses, kase I won't stand it! Mebbe some of yo'r friends dun tole yo' 'bout de way I knocked dat man to pieces down at Greenville! Jist reached out fur him an' he died!"

"Hu! Look out for me, boy! Ize gittin' mad, an' when de madness comes nobody can't dun hold me! Ize jist a drove of mews runnin' away, I ar'!"

"Ize heard niggers talk afo' dis, but I didn't skeer!"

"Nigger! Who yo' callin' nigger? Yo' is nigger yo'self, an' yo' stole hogs!"

"What! Yo' sav I dun stole hogs! Why, boy, I'll crack yo' ribs in a minute! I doan' 'low no common trash to talk dat way to me!"

"Shoo! Nigger; if I war jist to reach out my han' yo' would fall dead! Ize sorry fur yo' pore ole mudder, an' dat's why I doan' reach."

"Now Ize mad! I'll gib yo' jist one unit to flee fur yo' life!"

"So's I mad!"

"Nigger!"

"Hog thief!"

The stood facing each other and breathing hard, when an old stray mule turned the corner. It was a diversion.

"Julus, an' dat Kurnel Baxter's mewl?" asked one.

"Reckon 'tis, Moses," replied the other.

"Den we'd better kotch him an' see if de Kurnel won't gib us two bits fur our trouble."

Two minutes later they were wa king down the road arm-in-arm, with the old mule following behind. M. QUAD.

Foreign Echo.

In the course of last summer some strangers of distinction were induced to visit a wild and unfrequented retreat in a distant part of the Highlands, chiefly from the report they heard of an echo which was remarkable for the clear and distinct nature of its reverberation.

On reaching the spot whence the trial of its powers is usually made their guide put his hands to the side of his mouth and bawled out with the lungs of a Stentor a salutation in Gaelic, which was repeated with a precision that seemed beyond the expectations of the party.

One of the gentlemen, by way of trying the strength of his voice, put his hand to the side of his mouth in the same manner as his guide and called out:

"How far are we from home?"

These words, much to the surprise of their guide, were also repeated, when poor Donald, with a simplicity which brought a smile over the faces of all present, exclaimed:

"You may think it strange, gentlemen, but this is the first time I ever heard our echo speak English."

"I have no doubt," said the gentlemen, "but it can repeat other languages if you put it to the test," and instantly bawled out some brief questions in French, Spanish and Italian.

Donald looked more dazed than ever. "Well, I must say that's very queer. My own father and my own self have known that echo for more than seventy years, and we never knew it use any language but Gaelic before."

"Your echo is more learned, then, than you supposed?" said the gentleman, laughing, though at a loss whether to impute Donald's remarks to archness or simplicity.

"You may say that, sir," said the poor fellow, with an expression of earnestness that was highly amusing to those present, "but as the echo has never been out of the country, where can she have got all her education?"

Lake Urmiah, in Persia, 4,100 feet above the sea, is, according to British Consul-General Stewart, of Tabris, the saltiest body of water on earth, being saltier than the dead sea. It is eighty-seven miles long and twenty-four miles broad, and contains nearly twenty-two per cent of salt. Its northern coasts are incrustated with a border of salt glistening white in the sun. It is said no living thing can survive in it, but a small species of jelly-fish manages to maintain an existence in its waters.

Only a foolish man will pay compliments to a pretty girl. The wise man will pay his compliments to the homely girl, who will appreciate them the more because she isn't so used to them, and who will reward him an hundred-fold.

FLASHES.

Most women's love is about one third jealousy.

It is not wise to waste an argument on a jackass.

A flannel shirt is like a child—it shrinks from washing.

When we bury animosity there should be no headstone.

The bad man still seems to prosper, while the good man scarcely keeps his own.

A crowded street car gives some of the phases of humanity—or rather the lack of it.

Judges in criminal courts should be good grammarians, they can parse a sentence so easily.

We always have a strong suspicion of the woman who thinks herself a fly, and man a spider.

Some people when they take a rest seem to think that it is something that does not belong to them.

If one desires to get a glimpse of varied human nature, let him take a view of the people on the racetrack when there is a crowd.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Grismer-Davis Company have done a splendid business during the week. This is a just tribute to an excellent company. To-night Fern Cliff will be given at the Metropolitan. A matinee will also be given this afternoon, with Fern Cliff as the attraction.

The Parlor Match still continues to draw big houses at the Clunie. To-night will be the last appearance of that splendid combination.

What We Say and What They Say.

American.	English.
Telegram.	Wire.
Ticket office.	Booking office.
Buying a ticket.	Booking.
Railroad.	Railway.
Railroad track.	Permanent way.
Rails.	Metals.
Depot.	Station.
Switch.	Points.
Street car.	Tram car.
Freight train.	Goods train.
Cars.	Carriages.
Conductor.	Guard.
Engineer.	Driver.
Fireman.	Stoker.
Locomotive.	Engine.
Baggage.	Luggage.
All aboard.	Seats, please.
Matches.	Lights.
Beer.	Ale.
Switching cars.	Drilling cars.
Trains meeting.	Trains crossing.
Freight car.	Goods van.
Parquet.	Pit.

Frank Leslie's Newspaper.

Eyes of Different People.

Eyes have always been regarded as a sure tribal characteristic. Tacitus, for example, describes the Germans as "fierce, with blue eyes and red hair." The Celts are mentioned as being swarthy skinned and black eyed; the Gauls are red haired and light eyed, while the Nubians, the Turks, the Egyptians and the Italians have always been spoken of as "the dark eyed races." These peculiarities have not changed. Even to-day the people of the temperate zones have generally light colored eyes, while those of the torrid and frigid zones are usually dark, or even black. Of the races in particular, the only one that can be said to be "light eyed" is the Caucasian, and even in this race the eyes are by no means uniform in point of color.

The whole period of human history goes to prove that the light haired, blue eyes races are capable of the highest degree of civilization, but it does not by any means follow that the highest degree of civilization is confined to people of blonde complexion. There was a time when a blue eyed person was rarely seen, and to-day seven-eighths of the world's inhabitants have dark eyes. Lavater, when discussing the eye as a feature in national physiognomy, gave the following as the results of his observations: "The Italians have small eyes; the Germans, light colored eyes surrounded by many wrinkles; the English, strong, open, steady eyes; and the Swiss, eyes that are very dull looking.—St. Louis Republic."

Harrison has been caricatured and ridiculed by not only the opposition press but by some of his own party. Let me ask you a question: Can a man be such an infant as the papers seek to make him out, when, as a poor man, he reached the United States Senate? Can he be such a fool when he has shown that he can write and deliver a dozen addresses a day, all different, all witty, and all virtually done on the spur of the moment?—N. Y. World.

Dodson—They say poor Briggs, the teetotaler, died of hard drink. Bings—You astonish me! How did he acquire the habit? Dodson—It was very sudden. A cake of ice fell on him.

Hold the Fort.

The story upon which P. P. Bliss founded his famous song, "Hold the Fort," as told by the evangelist, Major D. W. Whittle, is as follows: "During October, 1864, just before General Sherman commenced his famous march to the sea, while his army was camped in the neighborhood of Atlanta, the army of Hood, in a carefully prepared movement passed the right flank of Sherman's army, and, gaining his rear, began the destruction of the railroad leading north, burning block houses and capturing small garrisons along the line. Sherman's army was put in rapid motion following Hood to save the supplies and larger posts, the principal of which was located at Altoona Pass, a defile in the Altoona range of mountains through which ran the railroad. General Corse, of Illinois, was stationed there with a brigade of troops composed of Minnesota and Illinois regiments, in all about 1,500 men. Colonel Tourtelotte was second in command. A million and a half of rations were stored there, and it was highly important that the earthworks commanding the pass and protecting the supplies should be held. General French, with 6,000 men, was detailed by Hood to capture that position. The works were completely surrounded and summoned to surrender. Corse refused and sharp fighting commenced. The defenders were slowly driven into a small fort upon the crest of the hill. Many had fallen, and the result seemed to render a prolongation of the fight hopeless. At that moment an officer caught sight of a white signal flag far away, away across the valley, fifteen miles distant, upon the top of Keneshaw mountain. The signal was answered, and soon a message was waved across from mountain to mountain: 'Hold the fort; I am coming.—W. T. Sherman.' Cheers went up; every man was nerved to the full appreciation of the position, and, under a murderous fire, which killed or wounded more than half the men in the fort—Corse himself being badly wounded three times in the head, Tourtelotte taking the command, though also wounded—they held the fort three hours, until the advance guard of Sherman's army came up, and the rebel forces under French were obliged to retreat."

"The Little Church Around the Corner."

From time to time in recent years the statement has appeared that the clergyman who had refused to officiate at the funeral services of the dead actor had been treated harshly and unjustly. The facts are peculiarly interesting, and a reporter asked Mr. E. Holland a day or two ago what he knew personally of the affair. Mr. Holland said: "When father died, Mr. Joseph Jefferson, who was a life-long friend of the family, called at our house and at once took charge of the arrangements for the funeral. He asked what clergyman we desired, and as my sister Katie had attended Sunday school at the Rev. Dr. Sabine's church and other relatives were members of the congregation, we naturally mentioned him. I accompanied Mr. Jefferson to the clergyman's house and he cheerfully consented to officiate. Mr. Jefferson, having in mind father's great circle of friends and acquaintances, thought it best to inform the clergyman that the funeral would be unusually large, and said, 'You know that Mr. Holland was a comedian.' Mr. Sabine quickly and bluntly replied, 'Oh, I could never condescend to officiate for a professional—an actor. You had better go to the little church around the corner.' You can doubtless imagine my feelings, but Mr. Jefferson quickly restrained me. The newspapers took up the affair and the rest is a familiar history."

The formal name of "the little church" is the church of the transfiguration, and the Rev. Dr. Houghton, who performed the ceremony at Mr. Holland's funeral, is still the esteemed and venerable pastor. His broad and liberal principles made the fortune and fame of his church. The incident narrated made it the best known church in America and attracted a vast number of people who had never before heard of it. Theatrical people have a regard for it that is stronger than mere affection, and number very largely in the list of pewholders. There take place the weddings and funerals and all such ceremonies that the members of the stage may stand in need of. To them and in the history of the drama it will always be "the little church round the corner."

Threads of Thought.

Life is double-faced and double-edged.

To know one's self is to distrust one's self.

Each life may have a potentiality of greatness.

To be misunderstood by those we love is bitterest of all.

Find a disinterested friend and you have found a jewel.

The greatest study of all is that of the changes of the mind.

Success has sometimes to be paid for, after having been fairly earned.

One is led to think that there is but little that is constant nowadays save mutability.—Detroit Free Press.

MISCELLANY.

"It was very mortifying," said the doctor. "I made a sad error of judgment and the man died." "What did his family say?" "Oh, they were very grateful for what I had done. He was very rich."

A Missouri girl hiccupped fourteen hours a day for nearly a month, and now we read of a Pennsylvania maiden sneezing five days almost continually. Not much chance there for a lover to get his question in!

An oak log that was recently sawed in Henry Maley's mill, near Franklin, Ind., had a hollow in which 127 black snakes had nested. The largest is said to have measured seventy-eight inches in length.

A lad at Annapolis was lying on a lounge reading a novel, when a bullet, fired a quarter of a mile away, came through a door, fell upon his chest and slipped down into his vest pocket, where he found it half an hour later. He thought his brother had hit him with a spool.

Wagg—We had a terrible thunder storm as I came up in the train this afternoon. Wooden—Weren't you afraid of the lightning? Wagg—No; I got behind a brakeman. Wooden—Behind a brakeman? What earthly good did that do? Wagg—Why, he was not a conductor.

The natives of Alaska have learned to manufacture for themselves a fiery alcoholic liquor called "bootcha." It is evidently more deadly than Jersey lightning, for it has not only checked the natural increase of the Indians and Esquimaux, but has reduced their numbers since the last census by 8,000, or about one-fourth the native population in 1880. There is a promising field here for the temperance agitators, and one in which they might glean enough of shocking examples to make an impression on hardened cases within the era of culture and civilization.

Fathers who wink at their boys' indiscretions, as they call them, should always remember that they entail somebody's downfall, that some mother, brother, father or husband is being made unhappy by the giving full sway to his liberty and evil passions. Unless sons' morals and associates and goings and comings are as carefully looked after as those of the daughters, we cannot expect them to be different from what they are now, and true statistics of events and happenings must teach us that our daughters need to be chaperoned; for the most pure, the most innocent, is invariably the one falling an easy victim to some masquerade's wiles.

Every man who has a parrot is always telling what a wonderful bird his is. A lawyer in New York owns one of these "talking devils." A friend went home with him to dinner recently and when the two men were approaching the house the lawyer said: "My parrot can recognize my footstep as soon as it falls in the hall. When I open my door he always cries out from a back room, 'Hello, Will; come in here.' Now," added the lawyer as he slipped his key into the latch, "just listen." They listened and this is what they heard: "Hello, Will, you old bald-headed fool; come in here." The lawyer for one minute looked as if a house had fallen on him. And it was all the fault of one of his brothers, who had heard the lawyer boast so often of his parrot that he taught the bird to insert the "bald-headed" part. Now he can't be broken of the habit.

Every time we strike a match we are indebted to the men who have studied science for the mere love of it. The men who worked away at coal tar "just to see what was in it" made the whole world their debtors by discovering alizarin, the coloring principle of madder. And to those men the world is indebted also for aniline, antipyrine and more than 100 other coal tar products. Scientists, wondering what was in crude petroleum, found paraffine and vaseline. Pasteur wondered what caused fermentation. He found out and brought a new era to wine making. The singing and dancing of the tea-kettle attracted the attention of a brain, and we have as a consequence all the applications of steam. The swinging of a chandelier in an Italian cathedral before the eyes of young Galileo was the beginning of a train of thought that resulted in the invention of the pendulum, and through it to the perfecting of the measurement of time, and thus its application and use in navigation, astronomic observations and in a thousand ways we now pass by unnoted, has been of such practical value that the debt to scientific thought, even in this one instance, can never be known. Science, in its study of abstract truth, is ever giving to man new beginnings. While the devil is engaged in finding mischief for idle hands to do, science is eternally at work finding something useful for them to do.

The title of our most popular drink comes from Mexico. The Aztec word for pulque is pronounced much like ocal, and General Scott's troops called the liquor cocktail and carried the word back to the United States. It is said that the liquor was discovered by a Toltec noble, and that he sent it to the king by the hand of his daughter, Miss Cocktail (Xochiti). The king drank the liquor and then looked at the maiden. The first tickled his palate, the second enamored his heart. It was a case of love at first sight in both instances, and he married the girl and started a pulque plantation. From that day to this the Mexicans have kept themselves saturated with pulque, and Miss Cocktail is one of the Venuses of Mexican tradition. Mexican brandies are very strong. There is one called aguardiente, which is made from sugar cane, and which is as strong as it is cheap. I had a sore throat and was advised to bathe my neck in the brandy. I found that it made the skin smart, and concluded to see how much alcohol there was in it. It exploded like coal oil and blazed away for ten minutes. Two million dollars' worth of this brandy is made in Mexico every year. Mexicans have some good wines, but they are very dear, and an ordinary claret costs a dollar a bottle.

Can You Read This Rhyme?

The celebrated Dr. Whewell, who was called at Cambridge "Billy Whistle," because it was so much easier to whistle his name than to pronounce it, wrote a very ingenious rhyme of cyphers in a young lady's album, which has puzzled old heads, but nevertheless is not beyond the ability of a thoughtful boy to unravel. It is short, and may be given here:

U o a o, but I o U;
O o no o, but O o me;
O let not my o a o go,
But give o o, I o U so.

Which, being deciphered, is this:

You sigh for a cipher, but I sigh for you;
O sigh for no cipher, but O sigh for me;
O let not my sigh for a cipher go,
But give sigh for sigh, for I sigh for you so.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO, State of California.—In the matter of the Columbus Brewing Company, a corporation, an insolvent debtor. An adjudication of insolvency herein having been duly made, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the 23d day of October, 1891, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., at the court-room of this Court, in Department No. 1, in the city of Sacramento, be and the same are the time and place appointed for the meeting of the creditors to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the city of Sacramento, at least once a week during the period prior to the time appointed for the meeting of creditors.

A. P. CATLIN,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated this 17th day of September, 1891.
A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Attorneys for Petitioners.

DON'T BE CARELESS ABOUT YOUR COMPLEXION

It is woman's chiefest physical charm. It is often her only capital. It is always worth a great deal to her in business, love or social affairs. No matter how browned, or rough or sallow your skin may be, or how much it is disfigured with freckles, moth-patches, blackheads or pimples will remove every blemish and leave your skin as pure and clear and white as it was in baby days. Your complexion will then be as nature made it. Instructions go with each bottle how to keep it so. Price $1.50. All druggists sell it.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

Fine Table Wines
From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

A Temperance Lecture.

Dr. Cyrus Edson thus sums up the evil effects of the abuse of alcohol, and closes his essay with an adaptation of the alphabet:

The persistent abuse of alcohol affects the human system in a variety of ways. Changes of structure of various tissues result. These changes, as has already been said, are of a degenerative nature. They are insidious and progressive, sooner or later declaring themselves. The stomach is inflamed so that the peptic glands and their orifices are almost wholly destroyed. The functions of digestion are no longer properly performed. Ulcers frequently form in the stomach tissues. The appetite for food is at first irregular, then lost. Nausea and vomiting are often symptoms. The various glands of the body are affected; the liver especially so, for reasons obvious to a physician. At first this organ is congested and enlarged. Inflammation may affect it in several ways, or its tissue may undergo fatty degeneration, or it may become contracted, giving rise to an appearance on its surface called "lob-nailed"; also named "gin drinker's liver." The larynx undergoes changes that affect the quality of the voice. The rasping, harsh voice of the drunkard is well known. Chronic inflammation affects the bronchial tubes, often resulting in chronic inflammation of the lungs themselves (fibroid phthisis). Fatty degeneration of the entire muscular system occurs, and in this the muscles of the heart are involved, giving rise to the well-known "fatty heart." The blood vessel undergo a change that renders them brittle and liable to rupture. The blood itself is affected. Degenerative changes occur in it that are little understood as yet by physicians. Suffice it to say that the blood is rendered less alkaline than normally, and that its fluidity is altered. It shows a tendency to exude through the walls of its vessels. The scavengers of the blood, the phagocytes, are not so active or so easily produced in the blood of drunkards. The kidneys are affected like the liver. Bright believed—and his views are generally accepted—that the kidney disease named after him was frequently caused by over-indulgence in drink.

But by far the most important changes wrought by alcohol in the system are those of the brain. The circulation of this organ is at first impaired. The blood vessels, large and small, are dilated. Often the brittle condition of the arteries mentioned before supervenes, and small hemorrhages into the brain-coverings are likely to take place. Usually the size of the brain undergoes no change. Sometimes its consistency is greater. It is more dense, harder. In very advanced cases areas of the brain soften. This is due to the advanced derangement of the blood-vessels supplying the softened parts with nourishment. Other changes take place in the brain that are not yet noticed. To these are due the altered perceptive senses. The special senses are affected in a variety of ways. The general sensibility is destroyed. Nervous phenomena manifest themselves. Insomnia is the rule. If sleep is obtained, it is disturbed by distressing dreams. Loss of muscular power may be so complete that palsy or paralysis occurs. Neuralgias are common. The naturally weak will is still more enfeebled. The sense of shame is lost; this is especially the case in women. Memory fails. Acute attacks of delirium, marked by hallucination and delusion, are frequent. The final termination is death or insanity. The latter may take the form of melancholia, mania, chronic delirium, dementia or general paresis.

A stands for Alcohol, death-like its grip;
B for Beginner, who takes just a sip;
C for Companion who urges him on;
D for the Demon of drink that is born;
E for Endeavor he makes to resist;
F stands for Friends, who so loudly insist;
G for the Guilt that he afterwards feels;
H for the Horrors that hang at his heels;
I his Intention to drink not at all;
J stands for Jeering that follows his fall;
K for his Knowledge that he is a slave.
L stands for the Liquors his appetite craves;
M for convivial Meetings so gay.
N stands for No that he tries hard to say;
O for the Orgies that then come to pass.
P stands for Pride that he drowns in his glass;
Q for the Quarrels that nightly abound.
R stands for Ruin, that hovers around.
S stands for Sights that his vision bedim.
T stands for Trembling that seizes his limbs;
U for his Usefulness sunk in the slums.
V for the Vagrant he quickly becomes;
W for Waning of life that's soon done;
X for his eXit, regarded by none.
YOUTH of this nation, such weakness is crime;
Zealously turn from the tempter in time!

A Spanish officer sent one of his soldiers into the kitchen for a cup of coffee. In a couple of minutes the soldier reappeared carrying the coffee on a tray, and as he handed it to the officer, he remarked: "Captain, I am afraid that you will find this coffee rather cold." How do you know it is cold?" retorted the officer; "have you been drinking out of the cup?" "Oh, no!" replied the soldier, "I'd never think of drinking out of your cup captain; I merely put my finger into it to ascertain whether it was hot enough."

Never Again.

"Never again," vow hearts when reunited,
"Never again shall Love be cast aside;
Forever now the shadow has departed;
Nor bitter sorrow, veiled in scornful pride,
Shall feign indifference or affect disdain—
Never, O Love, again, never again!"

"Never again!" so sobs in broken accents,
A soul laid prostrate at a holy shrine—
"Once more, once more forgive, O Lord, and pardon,
My wayward life shall bend to love divine;
And never more shall sin its whiteness stain—
Never, O God, again, never again!"

"Never again!" so speaketh one forsaken,
In the blank desolate passion of despair—
"Never again shall the bright dream I cherished
Delude my heart, for bitter truth is there—
The angel, Hope, shall still thy cruel pain;
Never again, my heart, never again!"

"Never again!" so speaks the sudden silence,
When round the hearth gathers each well-known face,
But one is missing, and no future presence,
However dear, can fill that vacant place;
Forever shall that burning thought remain—
"Never, beloved, again! never again!"

"Never again!" so—but beyond our hearing—
Ring out far voices fading up the sky;
Never again shall earthly care and sorrow
Weigh down the wings that bear those souls on high;

"Listen, O earth, and hear that glorious strain—Never, never again! never again!"

Minister Motley and President Grant.

Mr. Motley had been Minister to Austria, and resigned that post in 1867. When General Grant became President he appointed the historian Minister to Great Britain. It was during his mission in Great Britain that some of the difficulties were pending between that country and the United States relative to the Alabama claims. Reverdy Johnson had been Minister to Great Britain, and had arranged with Lord Clarendon a convention, or treaty, known as the Johnson-Clarendon convention. This was to be submitted to both governments for their approval, amendment or rejection. This convention was not at all satisfactory to the United States, and it was ultimately rejected, and Mr. Johnson retired. Mr. Motley was then appointed. He was instructed to say to the British Government that the United States, in rejecting the convention, abandoned neither its own claims nor those of its citizens, nor the hope of an early, satisfactory and friendly settlement; and to base the cause of grievance against Great Britain not so much upon the issuance of her recognition of the incipient state of war, but upon her conduct under and subsequent to such recognition. Mr. Motley did not represent to Lord Clarendon the hope of an early, satisfactory and friendly settlement. He said that the President recognized the right of a sovereign power to issue proclamations of neutrality between the insurgent portions of a nation and the lawful government, when such insurrection should have gained the necessary magnitude, consistency and extent of organized power and probability of justification by success, but that such measures must always be taken with a full view of the grave responsibilities assumed. Mr. Motley's course in this respect was disapproved by his government. The negotiations were withdrawn from London, and, it appearing by a subsequent dispatch that he had submitted an account of the interview to Lord Clarendon for verification, he was instructed to inform Lord Clarendon that his course had been disapproved. After further negotiations and the exchange of other dispatches, Lord Clarendon died; and it being supposed the new minister might desire to reopen negotiations, Mr. Motley was invited to resign, in order to afford the United States an opportunity to be represented by a minister in harmony with it. Mr. Motley declined to resign and he was removed.

He Got the Seat.

A nice young man got into a tram car a few evenings ago and saw to his delight the only vacant seat was by the side of a young lady acquaintance. He made for that seat with joyous strides and her eyes answered him with joyous looks. But as he got there an elderly party walked up and dropped into the coveted seat. The young man approached more slowly and accosted the young lady.

"How is your brother?" he asked. "Is he able to get out?"

"Oh yes!" she answered.

"Will he be very badly marked?" he continued, and the old gentleman grew suddenly interested.

"Oh, no!" she said, "with the exception of a few marks on his forehead."

"Were you not afraid of taking it?" the young man continued, while the old gentleman broke out in a cold perspiration.

"Not at all," she replied. "I have been vaccinated, you know."

The seat was vacated instantly, the two innocent young hearts beat as half a dozen, and the prattle of "nice talk" strewed that part of the car, while an old gentleman scowled upon them from a distant corner.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND
HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S
High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Guttenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

Take a Ride on the Riverside Road

AND BE SURE AND STOP AT
BILLY GROENVELD'S

Sutterville House

And get a glass of COOL BEER. Or if you want a bottle of CHAMPAGNE Billy has it on hand, or anything else you may wish for in his line.

ALWAYS A FINE LUNCH ON THE COUNTER.
M. T. GROENVELD, Proprietor.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars.
ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park

Cosmopolitan Restaurant,

403 K Street, near Cor. Fourth,

Opposite Mechanics' Store, - - SACRAMENTO.

B PILCOVICH, Proprietor.

The Cheapest and Best House in the City.

Capital Coffee House

J. H. BRUNING, Proprietor.

509 K STREET.

Between Fifth and Sixth, SACRAMENTO.

Fine Coffee, Tea or Milk, { With Pie }
or Cake, } 10 Cents.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

FRED. SCHNEIDER

N. E. CORNER FOURTH AND N STREETS.

Wholesale and Retail Dealer In

FAMILY GROCERIES

PROVISIONS, FLOUR, HAY AND GRAIN,
WINES, LIQUORS, CIGARS
AND TOBACCO.

Our Specialties:

The "H" Brand of Butter and Teas.

TELEPHONE No. 41.

Grubler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

Capital Restaurant,

A. H. ARATT, Proprietor.

MEAL TICKETS, $3 EACH.

321 J STREET,

Between Third and Fourth, SACRAMENTO.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED.

RHODS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

Where He Put His Arm.

He stood outside the gate awhile,
And said "Good night" with lovesick smile,
"Good night," she said. "Good night," once more

He muttered as he'd done before;
And then, lured by some subtle charm,
He came inside and put his arm—

She wore a hat of jaunty shape,
Tied up with some soft clinging crepe,
A truant ribbon from its peak
Strayed down and kissed her dimpled cheek,
The moon was full, the hour was late,
As they stood there beside the gate.

His love, by Cupid's bellows fanned,
Blazed up. He took her little hand
And muttered: "Dear, what is the harm,"
And then he gently put his arm—

She wore a gown of creamy-white,
So filmy that a fairy might
Have spun it in an hour of thrift
And sent it to her as a gift.

The moon reflected: "Three's a crowd,"
And then politely sought a cloud.
With opportunity so near.

His love welled strong and vanished fear;
He smiled away her first alarm,
And then he gently put his arm—

A little bird came round next day
And told us that 'twas just this way:
He put his arm, as thus they stood,
Where it would do the greatest good.

The Story of a Proud Penny.

A penny, having traveled around the world a bit, became very proud and conceited. "I belong to the peerless aristocracy of money," it said to itself and to all who would listen. "There is no one who does not bend the knee to my family; we are sought after by the proudest people on earth, and we rule the world."

One day the penny was talking in this strain to an iron nail; the nail and the penny chanced to rest side by side in a workman's pocket. The man was a carpenter who had been engaged to complete some work upon the balcony of a new house. His wife was busily engaged scrubbing the floors and cleaning the windows of the new house.

"It must be very dull and humiliating to be a nail," said the penny. "You are obliged to occupy such a menial position in life."

"Oh, I do not know about that," answered the nail. "We nails help to hold homes together, and that is a noble mission I am sure; and whatever our niche in life may be, we realize that we belong to the great iron race—we are proud of the stuff we are made of."

"Oh, as for that, you have little to boast about," sneered the penny. "Think of my family—the proudest and greatest on earth. We could buy yours up and pitch you into the sea, if we cared to do so, and the world would go on without you. Men would invent something to take your place. But society could not exist without us."

"But you are a mere nobody in your own family," retorted the nail, becoming angry. "Your gold and silver relations look down upon you—common copper that you are."

"Oh, it is mere spleen which makes you talk like that," replied the penny. "You know very well that it is taking good care of me and treating me well that gives men a chance to possess my grand relatives. Any one who despises me is never the associate of silver or gold. I am welcomed in every circle; I am petted and sought after wherever I go. Already I have traveled over half the world. My life is full of adventure and excitement. Although now I am housed in an obscure workman's pocket, to-morrow I may be resting in the purse of a prince. No such future awaits you. You are doomed to an obscure and humdrum existence."

Just then the workman's wife complained that she could not remove the paint stains from the windows she was attempting to clean.

"Why, let me tell you how to do that," said the workman. "A painter told me only the other day. Take a penny under your thumb and rub it over the paint spots. They will all disappear. It is far better than a knife. Here is a penny; try it."

He took the boastful penny from his pocket and the woman did as directed.

The paint disappeared as if by magic. "I am so glad to know about this," said the woman, "I will keep this penny with my scrub-brushes and scouring cloths, that I may always be prepared for such an emergency."

And thereafter the proud penny remained with scrub-brushes, while the nail was afterwards used to fasten a United States banner to the mast of a ship.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

A Ringing Salutory.

We recognize but one God, and are no man's man, and will not be a lackey for no political cross road charlatan, or tinhorn statesman in Montana, as we are not built on a truckling or brass-collar hypothesis. If there are any heavy weights or pudding-headed political scrubs in this state who think they can intimidate or bulldoze us by scurrilous remarks or base fabrications, they are bold, brilliant, blooming, meteoric and picturesque liars in every mark of the road.—Stinking Water (Mont.) Prospector.

He Had Faith.

A young man about twenty-five years old was sitting in the waiting-room of the Erie Depot the other day with a year-old baby on his knee, and his alarm and helplessness when the "young un" suddenly began to howl was so marked as to attract attention. By and by a waiting passenger walked over to him with a smile of pity on his face and queried:

"A woman gave you that baby to hold while she went to see about her baggage, didn't she?"

"Yes."

"Ha! ha! ha! I tumbled to the fact as soon as I saw you. You expect her back, I suppose?"

"Of course."

"Ha! ha! ha! This is rich! Looking for her every blessed minute, ain't you?"

"I think she'll come back."

"Well, this makes me laugh—ha! ha! ha! I had a woman play that same trick on me in a Chicago depot once, but no one ever will again. Young man, you're stuck. You've been played on for a layseed. Better turn that thing over to a policeman and make a skip before some reporter gets on to you."

"Oh, she'll come back," replied the young man, as he looked anxiously around. "She will, eh? Ha! ha! ha! Joke grows richer and richer! What makes you think she'll come back?"

"Because she's my wife and this is our first baby!"

"Oh—um—I see," muttered the fat man, who got over feeling tickled all at once, and in his vexation he crossed the room and kicked a dog which a farmer had tied to one of the seats with a piece of clothes line.—M. Quad.

To Remove Sunburn.

Have you burned your face dreadfully and do you wish you could get the coat of tan off? Yes? Then do this:

Select an hour when you are not going to be interrupted by anything at all, for the process is rather a long one and is decidedly a solemn one. Begin by pinching your face all over—pinch even your precious nose—until your whole face is just as red as it can be and the blood seems bursting through the skin. Do not make it sore, you know, but pinch it thoroughly. Next take a pan of boiling water and set it on something low, so that you can hold your face over it and get the full benefit of the steam. Renew the water three times during the twenty minutes in which you hold your face over the basin, and, if necessary, put a towel around your head to keep in the steam. The perspiration should drip from every pore.

Now, when you have done this, rub the skin lightly with lemon juice. This will smart at first, and should be applied very cautiously or the tingling sensation may be more than a woman cares to endure, even though she be willing to make a martyr of herself for the sake of her looks. Rub the face lightly with the lemon juice, and when this has been done apply some cold cream quickly to the face, and then, while the cream is getting in its softening process, go to bed and take a little nap.

This can be repeated as often as three times a week, and is bound to make the reddest or the brownest skin rival the lily or the peach inside of six weeks.

Cost of Fans in Japan.

The fan is an inseparable part of the Japanese dress. A native is rarely without a fan. It is his shelter from the sun, his notebook and his plaything. The varieties of these paper fans would form a curious collection in respect to form as well as quality. The highest priced fan that was used in the days of seclusion from the outer world was not more than five yen, or fifteen shillings; but now they have been made to order for foreigners as dear as two to three pounds. The general prices of ordinary fans range from two shillings to two guineas per 100.

J. FRANK CLARK, UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

UNCLE IKE'SCOLLATERAL LOAN OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor. E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor, having applied to this Court for a discharge of this Court give notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, to appear before this Court, at the court-room thereof, on the 2d day of October, 1891, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock, P. M., and show cause, if any they have, why the said E. M. Stevens should not be discharged from all his debts, in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided. It is further ordered, that notice of said application be given to the creditors by mail, and by publication for four weeks in the THEMIS, a newspaper published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated September 3d, 1891.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. sep5-4t

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,
Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE Assets.
Etna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn. $10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co. 5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York 11,729,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and
Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York 774,550 20

KEEP YOUR EYE
On the Window.

CHANGED DAILY DURING FAIR WEEK.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER.

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 15th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated August 13th, 1891.
JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and 1/2 Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for $1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHoads, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHoads, Clerk.
By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.
ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jyl8-8t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of F. L. Bates, an insolvent debtor. F. L. Bates, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said F. L. Bates is hereby declared to be insolvent. All persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association, for his use, and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the county of Sacramento, on the 9th day of October, 1891, at 1:30 P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, September 3d, A. D. 1891.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Filed September 3d, 1891.
W. W. RHoads, Clerk.
CLINTON L. WHITE, Attorney for Petitioner. sep5-5t

J. H. CAMPBELL,
No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults
CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.
ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,
NOTARY PUBLIC,
Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

A. L. HART,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON, ALBERT M. JOHNSON.
HIRAM W. JOHNSON.
JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,
LAWYERS.
504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 J Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street,

W. A. GETT, JR.,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,
LWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,
LAWYER,
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVEK,
LAWYER,
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

Tricks Played on Parsons.

Every now and then one hears of large fees paid to clergymen by rejoicing bridegrooms. One does not so often hear of the impositions sometimes put upon those who tie the matrimonial knot, and who suffer under the social custom which forbids a minister to perform the service of marrying lovers at a fixed rate stipulated for by contract.

But love and marriage do not change the nature of men, and there are mean—very mean—bridegrooms who do not hesitate to trick and cheat the good pastors who bind them in the ties of matrimony.

There is a minister in Brooklyn who told the writer a harrowing tale of deception of which he was the victim. After he had performed the marriage ceremony for a young couple at the parsonage, the bridegroom slipped a fat envelope between the leaves of the family bible, nodding pleasantly, as if to say: "You've well earned it." The clergyman nodded thankfully.

"When I opened that envelope," he said, "What do you suppose I found in it?"

"A goodly sum in bills."

"No, sir! No, sir! Twenty sheets of copy paper such as reporters use. And on the last sheet was written: 'Economy is wealth. Please don't squander this. Wipe your razor on it.'"

"I think," said the dominic, "that ministers should be empowered to declare some marriages void."

Dr. Howard, whom everybody in Flatbush, L. I., will remember, had a similar experience. He was routed out at midnight to marry a couple, and was compelled to arouse his family to act as witnesses. He was given a fat package by the bridegroom, upon the latter's departure. The good doctor spent half an hour or so unwinding paper after paper from that package only to find at last a silver quarter which had been used as a sleeve-button. One face had been ground smooth and ornamented with a monogram.

Dominie Johnson, whom old Brooklynites will recollect, was "taken in" once in much the same way. A would-be Benedict wrote to him to engage his services in tying the matrimonial knot, and hinted that he was saving a roll of $5 gold pieces with which to fee the doctor.

"An evening or two later," said the clergyman, in telling the story, "he honored me with a call. He was accompanied by one of the prettiest little women I ever saw. I performed the ceremony, and he insisted upon my kissing the bride. He made an officious display of a long thin roll well rapped in tin foil, and as I bowed him out he slid it slyly into my side pocket. When I returned to my library I examined the roll and found"—

"What?"

"A clothespin surrounded with tenpenny nails! A month or two afterwards he wrote to me from St. Louis, saying that he had charged me the wedding fee I was to have received for kissing his bride."

"There is a halter awaiting that knave," concluded the clergyman warmly, "and I never read of a hanging that I do not wonder if he isn't the victim traveling to glory under an alias."

A clergyman who once held a charge near Wyandotte, Kan., was given a horse and carriage by a couple whom he had just married. They had driven to his parsonage from Wichita, and they left by train. Soon afterwards the parson drove his new horse to Wichita.

"I didn't get back for a week," said the clergyman, shaking his head dolefully. "The man not only stole the woman, but the horse and wagon from her husband, and the rig was recognized, and I was clapped into jail on a charge of horse-stealing. Of course everything was finally straightened out, but somehow or other I could never make up my mind to forgive that man."

Rebuking a Peer.

It appears that occasionally titled folk forget their titles and behave just like other people under the same provocations. A story has just got into the Paris papers which tells how Lord Suffield, a cabinet minister, misbehaved at a luncheon given to the German Emperor and Empress during their recent stay in London. After the luncheon was over Lord Suffield made his way through the throng of guests in the most violent manner, pushing to right and left with his elbows and crowding people aside exactly as if he were trying to get on the elevated station at Park place at 6 o'clock. During his misbehavior he drew near the Countess Tornielle, the wife of the Italian ambassador, and struck her a hard blow with his elbow, in what the French writer does not hesitate to call—even in the case of a countess—her stomach. Whereupon the count—her husband—called him a brute, and went off in high dudgeon to Lord Salisbury to say that unless Lord Suffield made suitable apologies to his wife neither of them would assist at the grand function to be given that night in honor of the emperor. Whereupon Lord Salisbury sent for the offending Lord Suffield and informed him that he would better apologize promptly for his misdeeds or he would probably find that he had dealt the whole State of Italy a blow in the pit of its stomach. Lord Suffield promptly made what excuses he could, and the outward seeming of peace was restored.

W. D. Comstock, 501--507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,

Between Fourth and Fifth,

SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,
Photographic Art Parlors
426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK
Restaurant and Oyster House
1019 SECOND STREET,
Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.
First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.
BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice,

SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.
Importers and Wholesale Dealers in
Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company
PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.25 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knights Landing and Oroville	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
11.50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5.25 A
3.00 P	Ogden and East	10.30 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	4.00 P
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	11.25 A
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.05 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamers	26.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	5.10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.10 P
3.05 P	Vallejo	8.10 P
8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted.
A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank
DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:
PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED K. COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:
C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank
SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORLIZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,
San Francisco and Sacramento,
Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.
Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1891.

No. 32.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & CO. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

There seems of late years a disposition to ridicule the grand jury system. To pronounce it a farce is just in one sense; unjust in another. At times there are grand juries who believe their mission is to reform the world, and to make a record by denouncing everybody and everything save themselves; at other times level-headed citizens are chosen, who perform their duties in a business manner. Practically, about all the grand jury has to do is to look into the conduct of public officers, and to investigate the few cases of crime where informations have not been filed. It does no harm that an annual scrutiny should be made of the business affairs of the city and county by a grand jury. It is certainly desired by the officers and by the people. It is the unfortunate habit of the press to charge, try and condemn public officers, simply that sensational reading matter may be manufactured. After an investigation by a legally constituted body, and it is determined the immense smoke was dense journalistic wind, there comes the editorial shout that nothing has been accomplished. If we are to judge from press criticisms the incoming grand jury will have much to do. Their files are not now before us; were they this issue contains not the space to summarize the public wrongs this people suffered, and is suffering. During the past year the old water-works building was about to fall; the Stevens pump threatened to quit working; the police department has been corrupt; gambling has been conducted in Chinatown; Henry failed to run his electric cars to the depot; the members of the board of trustees have used the term "buddle" in their public meetings; the supervisors did not obey the wishes of the Farmers' Alliance; Major McLaughlin declined to have a guardian appointed; and in one of the "public echoes" an elaborate condemnation was made of the poundmaster, who, if we recollect right, made an unlawful arrest of a goat in the eastern portion of the city. The business of the grand jury will be expedited if the newspapers will furnish scrap-books containing clippings from their files of the alarming accusations that have appeared in the column of "public echoes," and upon the dignified editorial page. We are, however, fearful that unless the daily press will agitate these and other wrongs with its accustomed vigor, the grand jury will lose sight of them, and confine its investigations to common-sense subjects.

The contest over the will of Mrs. Searles, in Massachusetts, will, during its pendency, attract much attention of the people of the nation. Not that they have any direct interest in the numberless dollars that are at stake, but because there is a general interest in the matter of the distribution of large holdings. As a rule, the heir by marriage is adversely criticised; of him it is said he married for money; or that he would not be able to hold his own in the world were it not for the accident of marriage. Men who marry for money, or who depend upon the coin their fathers gave them, are derided and are scorned by their competitors, who owe all they have to their own exertions and abilities. True it is, a man can justly feel proud that he has made for himself; but there is another view to take of the matter. In this world all things have their uses, though at times not apparent at the first. The inheritor of wealth by marriage or birth very generally dissipates it to the source from whence it came—the mass of the people—and in that noble but unconscious mission he is ably assisted by the lawyers. In this case, could the wishes of the founder of this vast fortune be consulted, there would be a desire, doubtless, that the estate should be kept intact, and that it should continue to be a potential factor in the financial and business world. Providence decreed otherwise. His widow remarried, perhaps on her part for love; with Searles it is apparent it was for the money of Hopkins. The marriage was providential in that it has furnished the key for the unlocking of the treasure vault, and will in large measure throw to the people a portion of the great store.

The large accumulation of property by an individual is regarded as a misfortune to the people; truly it is. Its tendency is to build up an oppressive aristocracy. To guard their interests, there comes a combination of the money kings to direct the business and control the politics of the country. It is now the federal senate is practically a house of lords, and it stands as an irresistible barrier to the enactment of any law that will in any measure militate against money and its power. For admission to that body brains, save those of financial bent, need not apply. Perhaps time will come when a common-sense amendment will be made to the constitution permitting the people to directly select their representatives in the upper house of congress. Until such time come, encouragement should be given to men who will marry for money; let there not be the stigma cast, as it has been and now is, upon one who will make life's voyage easy by a monied matrimonial stroke. It should be considered this class of grooms do not interfere with the self-reliant, but are the only available instruments by which accumulated wealth can be disintegrated. Our neighbor the Bee was not politic when it remarked concerning Searles and his testimony:

Edward F. Searles was on the witness stand on Tuesday in Salem, Mass., in the to-be-celebrated contest of the will of Mrs. Searles. We find this excellent morsel of humor in a dispatch: "In reply to a question he said he married her for all she had—both love and money—but should never have married her for her money alone." Oh, thou man with the delicate and sensitive perceptions of propriety, stand up and be questioned! Is it not true that you would never have married her had she not money? Is it not true that, were she poor, the fire of love would never have been kindled from the ashes of your seven-per-cent. heart? Then, if you did not marry her for her money, what on earth did you marry her for? You say you "married her for all she had—both love and money." It was not necessary to mention the ingredient of love. It weighed in the balance like the outer film of a pea in a cargo of rock salt.

There is truth in the observation of an evening contemporary that the fact the newspapers of San Francisco are striking at the Call is a very sure sign it is a formidable rival. There is some truth in the statement that the Call is the only morning newspaper in San Francisco. It has maintained itself against the power of capital, and we are not aware it ever sold its editorial columns. Its merchandise has been in the way of advertising. It is gratifying the people have manifested their appreciation for a newspaper that has been able to successfully withstand the opposition it encountered. Of the Chronicle we speak not, save that its proprietor is to be congratulated that he took heed of the public sentiment that justified young Kalloch and Spreckles; since his paper has been comparatively clean. The play toy of young Hearst does, however, reach the ridiculous in journalism, and has been an expensive luxury. It was an attempt to build up an artificial journal with varied attractions. In one act there would be the capture of a mammoth grizzly bear; then the running of special railway trains; then a puzzle contest; then an infant lottery and other matters that had a tendency to strike the people as being the veriest fakes. These amusements must have been agreeable to the boy, but they cost Senator Hearst much money. Of late, since the death of the senator, there has been a suspension of these absurdities, and it would appear the Examiner will be left to browse for itself. If it should come that paper will be thrown upon its own resources, there will soon be a demonstration of the utter inability of a pampered newspaper management to hold its own as against legitimate journals. It has ever been, and perhaps always will be, that the people respect more the brains that back a newspaper than they do the sack of money. From the moment it becomes known that a newspaper is subservient to capital its influence is destroyed. Of late years the printing of newspapers by corporations and by men of wealth has been a favorite yet an extremely expensive pastime, and gradually that era is passing away. The people do distrust a journal that is not published legitimately; and the success of the Call strikingly exemplifies this remark.

We stated last week that we believed that two-thirds of the reported robberies and burglaries in this city were fictitious. They unquestionably are. Anyone who will give a moment's consideration to the reports published in the newspapers concerning them will come to that conclusion. In some instances the accounts have been absurd, and it would seem that the press reporters should see through them. These reports of sham robberies and burglaries would be harmless were they printed in the humorous department, but when published seriously are misleading and unjust to the good order of the community and to the police department. The impression is given out that the police department is not efficient, while as a matter of fact it is. Our officers do not receive the commendation they merit.

It is with extreme gratification to us that the announcement is made through the morning press that the bondholders have determined that the Stevens pump at the water-works is in very good health, and that with its companion pumps the water for the city can be supplied for many years to come. We had been alarmed about the health of the Stevens pump from what its nurses said concerning it, but we presume if the bondholders say it is all right, it must be so. At this late day it seems that competent engineers, whose names are kept in the dark, have examined our water system, and have made the matter of its defects so clear that it can be seen by a child. The Record-Union has seen them, as it triumphantly states editorially:

It is stated by authority, the competency of which cannot be questioned, that the difficulty with our city water-works is not in incapacity of the pumps, but that it resides in the insufficiency of the pump lines to carry the water; that if twenty new pumps were added the service could not be materially improved. This is a mechanical statement, and the proofs of its soundness are such as can be made clear to a child.

The schools are now in vacation; we are therefore unable to readily get other juvenile expressions.

If there is truth in political street gossip, Judd, who nominally occupies the position of chief engineer of the water-works, will soon receive the punishment we predicted—removal. We did say he should have known better than to have made any criticism as to the mismanagement of that institution. That he was not removed during the weeks of the fair is perhaps due to the fact that three of the employés were engaged elsewhere than in connection with the works. So long as it was deemed expedient to permit gambling to be carried on at the height it was, perhaps it was excusable that the trustees permitted it to be looked after. There are two reasons for the removal of Judd: He is dangerously honest; there has been a demonstration that too many men are employed in the department, for in the protracted absence of three it ran along the same as ever, and doubtless he is the most available man to be retired permanently.

Our neighbor the Record-Union is sometimes consistent only in inconsistency. Through its editorials the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco is commended for its action in deciding to resist the order of the State Board of Equalization in raising the assessment of San Francisco. A short time ago the Record-Union severely criticised the liquor dealers of this city because they did not obey the license regulations of the city trustees, and particularly, bow obedience to the Superior Court decision. Herein lies the inconsistency of our neighbor. In the matter of the action of the Board of Equalization, it was under a constitutional command. The liquor dealers only desired to have their rights adjudicated. With the latter it was simply a question of judicial construction of questions of law, and the contest was not without merit. But the Record-Union now advises an absolute disregard of the lawful acts of the State Board of Equalization. Consistency is indeed a jewel—but there are few jewels in our neighbor's sanctum.

We did hope that during fair week, when so many other exhibitions were made, the board of trustees would so far restrain themselves as to give the animals at the park a reasonable chance. We were impelled to indulge in this hope in that it is but once a year when there is a general State exhibition of the noted curiosities. In Sacramento it must be admitted that the thing is overdone, as we give weekly exhibitions. It seems that the regular Monday exhibition was a little better than usual, and had it been anticipated, arrangements should have been made for it to have occurred at the park or the pavilion.

The suicide of J. M. Balmaceda, the deposed president of Chili, has brought up the question if self-murder by one sane is not an act of cowardice. In the case of Balmaceda it seemed had he been taken by the junta he would have been killed—doubtless deservedly; yet his suicide was the act of a coward. While backed with power he hesitated not to oppress his fellow men, and did misuse the trust his people had reposed in him. When at last the time for popular vengeance came, instead of justifying his braggadocio declaration that he had acted during his administration for the best interests of his people, he sequestered himself and sent a bullet through his brain. We can understand from the spirit that has been manifested by the people of South American countries that the position of a ruler is not always the most agreeable, and it has happened the careers of some ended violently. Yet, of the many who overstepped their authority we believe Balmaceda to be the only one who did not meet his fate with chivalry.

The history of the world furnishes other examples of men who were apparently brave when on the upward tide, but who showed poltroonery when there should have been a manifestation of courage. Brutus and Cassius were brave enough to strike Cæsar in his back, but when defeated by Antony in battle, ended their own lives. Had they manfully met their fate they would not occupy a position despicable. Had Balmaceda confronted his adversaries and received the coup-de-grace at their hands, there would be some sympathy for him; as it now is he will be regarded as a coward during the little time he will be recollected.

—He

That kills himself to avoid misery, fears it;
And at the best shows but a bastard valor.

The case is entirely different where suicide is committed in mental aberration. Sympathy is then aroused. We have in mind the case of unfortunate Hugh Miller, the learned geologist and elegant author, who shot himself December 26, 1856, in Scotland. In his life he accomplished in his favorite line of study more than any other man, and his published works will forever be a monument to his masterly intellect and his untiring labor. He toiled night and day, with but little sleep or exercise, and his mind gave way under the strain. At the last he was found lifeless in his study; his chest pierced with a pistol ball. In a pathetic note to his wife he wrote: "A fearful dream rises upon me; I cannot bear the horrible thought." He did realize that his mind was on the verge of ruin, and his act can be justified; there was before him in life the misery of insanity; in death, relief.

There was a time in England when the crime of suicide was punished with a forfeiture of property, and the body was buried on the open highway, with a stick thrust through it. On the repeal of this law, in the reign of George IV, there was enacted a statute providing that the body of a suicide should be buried at night, and without religious ceremony. In other countries, in early years, laws similar did prevail, that tended to cast ignominy on the self-murderer. In large degree their design was to restrain the commission of the act. Manifestly such laws were futile; dead men cannot be punished in this world. Modern judgment is that a man who encounters either real or imaginary misfortune, and has so little courage that to avoid meeting it, takes his own life, is better dead than living. So we regard the case of Balmaceda.

Whatever crimes Maximilian, the Emperor of Mexico, did commit—and they were many—he had the courage, when defeat came upon him, to stand his trial and meet his death from the bullets of his enemy. Incidentally—speaking of Maximilian—we will in part reply to a query by a correspondent as to some of the events of his life. He was the Arch-Duke of Austria, and was born in Vienna, July 6, 1832; he was shot in Mexico, July 19, 1867. His wife was the Princess Carlotta, daughter of King Leopold I, of the Belgians. At the instance of Napoleon III, of France, he accepted the imperial crown of Mexico, and landed in that country in May, 1864. There was resistance made by President Juarez and the masses of the Mexicans to the establishment of a foreign imperial government. At the close of the civil war in the United States our State department assumed a determined attitude with regard to the invasion. The affairs of Napoleon became complicated, and his support was withdrawn from Maximilian; the French army under Marshal Bazaine returned to Europe. When reduced to the last extremity Maximilian was importuned to leave the country, but declined. He made a feeble effort to maintain his position, but his forces were overcome, and on May 15, 1867, he was taken prisoner, with his generals. They were tried by court martial and sentenced to be shot; and the sentence was executed six days after their conviction. During his brief reign he maintained a regal court that equaled in pomp the courts of Europe. It is said that among his maids of honor was a descendant of the Montezumas, who was his favorite, and supplanted the Empress Carlotta in his affections; that the maid administered to Carlotta a poison the effect of which produced insanity with no physical impairment. This story is very generally believed in Mexico, and there is an apparent confirmation of its truth in the fact that for a quarter of a century the reason of the unfortunate empress has been dethroned, though physically she has not been impaired. At the time of the execution of Maximilian there was considerable expression of sympathy for him, but calmer judgment justified the course pursued by the Mexican authorities. The intervention of our government was solicited and declined. He undoubtedly merited the fate he received; and about the only redeeming feature was the fact that he declined to abandon the few adherents that he had, and shared his fate with them.

American Politeness.

An American seldom addresses one of the gentler sex with his head covered unless it is in the open air, and while this is also the custom in some European countries—in France and Switzerland, for instance—it is not nearly so common in Germany or Great Britain. At a Covent Garden promenade concert last summer I saw 400 or 500 persons on the floor (men and women), and not more than six men carried their hats in their hands. I remember remarking at the time that one-third of the number of hats were the silk plush ("top hats"), one-third were derbys of a brownish hue, the other third were mixed—all sorts.

Even in the dress circle at the Covent Garden concert some men wear their hats the whole evening—white hats, derbys, and heavy silk hats—and this in warm weather, too. It no doubt is the custom; at any rate, such was the case on a certain "American night" last year, when American airs were played, Mrs. Alice Shaw, the beautiful whistler, being the special attraction among the solo performers.

And when men at London theaters do remove their hats they seem to do it reluctantly. They will enter a theater and enter a box, remove their overcoats and gloves, take out opera glass, spread the play bill before them, and then, as a last thought, if they think about it at all, the hat will be slowly removed; they seem to be unwilling to part with it.

How different in American theaters, where every man quickly doffs his hat the moment he enters the door of the auditorium. It is all the more noticeable in London theaters, because the women are obliged to remove their hats before entering, and excepting at the Lyceum, the Savoy, and possibly one or two other houses, they are obliged to pay for their care.

At third and second class restaurants men wear their hats as do people of the same class elsewhere, but Englishmen not only carry their hats into the dining-room of a first-class hotel, but carry them on their heads until they take their seats. The presence of women makes no difference.

Man and Woman's Soul.

Bye the bye, if people were pawning souls, I wonder what they would get for them? There are souls so mean and narrow and contracted that I don't believe even the Maryland coin known as a "fip and a bit," and which is really $6\frac{1}{4}$ cents, would be given for them. Then there are souls that seem to rise up and look out of the eyes as if they saw sweetness and purity and light; and yet in these souls there is that awful, awful something that we call selfish, that means "I will have what I want, and be anything that I want to be, but I find the amiable business is the most successful." What would you give for a soul like that? I think a colored Chinese coin with a hole in the center of it would be the best. Then there are good souls that are like all-wool flannel—warranted to wear and not to shrink; souls that have had much to bother them; and for these a silver piece might be given by a generous pawnbroker. And then there are souls that have gone through the fire of life, been struck by the sword of temptation and are sweeter than they were before they were bruised; and for these even the pawnbroker would give gold and diamonds, for their price is above rubies.—Bab.

When most pretty girls reach 19 they become engaged to some poor young man, and, as he hasn't money to marry on, they wait until he saves it. The waiting process is a long and tiresome one. While the young man is having a good time spending 90 cents and saving 10 for his marriage, the girl is growing a little older, a little plainer, a little more careworn, and wasting her youth in waiting for a man who in most cases finds someone else more attractive and breaks the engagement. If girls will look around at the great number of girls who have "waited" for some poor man to their sorrow, they will probably hesitate before entering into an engagement that promises to be long and fruitless, and that leaves them worn out and with no faith in human nature at the end. Very often a girl who is waiting for a young man to become rich throws away the real opportunity of her life; very often she is a slave to the caprice of a man who finally deserts her. Very often under such circumstances a woman gets a wrong idea of life, and accuses the world of faults it is not guilty of. In a way, men take very good care of themselves, for the reason that they accept the lessons of life, hard though they sometimes are, but women make the mistake of trusting too much and suffering needlessly for it.

Amen Rasi, a handsome Christian Assyrian who is now lecturing in this country, says that men in his country live on 6 cents a day. Women are sold as slaves to work with oxen at the plough. In Damascus, he says, there are 150,000 Christians, 130,000 Mahometans and 5,000 Jews. There is in it a building haunted by John the Baptist's ghost. The door of the room in which he is said to have been beheaded is never opened. The Mahometans say that once long ago some one opened it and the Baptist's blood flowed out over the city to a depth of five inches. It was the custom of worshipers to leave their shoes outside the temple. There were sometimes 300 or 400 pairs standing in a row, and the poor people hurried through their prayers first and then carefully selected the finest footwear in the row, thereby illustrating the great cleverness of the Assyrians.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

An attempt is being made in Milan to institute a free theater.

Grace Hawthorne, the actress, is clever at poker.

Clyde Fitch's new play, Pamela's Prodigy, is in rehearsal at the London Court Theater.

At the Metropolitan this evening, Nat Goodwin in The Nominee. On Monday and Tuesday evenings, The Hustler.

Robert Downing, the tragedian, allowed his children to see him play The Gladiator. They said: "We liked it ever so much. It was so funny! And papa hollered so!"

Mrs. E. L. Davenport, who died recently, was the granddaughter of an actor, the daughter of an actor, the wife of an actor, and the mother of five children, all of whom were or are on the stage.

"I'm afraid I was not cut out for a tragedian," acknowledged Mr. J. Roscius Hamme. "How did you find that out? Did the little birds tell you? 'They might have been birds if they had been allowed to hatch.'"

"My theory about Hamlet," said Baconius, mysteriously, "is that he was a printer." "And on what do you base this theory?" asked Criticus. "On that line in which he says, 'Either subdue the devil or throw him out.'"

Julia Marlowe, the actress, is said to have a wonderful memory. As a test, not long ago she committed to memory and recited the entire letter of Baron Fava to Secretary Blaine after it had been read but twice in her presence.

Gen. Butler's wife, of whom he writes so tenderly in his memoirs, was an exquisite elocutionist, surpassed, in the opinion of many, by Fannie Kemble alone. She knew several of the Shakespeare plays by heart and believed that they were the work of Bacon.

Patti doesn't "reminisce" very rapidly. She dictates an hour on her memoirs, pores over the type-written matter, and then, as like as not, tears it up. What a difference it would make in the happiness of the world if she had in this respect more imitators!

Bernhardt's nine performances in Boston aggregated $43,839 87, the largest amount ever drawn in that city by any actress or singer in the same number of appearances. And yet Sara thinks it an outrage that she should have been required to pay a dog tax to the municipality.

One of the notable figures of Florentine life is the once beautiful and fascinating prima donna Maria Piccolomini, now the marchesa di Gaetani. Theater-goers of a generation ago will remember her in her favorite role of La Traviata. Her husband is wealthy and a member of one of the oldest families of the Italian nobility. She has one son and four daughters.

Augustus Pitou, the manager of Pitou's stock company, formerly played the opposite roles with Edwin Booth, and on the opening night of Booth's Theater in New York city he was mistaken for the great tragedian and given a great reception. Mr. Pitou, in conjunction with Mr. Jessop, wrote The Power of the Press, which was produced with great success last season. At present, in conjunction with Col. Alfriend, he is writing a war play.

The leading actor of Copenhagen is Joachim Ludwig Phister, who for more than fifty years has been connected with the Royal Danish theater. He has appeared in 700 roles, and has marvelous control over the muscles of his face. Phister got hold of a photograph of Gen. B. F. Butler some years ago and delights in assuming a facial resemblance to the man of Massachusetts, squint and all. He thinks Butler's a very interesting face, it is said.

Musical folk in Europe are still discussing eagerly the young Italian composer, Mascagni, whose opera, Cavalleria Rusticana, has attracted so much attention. Never before, probably, in the history of operatic art has a work by an unknown writer been performed in all the principal centers of Europe within six months of its first appearance. Mascagni is only 24 or 25 years of age, and this—his first work—was composed in competition for a prize offered by the Milan conservatory.

Maurel, the famous barytone, claims to have discovered a law enabling every one possessed of an ordinary singing voice to acquire the various colors indispensable to dramatic vocalism, which now are only acquired by highly talented singers after years of practice. None will suspect Maurel, unquestionably one of the world's great artists, of empiric methods or intentions; but it would be far easier for him to show an ordinary singer how to "acquire the various colors" than how to lay them on. There is no royal road to lyric greatness.

Book Chat.

Jules Verne has a son, Michael, who is developing a talent for writing stories very much in his father's highly imaginative style.

A bookseller was asked to describe an edition de luxe. He said: "You know what a rabbit is; well, a donkey is an edition de luxe of a rabbit."

The report comes from Paris that M. Zola intends to stop novel writing and demonstrate to Ibsen how a realistic play ought to be written. No doubt Ibsen is consumed with curiosity to learn.

Meissonier's intense aversion to Americans was due to the fact that "they were not demonstrative enough" when they were introduced to his presence. He once said that he hated them for this reason.

A tremendous plethora of novels is reported in Paris. For example, 45,000 copies of the last production of a popular writer have been returned to the publishers. It is said that another publisher has 3,000,000 volumes on hand, which are unsalable.

Mark Twain's new story, "The American Claimant," presents his old hero, the delightful and exasperating Colonel Sellers, as coming into possession of an English title left to him by an English kinsman. Of course this gives an opportunity for funny complications.

Herbert Spencer, considerably improved in health, is once more hard at work on his philosophy, in a little house in the edge of Savernake forest. The philosopher is very industrious these days, having but recently published an extensive treatise on "Justice."

There is less of sensation and more of common sense in the literary announcements for the season than in any we have scanned for some years. There is an absence of the element of surprise, but unless we are greatly mistaken the close of the season in the spring will mark a period productive of much valuable literature.

Two doctor books are heirlooms in the family of a Clinton, Mo., gunsmith. They are dated 1577 and 1613, and contain old-fashioned remedies for all ills and ails of the flesh. The title of the index says: "This is the index of two books for King Charles ye First. His book." It is said they were taken from the palace of the unfortunate monarch shortly before his execution.

Walter Besant says that the Victorian exhibition next winter will contain portraits of 400 great men who have added luster to her majesty's reign; and then he asks how many of them have been honored with titles. He asks what distinction the queen has accorded to Carlyle, Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Swinburne, Grote, Hallam, Froude, George Eliot, Blackmore, Freeman, Green, and Lecky.

Andrew Lang, the clever British critic, is very rough on literary men. He calls them "vain and irritable and flighty and absorbed." And he advises ladies never to entertain matrimonial propositions from them. This may be a kindness to the ladies, but the literary men will be likely to suffer considerable discomfort. If authors may not marry ladies, will Mr. Lang explain whom the dickens they may marry?

Dumas is credited with having said that it was the easiest thing in the world to write a book. You had only to seat yourself in a leather-covered chair, at a library table well supplied with blue paper and a certain kind of pen and ink, and proceed to write; but before you began, before you seated yourself or wrote the first word, you should have given ten years of thought to the subject on which you intended to write.

In a report addressed to the Prefect of the Seine with regard to the municipal and other free libraries in Paris and the suburbs, it is stated that they now number 64, and that they are attached to the different town halls and communal schools. The number of books given out to read last year was 1,386,642, and of these 690,105 were novels. The artisans, who use these libraries the most, and who prefer reading at their own homes, appear to be very scrupulous about returning the books given out, as the annual loss does not amount to one-half per cent.

The Library Journal is authority for the following supposed titles of books asked for at a certain public library: "Sarah Zenaski," "Sequel of Saracknessa Which Is St. Hilario," "11 Worth Case," "Aristocrat of the Breakfast Table," "Cluster on the Hearth," "Marie Bashkershrib," "Alsop's Fables," "Hy Spatia," "Dana's Emanuel of Geology," "Bonbary Roose," by Dickens, "Helen's Water Babies," "Great Orators: Their Habits and Nature When Young," "Cæsar's Contemporaries," "Tents of Ham," "Eggleston's Circus Rider," "Guyot's Earthen Man," "Lamb's Essay on Roast Mutton," "Roe's Escaped from Eden," "Butter and Eggs and Kisses," "Mrs. Burnet's Vera Cruz," "Trowbridge's Three Scoots," "Stock's Lady of the Lake," "Kenelworth and Chillingly," "Sacred Letter," by Hawthorne, and "Ex-pectoration" ("Expatriation").

Professional Chat.

Patient—Tell me, doctor, does hair dye injure the brain? Doctor—It depends entirely on the person who uses it. It is harmless in most cases, as people with brains rarely resort to it.

In Boston, Supreme Court Judge Lathrop has decided that, under the so-called Australian ballot law in Massachusetts, unchallenged votes once cast cannot afterward be disputed for illegality. The precedent may be useful elsewhere.

There was a quaint old canon in Newcastle some years ago who never minded what he said or how he said it. One very wet day he noticed some strangers in his church, people who he knew attended another on finer days; so, after the service, he toddled down the aisle and said to them audibly: "I am very glad you make a convenience of my church on a wet day."

"I have noticed," said a young solicitor, "that members of the legal profession are almost always brave men. It is seldom that one shows cowardice. I wonder why that is so?" "Well," responded an elderly lady, "I've read somewhere that 'conscience makes cowards of us all,' and, as lawyers mostly have no conscience, why, of course, they haven't anything to make them cowards."

A minister had traveled some distance to preach, and at the conclusion of the morning service waited for someone to invite him to dine, but the congregation dispersed without noticing him. When the house was nearly empty the minister stepped up to a gentleman and said: "Brother, will you go home to dinner with me to-day?" "Where do you live?" "About eighteen miles from here, sir." "No; but you must dine with me," answered the other, with a flushed face, which invitation the clergyman gravely accepted.

In Connecticut they are telling this story about Chief Justice Andrews: While attending a college reunion he met two young lawyers who were also graduates of the same institution and acquainted with him. It was a hot day, and, as he paused to greet his juniors, the judge mopped his brow and asked: "Boys, can you tell me if the old town is still without a license?" Truth compelled them to answer in the affirmative; but, after a moment's pause, they mentioned a "late decision" which permitted persons in dire distress to cope with the stern statutes of the commonwealth.

Judge Cooley, who has just resigned from the interstate commerce commission, is said to be the man who coined the expression, "A public office is a public trust," notwithstanding the fact that it is commonly attributed to ex-President Cleveland. Ten years before Mr. Cleveland became President, Judge Cooley used the phrase as the text for an address delivered before a national gathering of lawyers at St. Louis. Later, when President Cleveland used the phrase, it grew into popularity; and the books of phrases give Mr. Cleveland as the author of it.

Dr. Robert Wiesendanger, of Hamburg, has just patented a method of employing carbonic acid to produce intense cold for the purpose of causing insensibility, which will prove particularly useful in dental operations. It is used in the form of a pencil, and any part of the body, on being rubbed with this pencil, loses sensibility without the freezing of the skin; and slight surgical operations can be performed without causing any pain. Dr. Krummel experimented in the Hamburg Hospital on a boy of 13, who, without the slightest sign of flinching, allowed him to make a long and very deep cut in his leg, the doctor having rubbed the place with one of the pencils.

A country judge in Hungary gave a decision a few days ago of which Solomon himself might be proud. Members of the Nazarene sect in the town of Gyoma requested his honor to be allowed to crucify one of their number "who was a Messiah and had been called by Heaven to save men." The judge for a moment was dumbfounded. "Friends," he replied, after recovering his senses, "I do not wish to interfere with your religious practices. If your Messiah wishes to be crucified let him prepare himself for death. Remember, however, that if he does not rise again in three days I shall cause every one of you to be hanged. The Nazarenes, it is needless to add, allowed their chief to live.

He was a young man. He had studied law in his father's office, and his father finally retired and gave the business to him. One day, less than a week after the old gentleman had retired, the young man came home and proudly said: "Father, you know that old Gilpin estate case that you have been trying for years and years to settle?" "Yes," answered the father, with the suggestion of a smile. "Well, it didn't take me two days to settle it after I got at it." "What!" shouted the old lawyer; "you have settled the Gilpin estate?" "Yes; and it was just as easy as rolling off a log." "Well, you infernal idiot, you! Why, that estate has paid the living expenses of our family for four generations, and might have paid them for four more if I hadn't left the business to a ninny."

NOTES.

The youngest of the cardinals at Rome is 57 years of age; the oldest 84, who has worn the scarlet for 32 years.

Every workman in Japan wears on his cap and on his back an inscription giving his business and his employer's name.

A perfume lamp, which burns cologne, and spreads a delightful scent about the room, is the latest household novelty.

When a man marries in France he becomes legally responsible not alone for the support of his wife, but for the support of her parents, should they become destitute.

The earliest coin for American use was made about 1612, and bore as a design the picture of a hog. Considering the desire to get money and the propensity to keep it, this would be a fitting design for our coin even now.

The heart, stimulated beyond its capacity by hard drinking, weakens as the effects of the stimulants wear off, and at last becomes unable to pump the blood. The stagnant blood coagulates; and the victim is smothered.

The recipe for fame in these days of newspapers is simple. One has only to make a painful public nuisance of himself and then mysteriously disappear. The contrast between his pestiferous presence and his soothing departure will be sure to excite remark.

It begins to look as if the Sultan was not such a sick man after all. He permits Russia and England to do all the worrying while he enjoys the easy part of the situation by doing whatever either of the contending powers orders, and letting them fight it out between themselves.

There is propriety as to the time a man should die. Rev. Burchard is dead, but he died too ripe. Better would it have been had he been called to his Maker before he made his speech in the Blaine campaign, in 1884, in which he characterized the democracy as the party of "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion."

An acre of bananas will support twenty-five times as many persons as an acre of wheat. One thousand square feet of land, growing bananas, will produce 4,000 pounds of nutritious substance. The same space, devoted to wheat or potatoes, will produce only 33 pounds of wheat, or 99 pounds of potatoes.

Professor Goodale, of Harvard, retiring president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, said in his recent address at Washington "that the fruits of the future will tend toward seedlessness; and there is no reason why we should not have seedless strawberries, blackberries, and raspberries."

A marvelous illustration of the patience of the Chinese is found in the salt mines in Central China. Holes about six inches in diameter are bored in the rock by means of a primitive form of iron drill, and sometimes a period of forty years elapses before the coveted brine is reached, so that the work is carried on from one generation to another.

Would it be indelicate to inquire what has become of the agitation of the question of providing a system of sewerage for this city? Our understanding was, from the stir that was made concerning it, that so much would have been accomplished at least as to appoint a committee to wait on the bondholders and find out if we would be permitted to do nothing.

The Indianapolis News tells of a man in that city who has been leader of one church choir for over twenty years, and in all that long period there is not a case on record of the slightest unpleasantness between him and the singers. This man should have a little corner in the next and better world along with the couple out West somewhere who have lived together for fifty years and never given each other a cross word.

It is stated in the dispatches that the President has practically decided to give California a place in the cabinet, and that M. M. Estee will probably succeed Attorney-General Miller. Estee was chairman of the last Republican convention. At one time he resided in Sacramento, and in 1863 was elected District Attorney. If there is any virtue in the "doctrine of chances," he will meet with the executive favor, for our former District Attorneys have been fortunate in large degree. Three of them became United States Senators—Frank Hereford from West Virginia, and Cornelius Cole and Milton S. Latham from this State; Robert F. Morrison became Justice of the Supreme Court. There is a possibility Estee may decline the office should the President attempt to force it upon him abruptly.

The Veze has made the alarming discovery that there is gambling in Chinatown, and it would seem from the fact that it repeats the declaration in italic type it has found out something new. Lotteries and tan games have run there since Chinatown has been in existence, and doubtless will run until it will be burned down. We are not aware whatever what concern it is of the whites if a Chinaman feels like it that he should bet his money on buttons, or chance it at lottery. Our own people do it with other devices, and the business of selling lottery tickets is openly transacted; lottery drawings and the successes of individuals are advertised in family journals, though there is a law against it. In the face of events that disgraced our city during the late State fair, it would seem we had better first purify the white element, as preliminary to civilizing the heathen. The matter is on principle with going to the islands to make converts when we have so many sinners among our own people.

The Pound and Dollar Signs.

As there were twenty shillings to the pound of silver, England, according to one authority, obtained the reckoning of money by £, s. d. the signs for the Roman coins libra, solidi and denarii. The character £, for pounds sterling, is merely a capital L with a mark drawn across it to represent the corresponding Latin word libra, as lb, or pound weight, is formed of the first and third letters of the same word and connected by a similar mark, libra having been the Roman pound of twelve ounces.

The origin of the sign $ has been variously accounted for, but it is thought to be a modified figure "8," denoting a "piece of eight," or eight reals—an old Spanish coin of the value of one dollar. The sign was in use long before the adoption of the federal currency. It has also been claimed that the mark is derived from the initials "U" and "S," written one over the other as a monogram, and with time modified to the present form by dropping the joining curve in the letter "U."

But on the subject of the £ and $ marks an article by L. W. Fawcett, on "The History of the Two Pillars" presents an ingenious and interesting argument that the $ mark represents the oldest symbol known to the human race, one which seems to have been elaborated out of the mythologies of all the ancients, passing through numberless changes by the outgrowth of fanciful legends from original ideas, but clearly traceable to the earliest races, of whom we get only a shadowy outline in the dusk of antiquity—a symbol known to those who built Tyre and Carthage as "The Pillars of Hercules," but as ancient to them as to us. In comparatively modern times poetic fancy, he says, has conferred this name on two mountains that stand at the entrance to the Mediterranean, Calpe on the north and Abyla on the south side of the straits. The writer refers to tradition, which has Melcarthus, a Tyrian navigator, sailing in search of the fabled Atlantis or dimly-remembered Britain, pausing in a bay at the western extremity of the land beyond the straits and setting up these two pillars as a memorial, building over them the temple of Hercules. A colony from Tyre was established, and the place grew into ancient Gades, the modern Cadiz. Flavius Philostratus described the pillars when they were replaced by gold and silver ones, saying of them: "These pillars are the chains which bind together the earth and the sea."

Following up the history of their descent to us, the writer shows that when Charles V became Emperor of Germany he adopted a new coat-of-arms, quartering those of Spain with those of his empire, the pillars of the arms of Cadiz being made supporters. At Seville's imperial mint was coined a standard dollar, called, in the Mediterranean coast, "colonato," the most prominent figures in the device on this coin being the two pillars and the scroll entwining them and the representation of which, with a pen, came to be the accepted symbol of the coin. Melcarthus was a Tyrian, and the pillars must have been a sacred symbol in Tyre, for on the coins of Tyre were prominently depicted with other emblems two short pillars arranged as supporters. Though not the first to coin money, the Tyrians were the first to circulate it, and theirs became the currency of the world, so that the pillars with which they were stamped would naturally become the symbol for money, and the adoption of the dollar mark to designate the "pillar pieces" of Charles V was probably only the revival of an ancient custom which at first referred to the "pillar pieces" of Tyre. The pound mark, continues the writer, owes, in all probability, its distinguishing feature—the two horizontal bars—to the same symbol, though in this connection they came into England by another route than Spain. The "L" was the initial letter of the Latin libra, a balance, and was used to signify a standard by which to weigh the precious metals, the name of the weight being derived from the Roman pondo—a pound. But in the time of Henry VIII the pound sterling, which had been used as a standard for money, was superseded by another pound, brought from Cairo, in Egypt, to Troyes, in France, during the crusades. It was probably owing to the ancient hatred of Briton and Gaul that this Troyes weight was not definitely adopted in England until it was carried there by Venetian goldsmiths, about the year 1496. When it was so adopted it was probably distinguished from the old sterling or easterling pound by adding to the pound mark "L" two strokes of the pen, to represent the "pillars of Hercules," the common money symbol in the Mediterranean. But as the lower arm of the "L" was the shortest, a symmetrical written character would be made more easily by changing the pillars from the perpendicular to the horizontal.

Why Women Admire Men.

A source of never failing wonder to the average man is the average woman's admiration for him. Precisely what there is about his hairy and cigar-scented person that attracts a sweet-breathed woman, he can not divine. And the average man is apt to laugh at the average woman for the choice she makes when she falls in love. For the man who is loved of woman is he of fine manners, of considerable conceit and a soft voice, and of these qualities the average man considers not the first and despises the other two. He knows that good manners are a part of good morals, but is apt to think that an excess of this sort of morality denotes a corresponding deficiency of some other sort. The average man realizes, more than the average woman, that without steadiness of character in social life there can be no true friendship, and that fine manners, conceit and a soft voice are not essential to this; and he knows that "he who holds loosely the love of a friend or a brother is unworthy to take upon himself any obligation more sacred or binding." All this accounts for the average man's laugh when his woman friend falls in love with—somebody else.

The man popular with women is seldom popular with men. This does not seem to be due so much to any feeling of jealousy as to the fact that the man popular with women is quite often a shade selfish, and will seek admiration even if his friends are for the time cut off from the sunshine of his fine manners. More than this, "moderate people—those who ponder carefully, who see many sides of a subject, who are able to appreciate the good points of their enemies and the failings of their friends, who strive to be accurate and just more than to be effective and striking—are seldom so popular and so attractive as those who put force and brilliance and sparkle into the foreground;" and the average man dislikes to see real worth outshone by superficiality. And then often the man popular with women is set down as a fool, because "a fool always finds some one more foolish than himself to admire him." It has been said that if you want a man to do his best, shut him up where he'll never see a woman, and, doubtless, it has been thought that since the ladies' man sees them so much he must be a sort of a "poor stick" when it comes to a question of man's respect for man. At any rate, "love breeds not with ambition," and it is the ambitious man whom men like, and that's doubtless the amount of it.

It is curious that the same rule does not hold good for women and men. The woman popular with men is, in nearly every case, popular with women. Whether this is due to woman's superior sweetness of character, or to the fact that woman's popularity with woman is based upon qualities almost opposite to those essential to man's popularity with man, is a question which ladies' men and popular girls may decide. This paper is written by an unpopular man, so no offense need be taken; or, if there is, no harm will be done, when we say that certain it is, old maids, school teachers, and "slow" girls are generally unpopular with their sex; men of the same stamp are almost invariably popular with men. J. S. Blackie has said: "Life is an earnest business, and no man was ever made great or good by a diet of broad grins." To a woman, and especially to a young woman, this is not evident.—Drake's Magazine.

The Bald Knobbers.

To understand the history of the society in Missouri known as the Bald Knobbers, it is necessary to go back to the early settlement of that state. In the southwestern part of the state there is a mountainous district comprising about a dozen counties. This country was first settled about three generations ago by the ancestors of the present Bald Knobbers. These people had come from the mountain regions of the Carolinas, western Virginia, and eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, in which localities they had been known as "po' white trash," the general term then given by the planters and negroes to non-slaveholding whites. Coming to Missouri with little wealth save their horses, shotguns, and family carts, they found a home to their fancy in the Ozark mountains. Here, as farther east, they found themselves the scorn of the wealthy planters on the low lands adjoining them, but the mountain recesses abounded in game, and the hillsides gave their hardy cattle abundant and cheap pasture, and they lived in peace and comparative plenty until the civil war broke out. All these men were Douglas democrats, and they declared themselves decidedly on the side of the Union. They became known as the "Mountain Feds," and under their leader, William Monks, they struck many a blow against the power of the guerrillas. After the coming of peace civilization began making its way into the Ozark mountains in a manner that the "Mountain Feds" did not at all approve of. Railroads were built, and settlers began to find out that the large tracts of land that these mountaineers had so long held as their own, were still open for settlement under the homestead law. They pushed in and began taking up the land, in utter disregard of the holdings of the inhabitants. The mountaineers did not understand it; they could not at all comprehend how strangers could have a right to take the land on which their huts stood and their cattle grazed; and, furthermore, they did not mean to submit to it. They formed a secret society to resist and drive out the homesteaders, and called themselves Bald Knobbers, taking their name from the Bald Knob, a desolate peak in Fane County. At first they tried intimidation of the new settlers only. Then they grew bolder, and committed depredations. Finally, they killed two men that had withstood them, and this brought about the arrest of a large number of the leaders of the society, and their trial for their lawless deeds.

The Great Serpent Mound.

This mound is one of the prehistoric monuments of the country. It is situated in Adams county, Ohio. It is a long earthen embankment on the edge of a bluff 100 feet high, and throughout the greater part of its course it has the waved outline of a snake, while the tail is coiled in a spiral like a watch spring. The head of the serpent is represented with wide-open mouth, and in front of it is an oval figure about ninety feet long, apparently resting on the distended jaws; and still beyond there is an object which has been supposed to resemble a jumping frog. The length of the serpent is about 1,300 feet; measurements made of it vary considerably, because of the difficulty of following the center of the curving outline. There was once quite a heavy growth of timber on this mound, but it was blown down by a tornado in 1859. The embankment constituting the serpent is upward of five feet high by thirty feet broad at the center of the body, diminishing somewhat toward the head and tail. The embankment forming the oval is about four feet high. This curious figure has been supposed by some to represent the original cosmological idea of the serpent and the egg. Some have supposed that this mound was erected to commemorate a great battle; others that it had a religious significance. Whatever it was made for, it may be regarded as one of the most remarkable of the prehistoric monuments in this country. It has been purchased as a public park. The well-known archaeologist, Professor W. T. Putnam, of Cambridge, has been the mover in the scheme, and has been aided by some wealthy ladies of the east. Sixty acres adjoining the mound have also been purchased, and the purpose is to enclose it all and have it cared for as a park.

Bones in the Human Body.

Well may we exclaim with the Psalmist: "For I am fearfully and wonderfully made," when even science in the nineteenth century is unable to say with certainty how many bones there are in the human body. Eminent specialists vary the number from 206 to 260. The difference may arise from simple or compound reckoning, or may depend upon whether the bones counted are those of a child, of a middle-aged person, or of a very old person. But who shall decide when doctors disagree? According to Hebrew authority, although the touching of a dead body involved ceremonial uncleanness, they did not entirely neglect anatomy, which was studied from the carefully preserved bones of their ancestors. The Hebrew physicians counted 248 bones and 365 ligaments, which division was believed to have relation to the 248 precepts of the Mosaic law that command and 365 that forbid.

Lake Michigan was frozen over, from shore to shore, February 17 and 18, 1885. The ice was from one to thirty feet in thickness on the east shore, and there were dams of ice between Milwaukee and the Haven to heights varying from fifty to sixty feet. For about six nights the temperature ranged between twenty degrees and thirty degrees below zero. A steam propeller named the Michigan was locked up in the ice twenty-three miles from land, and the crew reached South Haven on February 18th on the ice.

The steamship City of Paris is in length 580 feet; in breadth, 63½; in depth, 59½, and horse power, 20,000. The steamship Teutonic is in length 582 feet; in breadth, 57½; in depth, 39½. The City of Paris appears to be broader and deeper than the Teutonic, but the Teutonic is two feet longer than the City of Paris. These are two of the largest steamers afloat.

Call a girl a spring chicken and she will laugh; call a woman a hen and she gets mad. Call a young lady a witch and she will enjoy it; call an old woman a witch and your life will be in danger. Call a girl a kitten and she won't take it unkindly; call a woman a cat and she will hate you. Remarkable sex.

FLASHES.

Too much beer is apt to put men at lager-heads.

The roughest roads are those we have not traveled over.

The devil hates the man who minds his own business.

When we hear a man boast it is evidence of inferiority.

The man born in a cabin may some day name a cabinet.

A fellow who borrows books is usually a good bookkeeper.

You can't size up an orator by the dimensions of his mouth.

A belle should have a ringing voice—she often wrings hearts.

Indiscreet conduct, even of a society woman, is not forgotten.

Many handkerchiefs are moistened by sorrows that never occur.

It always looks boorish for a woman to use a tooth-pick in public.

Woman's sweet disposition is always shown by her husband's long hair.

A politician left alone with his conscience sees mighty little company.

A bridge should never be condemned until it has been tried by its piers.

In diving to the bottom of pleasures we bring up more gravel than pearls.

Hope builds a nest in man's heart where disappointment hatches its brood.

A kiss is nothing but compressed air; it, however, often causes an explosion.

Women are not inventive as a rule. They have no eagerness for new wrinkles.

That a woman is a paradox 'tis clear; We always find her distant when she's near.

Minds of moderate calibre ordinarily condemn everything which is beyond their range.

The fellow who has the worst reputation is always the one loudest against having it injured.

The early Christians were broken on the wheel. Many of the visitors to the late fair were served likewise.

A Beautiful Custom.

In some portions of Tirol a peculiar and beautiful custom still prevails. When a girl is about to be married, before she leaves her home to go to the church, her mother hands her a kerchief, which is called a tear kerchief. It is made of newly spun linen, and has never been used. It is with this kerchief that she dries her tears when she leaves her father's house, and while she stands at the altar. After the marriage is over and the bride has gone with her husband to their own new home, she folds up the kerchief and places it unwashed in her linen closet, where it remains untouched.

The tear kerchief has only performed half of its mission. Children are born, grow up, marry, and move away from the old home. Each daughter receives from the mother a new tear kerchief. Her own still remains where it was placed in the linen closet on the day of the marriage. Generations come and go. The young rosy bride has become a wrinkled old woman. She may have survived her husband and all her children. All her friends may have died off, and still that last present which she received from her mother has not fulfilled its object.

But it comes at last. At last the weary eyelids close for the long, long sleep, and the tired wrinkled hands are folded over the pulseless heart. Then the tear kerchief is taken from its place and spread over the placid features of the dead, never to be removed until we are summoned to come forth on the resurrection morn.—Texas Siftings.

Lincoln's Prophecy.

The prophecy of President Lincoln, made by him in a private letter to a friend in Illinois, has been frequently quoted, but cannot be too frequently read and pondered over. He said:

"Yes, we may all congratulate ourselves that the cruel war is nearing a close. It has cost a vast amount of treasure and blood. The best blood of the flower of American youth has been freely offered upon our country's altar that the nation might live. It has, indeed, been a trying hour for the republic, but I see in the near future a crisis arising that unnerves me, and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned, an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the republic destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of war. God grant that my suspicions may prove groundless."—Chicago Journal.

The Treatment of Inebriates.

Medical experts in the treatment of insane persons have for many years protested against the inhumanity of efforts to cure dipsomaniacs and confirmed inebriates by fines and imprisonment. We now have almost literally no discrimination in our treatment of persons arrested for being drunk. The lad arrested for the first time, and the old "rounder" who faces the court for the hundredth time, are served alike. A fine is imposed; if not paid, they are sent to work it out in the correctional institution. In a few cases where friends of means and influence interest themselves the inebriate is treated in a private asylum for inebriates or some lunatic hospital; but the great body are all classed together; fine follows fine, and imprisonment follows imprisonment, and the man or woman who enters upon the career by a first arrest seems bound to continue in it until the community and the victim are both relieved by the drunkard's death. Nearly all medical testimony is to the effect that a certain class of inebriates have passed the point where their inebriety is a vice or a crime, if it is ever so, and reached a condition of disease which they can no more control than the typhoid fever patient can control his fever. This class needs curative and reformatory treatment; for such we should have special hospitals, to treat such cases and no other. Persons of this class are never properly sent to correctional institutions, either for longer or shorter periods; neither should they be sent for treatment to lunatic hospitals or insane asylums. All persons arrested for drunkenness should be detained before trial long enough to make a complete investigation of their antecedents. If found to belong to the dipsomaniac class, they should be sent to the hospital especially provided for the cure of that disease; if arrested for the first time, and it appears they are regularly employed, they should be allowed to go free as soon as they become sober, with an admonition not to be arrested again; for a second offense a little longer detention should be inflicted, and some effort should be made to place the person under the restraint of some friends or of a probation officer; for a third offense within three years the defendant should be committed to an institution where he would be compelled to labor for a period of at least three months. Such institutions should have officers fitted to bring moral influence to bear upon the inmates to build up their will power, that they may be able to withstand temptation when released. For those who have been committed more than five times within three years a sentence of not less than two years should be imposed, to still another institution, where labor and mental and moral discipline are rigidly enforced. For the hardened offenders who spend eleven months out of every twelve in our institutions, who are never sober for more than a few days at a time, there should be no question about shutting them up for long terms, instead of arriving at a similar result by a dozen different arrests and convictions in a single year, as now. By putting this class away for long terms society will protect itself in many ways: it will relieve itself from the danger which their presence in the community threatens; the assaults, breaches of the peace, thefts, burglaries and murders they may commit would be prevented, society would be saved from their tainted offsprings, and the taxpayers would save the considerable difference between their treatment on this plan and under the present system. The writer is not a medical expert, but is situated so as to be a constant observer of the working of the present system of treating drunkards in one of our large cities, and feels no hesitation in saying that he believes if the authorities were to endeavor to invent a scheme for permanently destroying the usefulness of every person who happens to be arrested for drunkenness for the first time they would labor long before they could improve upon our present system.—L. Edwin Dudley in the Century.

Sense of Taste of Insects.

Insects, like other animals, are gifted with a discriminating sense of taste; and there is a large scope for such discrimination in the varying quality of the human blood upon which these pests make their repast. It is, of course, well known that the blood is composed of several distinct ingredients, the chief being water, albumen, salts, iron and the crimson pigment. It can easily be understood that an excess of any one constituent makes the blood more or less distasteful to the insect's palate, especially in the nature of salt. It is probably the albuminous matter from which they derive their nutriment; and this varies not only in different individuals, but in different conditions of health and climate. People whose food is largely farinaceous, and their blood abundantly albuminous, are more greedily attacked than others.

There is a great deal of kindly feeling among the working classes, and they correspond better than the rich with the scriptural injunction, "Bear ye one another's burdens." At a first-class hotel, for instance, when one of the chambermaids is sick the others divide her work, so that she may not lose any part of her wages.

How Do You Dot Your I's?

Do you put the dot high above the letter i? Do you put it close to the letter? Do you send it flying before? Is it fat, round, irregular? These are the questions of a master in the art of deciphering character from handwriting.

In each case your peculiarity is the outward and visible sign of some idiosyncrasy. Look at the dots of your i: try to make them different—smaller, larger, rounder, more oblong—you cannot do it. The dot above the i only changes with your character.

If you often forget to dot your i you will also forget other things which seem unimportant to you, but which for the comfort of every-day life are as necessary as the dot is to the i. If you have often to look in vain for the dot, you will also look often in vain for other things because you have not put them in their proper place.

If the dot flies high above and far away from the letter to which it belongs, your hopes, thoughts, wishes and aspirations are apt to fly about in far-off regions, and instead of making practical use of the present day you dream of the ideals of the future. If this "high-flown" dot is of an oblong shape, and if, in conjunction with it, the loops of your l, h, g, f, etc., are loose and long, then good-by symmetry and calm, for you have very little self-control.

If your husband's dots are heavy, shapeless and blotchy, you will have a hard time of it where food is concerned. He will not be satisfied with a cold supper, an æsthetic tea or a meal of beef and vegetables. On the other hand, you have in his favorite dishes a means to pacify the grumbler and to incline him to listen to your wishes.

Your request for a new gown, for theater tickets, which was peremptorily refused before dinner, is listened to with much more interest after the man of the heavy dots has had a good meal. Never ask such a man to grant you a favor when he is waiting for his dinner. The larger the dots appear, the more critically a dish will be attacked and judged. Carlsbad, during the time when the patients go to drink their waters, is full of people who dot their i's heavily.

The dainty dot, on the other hand, if it goes together with a handwriting that consists of thin strokes only, denotes a mind above "these things."

Such a "dainty-dot" husband will be easily satisfied with his meals. He will hardly know what he is eating. You can get nothing "out of him" by giving him a dainty dish. He may even offend you by scant praise when you happen to have prepared a dish with your own hands.

It may even happen—if other geographical signs agree—that such a "dainty-dotter" forgets his meal times altogether, allows everything to get cold, does not eat nor praise nor blame, and spoils the pleasures of the table for himself and others.—Edelweiss in Von Tels Zum Meer.

Deaths of the Apostles.

St. Matthew, of whose history even less is known than of the other apostles, is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, or to have been slain with a sword in Ethiopia. St. Mark was dragged through the streets of Alexandria, in Egypt, till he died. St. Luke was hanged upon an olive tree in Greece. St. John was put in a caldron of boiling oil at Rome, and escaped death. He afterward died a natural death at Ephesus, in Asia. St. James the Great was beheaded at Jerusalem. St. James the Less was thrown from a pinnacle or wing of the temple, and then beaten to death with a fuller's club. St. Philip was hanged up against a pillar at Hierapolis, a city of Phrygia. St. Bartholomew was flayed alive by the command of a barbarous king. St. Andrew was bound to a cross, whence he preached to the people until he expired. St. Thomas was run through the body with a lance at Coromandel, in the East Indies. St. Jude was shot to death with arrows. St. Simon Zealot was crucified in Persia. St. Matthias was first stoned and then beheaded. St. Barnabas was stoned to death by the Jews at Salamina. St. Paul was beheaded at Rome by the tyrant Nero. St. Peter was crucified, head downward it is said, during the Neronian persecution.

How and Where Marbles are Made.

Almost all the "marbles" with which boys amuse themselves in season and out of season, on pavements and in shady spots, are made at Oberstein, Germany. There are many large agate quarries and mills in that neighborhood, and the refuse is turned to good account in providing the small stone balls for experts to "knuckle down" with. The stone is broken into small cubes by blows of a light hammer. These small blocks of stone are thrown by the shovelful into the hopper of a small mill, formed of a bedstone having its surface grooved with concentric furrows; above this is a "runner," which is of hard wood, having a level face on its lower surface. The upper block is made to revolve rapidly, water being delivered upon the grooves of the bedstone where the marbles are being rounded. It takes about fifteen minutes to finish a bushel of good marbles ready for the boys' knuckles. One mill will turn out 160,000 per week.—Cornhill Magazine.

MISCELLANY.

When Emperor William talks about letting loose the war dogs he muzzles the press.

"Tommy," said mamma, tearfully, "it gives me as much pain as it does you to punish you." Tommy, also tearfully—"Mebbe it does, but not in the same place."

Patient—What kept you away so long, doctor? I've waited for you for five hours. Country Doctor—Why, the fact is my wife was busy curing hams and needed my assistance. Patient—She ought to have called other help if she wanted 'em cured, and I'll tell her so.

It is said that a piece of zinc placed on the live coals in a hot stove will effectually clean out a stovepipe, the vapors produced carrying off the soot by chemical decomposition. This is a useful thing to know for those who burn wood and are fearful of chimney fires. It is at least worth a trial.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—TAKE Notice.—That on the 30th day of October, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 1811 to 1821, inclusive. The nature of the business to be conducted by me is keeping a dairy and selling milk; the place of my said business is Sacramento County, Sutter Township, and the name of my husband is J. L. Clark. KATIE E. CLARK.

se26-5t

DON'T BE CARELESS ABOUT YOUR COMPLEXION

It is woman's chiefest physical charm. It is often her only capital. It is always worth a great deal to her in business, love or social affairs. No matter how browned, or rough or sallow your skin may be, or how much it is disfigured with freckles, moths, patches, blackheads or pimples

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

will remove every blemish and leave your skin as pure and clear and white as it was in baby days. Your complexion will then be as nature made it. Instructions go with each bottle how to keep it so. Price $1.50. All druggists sell it.

Fine Table Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancashire, England.
1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

The Graves of Heroes.

Tread softly, for the place whereon
We tread is holy ground,
Where love and duty see a shrine
In each low, grassy mound.

Like white tents on a battle-field
The snowy marble gleams;
Within those walls no sound of strife
Disturb the soldiers' dreams.

We come to honor our brave dead—
These soldier boys of ours;
Let bitter memories of the past
Be buried 'neath the flowers.

Bring tender thoughts and loving words
For each who lieth low;
Strew the same blossoms, wet with tears,
Alike on friend and foe.

Heap high the flowers on their bed,
Cover each grassy mound;
Then leave them, in their dreamless sleep,
On their last camping ground.

Not of the Literature.

"It was—oh, many years ago," said an ex-reporter, "when I was on the journalistic stage on a certain paper that I was directed to obtain an interview upon 'The Element of Realism in Modern Literature.'"

"But whom shall I see?" I asked, with painful precision.

"Anybody!" roared the city editor, who was out of humor. "Get the views of some wood sawyer, if you like."

"It so happened that I was acquainted with a knight of the sawbuck. I found him, and late at night handed in the following effusion:

"The morning sun was climbing up the eastern wall of the heavens, shedding its benignant beams upon the denizens of this sub-lunary sphere, as a representative of the — started out in quest of information upon a subject of thrilling interest, and one which, until now, has been beclouded in mystery. The subject, it is perhaps unnecessary to say, is 'The Element of Realism in Modern Literature.' To whom should we go for light on so abstruse a matter if not the venerable Mr. De Smith, the well-known wood sawyer? To whom, indeed! The — representative weeded his way toward the homestead of De Smith, brushing with hasty steps the early morning dew from the city sidewalks. It was one of those mornings when one feels the life-blood churning with effervescent force through one's veins and arteries; when one's step is light and springy, and when one experiences in full force the glow of existence. Ere long the venerable wood-sawyer was found. He was clad in picturesque attire, consisting of well patched overalls, check shirt, straw hat and boots, all designed for comfort rather than beauty. His figure stood out against the blue ether like rugged pine in a desert waste.

"Finally, the all-important question was propounded: 'What is your opinion of the element of realism in modern literature?'"

"The wot?" exclaimed De Smith.

"What is your opinion of the element of realism in modern literature?"

"If I know, and — if I care."

And with that De Smith began to saw wood with a strained expression of earnestness upon his weather beaten visage that warned the —'s representative to depart.

"It is not necessary to relate what the city editor said," added the veracious informant

One of the largest pearl-fishing grounds in the world is in the Gulf of California. "The pearls," says a correspondent, "are not generally regular in shape or very pure in color, but some are of large size; and many of the rare black pearls are found. The divers are nearly all Indians, and their equipment is of the simplest kind, consisting only of a basket hung around the neck, in which to collect the oysters, a knife to detach them from the rocks, and a stone with a cord attached. When a diver goes down he takes the cord between his toes, the weight of the stone carrying him at once to the bottom. He gathers oysters as long as his breath holds out, and then rises to the surface, to descend again in fifteen minutes. Some of the divers are wonderfully expert and can remain under water for as much as two minutes before rising to the surface. The mortality among them is fearful, for the Gulf of California is infested with huge man-eating sharks, who carry off scores of men every year."

The singular and various senses of words in the English language are seen in the following words and their meanings: A sleeper is one who sleeps. Therefore, while the sleeper sleeps in the sleeper, the sleeper carries the sleeper over the sleeper under the sleeper until the sleeper which carries the sleeper jumps the sleeper and wakes the sleeper in the sleeper by striking the sleeper on the sleeper, and there is no longer any sleeper sleeping in the sleeper on the sleeper.

The origin of "windfall," in the sense of "good luck," dates from the time of William the Conqueror. It was then a criminal offense to cut timber in the forests. Only such could be gathered as the wind had blown down; hence a heavy windstorm was hailed by the peasants as so much good luck; and from this comes the modern application of the expression.

The Earliest Sunday Schools.

The earliest recorded Sunday schools were the schools of Catechumens, organized, says Tertullian, in the year 180. They flourished until the sixth century. Martin Luther established schools for Sunday pupils who could not attend the day schools. This was in 1527. John Knox inaugurated similar schools in Scotland in 1560. France, Italy, the Netherlands, all had Sunday schools in the seventeenth century. In America, Roxbury, Mass., had a Sunday school in 1674, and Ephrata, Pa., had one in 1740, which continued until the building in which it was held was taken for a hospital in the time of the revolutionary war. These all were different from the present modern Sunday school, which was organized by Robert Raikes in 1781. He gathered poor and destitute children who were without any religious instruction, from the streets and alleys of Gloucester, England, and employed women teachers at a shilling a day to instruct them. The children were taught from 10 A. M. to 12; then, after an hour's recess, they read a lesson and went to church. After church they repeated the catechism until 5 P. M. The change from paid to volunteer teachers is said to have been the good work of the Methodists at Bolton, England, about 1786. After this the churches began to assume charge of Sunday schools.

Don't Take a Lady's Arm.

Ladies, a word to you on a very important subject: The next time any one of you goes out walking with a masculine escort and that escort catches you by the arm, whether grasping it above the elbow or making a scoop of his hand and holding your arm at and below the elbow, snub him then and there. He is ill-bred if he attempt such a familiarity, and nothing but a snub will cure ill-breeding. No spirited lady should permit such a thing. It is becoming altogether too common, and a few well-directed snubs will be necessary to cure the custom. Take his arm if he offer it in a gentlemanly way and there is no reason why you should not take it, but do not permit the vulgarity first spoken of. A French correspondent says, apropos of this: "The late M. Meissonier, though a great artist, was a small man physically, while his second wife was said to be the largest woman in Paris. Very shortly after they were married they went out walking, and madame offered her arm to her husband. So deeply was the sensitive nature of the artist wounded that the relations of the newly wedded pair were almost ruptured, and he scarcely forgave his wife."

Since the day when Newton illustrated by the fall of an apple to the earth the law of gravitation and the retention of the planets in their regular orbits about the sun, solar science has made wonderful strides. Patient investigators, aided by the marvelous products of human invention, have scanned the depths of space and widened our conceptions of the vast forces and activities which pervade the universe. The influence of the sun and moon upon the earth and the relations between light and electricity have long been favorite subjects for scientists, while at the same time they are so intimately associated with every form of life upon this planet that everything which leads to a clearer understanding of the principles involved in them is of deep interest to all thinking minds. We have long ago outgrown the superstition which attached evil influences to the planets, and are ready to admit with Cassius that "the fault is not in our stars but in ourselves that we are underlings." And yet if we no longer cast horoscopes nor believe "Tis Jupiter brings everything that's good and Venus that brings everything that's fair," the new astronomy has shown us that the most distant planet may have the greatest influence on the life, not of the individual but of the world, than was ever dreamed of by astrologer or soothsayer.

Nay, nay, my boy—'tis not for me,
This oriental pomp and luxury;
Give me no linen napkins—fine
The while I dine.

Nor seek to linger where the chef loud blows
His bulbous nose.

Earnest I beg naught but a sandwich bring,
Or, at the most, a tender pullet's wing;
Oblige me, please, by humoring my whim;
My pocket-book is mighty slim.

So bring a sweitzer sandwich and a beer,
And I must fain put up with frugal cheer.

The Crown Princess of Denmark, only daughter of the late King Charles XV of Sweden, is a superb woman. Her wit and intelligence have won for her the friendship of many brilliant men, while her striking beauty is the admiration of Denmark. She and the Queen of Portugal are the tallest two princesses in Europe.

A colored brother gives the following as his views on ambition: "It doan' do to hab too much ambition, deah breddren. I hab known men who hab reached de top rung ob de ladder ob fame, an' in tryin' to go one step higher dey only succeeded in fallin' off on de udder side into de abyss ob obsolescence."

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND

SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO

OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,

SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a thorough education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Guttenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,

Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than J. SLAUGHTER, Sixth and M streets.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN, Formerly of Agricultural Park.

KEEP YOUR EYE

On the Window.

CHANGED DAILY DURING FAIR WEEK.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

UNCLE IKE'S

COLLATERAL o LOAN o OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St.

SACRAMENTO

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY.

Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

Atlas Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn. $10,000,000.00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 5,750,000.00
German-American Insurance Co. 5,000,000.00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York 11,729,400.00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York 774,559.20

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC

HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. TEMPS'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER.

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

Sarah Ann In a Rage.

Upon the kitchen table, with her work unfinished yet,
Sat Sarah Ann, intent upon a thrilling novelette.
The baker and the groceryman knocked loudly, but in vain;
Then kicked the paint all off the door and went away again.
The fire went out, the light grew dim, but Sarah Ann read on,
Intent upon the fortune of Lord Algernon Fitzjohn,
Whose proud and wealthy father designed his son and heir
For the beauty of the season, the Lady Maud de Vere.
She loved him, but Lord Algernon, much to his pa's distress,
Disliked the Lady Maud and loved a modest governess.
She came to where the beauty accidentally o'erhears
This willful lord proposing to the governess, who fears
She's unworthy of the honor; but she loves him as her life,
And will do her very best to make a true and worthy wife.
She still reads on; and as she neared the bottom of the page,
She learned how Lady Maud became convulsed with jealous rage,
Forgot herself, and, maddened by the sounds of rapturous kissing,
Sprang forward—Sarah turned the leaf; the other page was missing!

One of the last instances of an order being made for hanging in chains is that of a chimney sweep, who, in 1827, murdered a man on the highway on the east side of Brigg. The culprit was tried by Mr. Justice Best at Lincoln Assizes. At this time what used to be called the new law courts were building, so the Dean and Chapter lent their Chapter House for the purpose of an Assize Court. The trial lasted all day. The poor wretch's body never underwent the proposed indignity. The inhabitants of Brigg took fright—thought, it has been suggested, that the gibbet standing so near the highway would terrify the people and hinder them from coming to market; they petitioned against the Judge's order being carried out, and the authorities remitted the horror. Mr. Harts-horne believes, and we have no doubt correctly, that the last person hung in chains was a man named Cook, who suffered for the murder of a Mr. Paas. This occurred at Leicester, in 1834, the very year that the custom was put an end to by statute.

An invariable custom prevailing among Creole women is to insist that at the marriage ceremony the bridegroom shall receive a narrow, plain gold wedding ring, which he is obliged never to put from the third finger of his left hand until death parts them twain. To be without this seal of wedlock is held shameful in a wife, but now, for the first time, women everywhere are making positive demands for a fair exchange in the matter. These latter-day brides give their liege lords no costly ornament for the hand to attract admiring attention, but severely simple jewels of heavy polished gold, that both weight and purity may be accepted symbolically, and the peculiar style may publish them to the world as Benedicts.

A clock is to be seen at Brussels which comes as near to being a perpetual-motion machine as is likely ever to be invented, for the sun does the winding. A shaft exposed to the solar rays causes an up-draft of air, which sets a fan in motion. The fan acts upon a mechanism which raises the weight of the clock until it reaches the top, and then puts a brake on the fan till the weight has gone down a little, when the fan is again liberated and proceeds to act as before. As long as the sun shines frequently enough and the machinery does not wear out, the clock will keep going.

From Portland, Ind., comes a graphic story about a Hoosier gentleman who fell asleep on a railway track and let an engine come along and scoop the top of his head off and show his brains in the act of wishing for an office. After the accident the injured man arose and walked away without apparent discomfort. In most cases the brain is as vital a part as was Achilles' tendon, but nature has made some men invulnerable all over.

The Boston young woman may be clever, but she sometimes gets beside the mark. One was in Washington last winter for the first time, and, meeting Senator Hoar at a reception, asked him patronizingly if it were his first season in Washington! "It is my twentieth," said the venerable Senator, with dignity, as he turned away, hurt and offended. It seems incredible, but it is true.

Dr. Holmes: A woman's business is to please. I don't say that it is not her business to vote, but I do say that a woman who does not please is a false note in the harmonies of nature.

Modern Geography.

Of what is the surface of the earth composed? Of corner lots, mighty poor roads, railroad tracks, baseball grounds, cricket fields and skating rinks.

What portion of the globe is water? About three-fourths. Sometimes they add a little gin and nutmeg to it.

What is a town? A town is a considerable collection of houses and inhabitants, with four or five men who "run the party" and lend money on 15 per cent. interest.

What is a city? A city is an incorporated town, with a mayor, who believes the whole world shakes when he happens to fall flat on a cross-walk.

What is commerce? Borrowing $5 for a day or two and dodging the lender for a year or two.

Name the different races. Horse race, boat race, bicycle race, and racing around to find a man to indorse your note.

Into how many classes is mankind divided? Six: Being enlightened, civilized, half-civilized, savage, too utter, not worth a cent and Indian agents.

What nations are called enlightened? Those which have the most wars and the worst laws and produce the worst criminals.

How many motions has the earth? That's according to how you mix your drinks and which way you go home.

What is the earth's axis? The lines passing between New York and San Francisco.

What causes day and night? Day is caused by night getting tired out. Night is caused by everybody taking the street cars and going home to supper.

What is a map? A map is a drawing to show the jury where Smith stood when Jones gave him one under the eye.

What is a mariner's compass? A jug holding four gallons.—Galveston Tribune.

Getting Down to the Fight.

Three or four youngsters were playing on the dock when a quarrel arose.

"I ain't no kid!" exclaimed one, "and you shan't call me that."

"You are, too," urged the aggressor.

"I ain't; I'm as big as you are."

"You're a kid, just the same."

"I ain't, neither."

"You are."

"I ain't."

"Yes, you are; for I heard my pap say your pap was a regular old goat that came home full every night. And if your pap's a goat what are you but a kid?"

And then the fight began.

A clever writer calls attention to the baleful influence of summer gossip—at least of the kind indulged in by languid men and women at some of the fashionable watering places. It is so easy for criticisms of one's neighbors to become coarse and unkind; for little-tattle to run into riotous exaggeration until it culminates in slander. Cheap literature and summer gossip are responsible for more evil results than those who indulge in them would believe. One prolific source of gossip is fashion. Wrong fashion is the world's undertaker. It drives thousands in hearses to the cemeteries. But worse than all, it is the cause of intellectual depletion. The endless study of proprieties and patterns is dwarfing to the mind. It is worth noting that a man or woman of fashion is rarely known to study much. Their field of thought seldom leads them beyond the cut of a gown or the color of a ribbon or of a cravat. A new style of coat sends them into ecstasies or a faint. How much better life would be, how much broader and healthier, without such devotion to trifles.

Race prejudice in the United States is not a whit stronger than in India, where the British, after occupying the country for generations, still despise the natives of whatever caste. This contempt is extended to even the Caucasian born and brought up in India. The child born to British parents in India and not sent to Europe to be educated is called "country born," and the term is one of distinct opprobrium. It is the unanimous testimony of Europeans that one never really penetrates the Oriental. Whatever a man's culture, whatever his intimacy with the European, something is still kept back. The charm of mystery with which Kipling invests his stories of Indian life mirrors the feeling of resident Europeans toward the surrounding dark brown ocean, to which they are only as alien drops.

The iron age was an age of higher civilization and merges into the age in which we live. When men commenced to work in iron every experiment they tried added to its value; and as their knowledge of the metal and its uses increased they advanced in civilization. Warlike as they were, they made knives, axes, helmets, and coats-of-mail. But at the same time they made the tools for the field and utensils for home use—the gentler implements that were to triumph in the end. They put the true precious metal, iron, daily to new uses, and probably man has not yet found out all the ways in which it can be used.

In days of old, when knights were bold,
And ladies passing fair,
They captured every common scold
And doused her in a chair.

Red Roses Made Green.

A French scientist has announced the results of some interesting experiments made upon flowers when under the influence of sulphuric ether and ammonia. When subjected to this mixture, violets and roses turned green. A glass is filled with the mixture, the proportion of sulphuric ether to the ammonia being as nine to one, and the flowers are plunged into the liquid. White flowers turn yellow, red geraniums turn blue, the upper petal of the sweet pea turns dark blue and the lower petal a bright green. The flowers may be very prettily spotted with the mixture by placing drops of it upon the flowers where desired.

When the flowers are plunged into pure water they retain their new colors for several hours; after that they imperceptibly regain their natural colors.

In spite of his old age, Prince Bismarck has lost none of his gallantry. To a young lady who lately asked to be allowed to kiss his hand he replied: "Oh, no! that is not good enough for so charming a damsel." Whereupon his excellency, without further ado, gave the young lady a kiss. The prince is very active in business matters when at home on his estate. His income from his mills and other industrial works is reported to be upward of $50,000 a year.

A. L. HART,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON. ALBERT M. JOHNSON.
HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON,
LAWYERS,
504 J Street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR.,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER,
LAWYERS,
Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG,
LAWYER,
Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER,
LAWYER,
920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney),
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
N.W. corner Sixth and K.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor. E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor, having applied to this Court for a discharge from his debts, it is hereby ordered that the Clerk of this Court give notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, to appear before this Court, at the court-room thereof, on the 2d day of October, 1891, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock, P. M., and show cause, if any they have, why the said E. M. Stevens should not be discharged from all his debts, in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided. It is further ordered, that notice of said application be given to the creditors by mail, and by publication for four weeks in the THEMIS, a newspaper published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated September 3d, 1891.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. sep3-4t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of F. L. Bates, an insolvent debtor. F. L. Bates, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said F. L. Bates is hereby declared to be insolvent. All persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association, for his use, and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the county of Sacramento, on the 31st day of October, 1891, at 1:30 P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, September 3d, A. D. 1891.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Filed September 3d, 1891.
W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
CLINTON L. WHITE, Attorney for Petitioner. sep5-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 15th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

A. P. CATLIN,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated August 13th, 1891.
JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and $\frac{1}{2}$ Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for \$1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.
W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. DOODY, Deputy Clerk.
W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint. In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. DOODY, Deputy Clerk.
ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jv18-8t

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO, State of California.—In the matter of the Columbus Brewing Company, a corporation, an insolvent debtor. An adjudication of insolvency herein having been duly made, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the 23d day of October, 1891, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., at the court-room of this Court, in Department No. 1, in the city of Sacramento, be and the same are the time and place, appointed for the meeting of the creditors to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the city of Sacramento, at least once a week during the period prior to the time appointed for the meeting of creditors.

A. P. CATLIN,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated this 17th day of September, 1891.
A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Attorneys for Petitioners.

Millais' First Sale.

The story of how Sir John Millais sold his first picture is being told. It seems that at that time the artist was badly in need of money; his parents were poor, and their demands, no less than his own, made it necessary for him to secure all the money he could lay his hands to. Just then Millais was engaged upon his "Ferdinand and Ariel," and he accorded a view to a certain dealer, who professed to be delighted with the work. "It is charming," cried the dealer. "If, when it is finished, it pleases me as much as I think it will, I will give you £100 for it." This set the young artist nearly wild with joy; he hastened to tell his parents, and the old folks went into ecstasies, too.

Taking it for granted that the money could be depended upon, the little family indulged in luxuries which otherwise they would have denied themselves, and, sure of his purchaser, Millais was in no hurry to finish the picture. When, however, the work was done and the buyer came to inspect it, that critical gentleman regretted that it did not fulfill the bright promise of its inception; and, therefore, he could not bind the bargain.

This denouement threw the Millais family into a paroxysm of dismay. What upon earth were they to do? Sure of the money, they had anticipated its coming by fat living and a good time generally. Now, all at once, they were compelled to shut down upon everything that might be counted a luxury, and the severest policy of retrenchment was reverted to. In this extremity the mother, properly in the mood to do her share towards helping the common cause, determined to take lodgers. Accordingly she exhibited from one of the front windows a placard announcing that those requiring bed and board might find accommodation within. This expedient galled young Millais' pride to such a degree that he fell into a condition of melancholy, from which, however, he was one day aroused by the arrival of another dealer, who brought with him a quaint old gentleman whom he introduced as a Mr. Ellison, a connoisseur. With apparent interest this old gentleman examined Millais' picture, and with great interest listened to the story of the young artist's disappointment; for, being attracted by the old gentleman's benignant and kindly manner, Millais told of his experience with the first dealer.

"So he promised you £100, did he?" said the old gentleman. "Well, you should have paid no heed to anything he said until the picture was ready for sale. Your inexperience has brought this trouble upon you. Now, I have here a little book of advice to young artists, and I'm going to give it to you to read; it will be of great service to you—so promise me that you will read it at once."

Withdrawing to the desk, the old gentleman took the book from his pocket and wrote his name therein. Then he handed the volume to Millais. "There, young man," said he, "when you have read this you will thank me. It is the best I can do for you at present."

After the quaint old man had departed the young artist mechanically opened the book, curious, perhaps, to see wherein lay the value of which the stranger spoke so highly—and lo! there fell from the leaves thereof an order for the picture and a check for 150 guineas!

Millais eyes filled with tears. Seizing the check he rushed down-stairs into the room where his mother sat.

"Take it down—take it down, mother!" he cried, exultantly.

"Why, John; what ails you? Take what down!" asked the old lady.

"Take that lodgings sign down! I've got the money and we're all rich again!" he cried.

The sign came down and happiness fell upon that household. This was the first sale Millais made. But it was not the first act of kindness done by old Mr. Ellison. This worthy man delighted in generous deeds and he loved to discover and assist the meritorious in art. His collection of paintings was exceptionally large and fine, and at his death he bequeathed it to the Fitzwilliam Museum, at Cambridge.—Frank Leslie's.

There is one place in the world, namely, the peninsula of Athos in the Aegean Sea, in European Turkey, where women are unknown, and, therefore, where there are no girls born, because there are no births of any kind. The population is 6000, all monks, who form a kind of monastic republic, consisting of twenty large monasteries, besides numerous hermitages and chapels. The whole community is governed by an administrative body of four presidents, one styled "First Man of Athos," and a representative body called the Holy Synod, consisting of twenty members, one from each monastery. They enjoy complete autonomy, subject to paying the Turkish Government an annual tribute of about £3500. The monks follow the rule of St. Basil, and lead an ascetic life, restricting their diet to herbs, fruit and fish. They are employed in agriculture, gardening, the care of bees and the manufacture of amulets, images, crucifixes and wooden articles of furniture, which they sell, while they also reap profits from the numerous visits of pilgrims. No female is permitted to enter the peninsula.—American Catholic News.

W. D. Comstock, 501--507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

Imperial GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,
Between Fourth and Fifth,
SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,
Book and Job Printers,
410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,
Photographic Art Parlors
426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK
Restaurant and Oyster House
- 1019 SECOND STREET,
Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.
First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.
BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.
1022 FOURTH STREET.
Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.
Importers and Wholesale Dealers in
Wines and Liquors.
CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.
116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,
SACRAMENTO, CAL.
JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.
Artificial Stone Sidewalks
Latest Designs and First-class Work.
Estimates Furnished for Residences.
Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

August 2, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

LV.	Trains Run Daily.	ARR.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	1.42 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.10 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.00 A
4.35 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.00 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	5.5 A
11.50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5.25 A
	Ogden and East
3.00 P	Oroville	1.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.4 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.10 P
*10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	36.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.10 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.10 P
3.05 P	Vallejo
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*5.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDGOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

A DIVIDEND HAS BEEN DECLARED BY THE
People's Savings Bank for the term ending June 30, 1891, at the rate of five and one-third (5 1/3) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and four (4) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes,
and payable on or after July 3, 1891.
GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR
a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1891.

No. 33.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The prejudice of caste has existed in all ages of the world and among all peoples, and it ever will exist. So just a man as Abraham drove into the wilderness the despised Egyptian bondwoman Hagar and her child by him, though it was "very grievous in his sight." Sarah did demand, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac." And the act of Abraham was at the direct command of God. It is not for man to criticise the justice of the acts and commands of his Maker; the creation, however, of peoples of unequal caste seems unjust. The lordly but depraved Caucasian looks with disdain upon his less-favored brethren, the African, the Asiatic, the Malay and the American; and in the geographies our children are taught that "The European, or Caucasian, is the most noble of the five races of men. It excels all others in learning and the arts, and includes the most powerful nations of ancient and modern times. The most valuable institutions of society, and the most important and useful inventions, have originated with the people of this race." The boast is rather broad. When many of our Caucasian ancestors were in a state of barbarism, so late even as the Roman invasion of Britain, there did exist, and had existed, refined civilization among the Chinese, the Egyptians, the Aztecs and very many other of the races now degraded. Proud as Macanley was of his people, he did write in his elegant history of England, truthfully, that "Nothing in the early existence of Britain indicated the greatness which she was destined to attain. Her inhabitants, when first they became known to the Tyrian mariners, were little superior to the natives of the Sandwich Islands." With our race caste is sustained that we do possess the power; it comes not from an ennoblement history would accord us. Little is there to commend that we did enslave the African and destroy the American. Perhaps the Asiatic would have not escaped had our boastful race had the courage to attack him.

It is a remarkable fact that while France, generally conceded to be in the advance of civilization and enlightened cosmopolitan life, is least addicted to the prejudice of caste, India, the darkest of all pretended civilizations, adheres most rigidly to caste privileges and exclusiveness, having interwoven the subject with the religion of her people. It will also be observed among individuals of this or any nation, that as they are more or less advanced in knowledge they are in about an equal degree more or less exempt from those provincial ideas which assign men social or political positions on the basis of race and color. A well-bred gentleman hardly ever takes offense at being placed on the same seat in a railway car, or in the next seat at a dinner table, with a person of mixed blood; while an ignorant, ill-bred, coarse fellow who has nothing but his white skin to recommend him, would snuff his nostrils in sovereign contempt and lose no such opportunity to complain that an indignity had been put upon him. We remember hearing the story of an indignity that was put upon a party of Mexican gentlemen who were passengers on a steamship from Panama to San Francisco, and who were so scorned by the captain that they all declined, after the first day, to eat at the common table for first-class passengers and took their meals in private. We do not know, nor do we care, what has become of the captain and the vulgar men of provincial character who sustained his conduct, but one of the Mexican gentlemen so slighted and scorned became afterward the President of Mexico and proved to be a man in every way the peer of the greatest men of his age, and one fitted to associate with princes—he was the indomitable Juarez, a full-blooded Indian.

Buffum, in his European sketches, makes notes of social life in Paris, and tells us that color in that most enlightened and cosmopolitan of cities, has nothing to do with the rank or consideration that society attaches to men. The black, the brown, the red, the white and all intermediate shades occupy, so far as color is concerned, a perfect social level, in church, railway cars, ball-rooms, at dinner tables, in the drawing-room, and at levees. In some parts of Africa the blackest man is considered the aristocrat, entitled to the most of privilege, just as in some of the most benighted parts of this country a man not entirely white, but suspected of having a drop or two of African blood in his veins, is tabooed as a "nigger," which means that no matter how good or how able he may be, he shall be the "dog" among Christians that the Christian was five hundred years ago among the Mohammedans. In California this sort of savage prejudice has had its greatest carnival in our country, outside the old slave States. First, the Indian was killed off because he was red; then the negro (too vigorous an animal to be slaughtered) was ostracised because he was black; the mulatto, because he was not quite white; the Mexican, because he was "mixed;" and last of all, the Chinaman, because his eyes were not quite straight and his skin was yellow.

Time was in England when the Jew was the object of brutal oppression. Scott overdrew not the picture of Isaac and Rebecca in "Ivanhoe." There was ostracism and persecution; the exercise of sordid might against weakness. Time did work a change; there did come a fulfillment of the almost mythical prophecy of Mother Shipton, that time would come when England would be ruled by a Jew. Benjamin Disraeli did become the Prime Minister of the kingdom, and his career was one of the most extraordinary in the history of that country. Backed not by wealth or lineage, but by genius and energy, he made himself the leader of house of commons, minister of finance in the most commercial of countries, and was twice prime minister of one of the mightiest of modern kingdoms. And now it is the persecution of the Jews in Russia recalls the fanaticism of the dark ages. Since 1881, when Ignatieff promulgated the terrible Jewish laws the lives of the 5,000,000 Russian Hebrew, who, with few exceptions, led a pitiful and beggarly existence, have been passed in unbroken wars against the frightful abuse and persecution of the authorities. It would almost seem the hand of Providence is raised to punish a barbarous government; the black cloud of war and the spectre of famine do impend.

The suggestion of this article came that Frederick Douglass, late United States Minister to Hayti, in a very able article in the North American Review, explains his connection with the negotiations with that government for the acquisition by the United States of a naval station at the Mole St. Nicolas, and replies to the charge that he had been the means of defeating the acquisition. Mr. Douglass writes:

One of the charitable apologies they are pleased to make for my failure is my color; and the implication is that a white man would have succeeded where I failed. This color argument is not new. It besieged the white house before I was appointed minister resident and consul-general to Hayti. At once and all along the line the contention was then raised that no man with African blood in his veins should be sent as minister to the black republic.

Mr. Douglass places this opposition against him upon the ground of his color at the door of the whites, and asseverates that "black Hayti" received him with the same cordiality that would have been accorded a white man. In this regard we think he is mistaken, and do believe, from what has been published, that the Haytians did not receive him as reasonably they would be expected to; and in that regard his complaint should be against his own people, and not the whites. There is much of merit in the man, and of it there has been recognition. He was born in Maryland about 1817. His mother was a negro slave, and his father a white man. He was reared as a slave, and in 1838 escaped to the north. While in bondage he learned to read and write. In 1841 he attended an anti-slavery convention, and delivered a speech that attracted marked attention. Afterward he lectured against slavery, both in this country and England, and formally purchased his manumitment. He held several distinguished offices under various Republican administrations. It would seem the people of Hayti should be the last to treat him with anything approaching disrespect. To a full-blooded negro, Toussaint L'Overture, do that people owe the founding of the republic. He was among the extraordinary men that did exist in a period when extraordinary men were numerous. Born a slave, he organized his people to resist the oppression of the French and the English, and did drive the latter from the island, and was made by the great Bonaparte the commander-in-chief of the island. Though he had assurances from the French general of the retention of his power, they were delusive; the army of France again invaded the island in January, 1802, and after a determined resistance a treaty of peace was effected. Napoleon was, however, treacherous. He ordered the arrest of Toussaint, had him conveyed to France, and confined in a dungeon. Food was withheld from him, and he suffered death from starvation in April, 1803. There can be no doubt the question of the prejudice of caste does not fairly arise in this case of Mr. Douglass; his wife is a white woman; and in this country the whites have favored him.

There have been noted cases where cruel injustice has been committed in individual cases because of the accident of birth. We have in mind the instance of William A. Lienesdorff. His father was a Dane, and about the year 1800 settled on the island of Saint Croix, in the West Indies. There he cohabited with a mulatto woman named Anna Maria Sparks, and she became the mother of William. At the age of twelve young Lienesdorff was sent to New Orleans to be educated. Arriving at manhood he entered business life and met with unusual success. He was handsome and bright, and manifested no sign of negro blood; in the society of that city he was a favorite—his unlucky taint was not known to its austere people. Later on he became engaged to the daughter of a proud French family. There was however his secret; he did know disclosure would certainly come, and that the fearful ostracism would follow. He told his affianced of it, and did declare, "I have never been guilty of one dishonorable or dishonest act in my whole life; my father was a good Dure. I was born in wedlock, as I have the proofs to show in my possession, though my father never openly acknowledged the marriage with my mother, for my poor mother, though virtuous, pure, and good—was of negro blood; was a mulatto; and that is my secret, and my only crime is not having revealed it to you long ago. Oh, speak, Hortense, speak and say you do not despise and spurn me for this accident of my birth. No other woman did I ever love; no other woman can I ever love." If that which has been written be true, the subsequent history of the two was mournfully tragical, and a reproach to the sentiment of caste. Liedesdorff received a freezing note from the proud father that stung him to the quick. He disposed of his property, purchased a ship, and determined to find a home on the Pacific. A day or two before he was ready for sea, while he was going to where his vessel lay, a funeral procession came in sight; to avoid it he stepped into a store, and asked the owner what funeral it was. The reply was: "Oh, the funeral of the young lady —, who came so near being married to a mulatto. She died yesterday, they say, from the shock." Liedesdorff dropped into a chair and covered his face with his hands in an agony of grief. Later the priest who had administered the last sacrament to Hortense called upon him, in compliance with her request, and gave him a little gold crucifix she had worn from childhood, and a message of her love. The ship did sail, and Liedesdorff settled in Yerba Buena (now San Francisco), where he embarked in merchandising and speculation. He was eminently successful; when he died, on May 18, 1848, he owned much real estate in San Francisco, and the Liedesdorff grant in this county at Folsom. At the time of his death he was supposed to be in debt, but subsequently his estate was valued at about a million of dollars. Later on, and after the admission of California, Captain Joseph L. Folsom went to the island of St. Croix and purchased the interest of the mother of Liedesdorff in the estate. In 1855 an act was passed by the Legislature appropriating $30,000 for the prosecution of a suit to escheat the estate to the State; an agreed case was instituted against Folsom, and in October of that year the case was decided by the Supreme Court. The Court premised its decision by saying: "This case has excited more public attention than any that has heretofore been presented to this Court, both on account of the amount and the principles involved." It was claimed that the mother of Liedesdorff was not a citizen either of the United States or Mexico, nor had she resided in either country, and therefore she could not inherit. The Court held that as Liedesdorff had died twelve days before the ratification of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the matter must be determined under the laws of Mexico, and that under those laws there was no disability.

"We view with alarm" is a phrase not found in dictionaries of quotations, but it has its significance in political conventions, when the assembled statesmen of a party italicise the past and impending wrongs the indifferent people have suffered, or will suffer if the other party is not defeated in the "ides of November." We are not proposing to point out the ignorant reference that is ordinarily made by our political conventions and orators to the "ides," in that we are now viewing the situation of journalism in this city with alarm. A combat seems impending between our evening cotemporaries; "we view it with alarm," in that before it will subside there may be a considerable amount of space wasted on the "largest circulation," "outside support," and other favorite subjects that generally characterize these savage wars in journalism—an infliction on the good people tolerated by them only that they are patient. It seems that the editor of the News was out of town, and, so nearly as the public can understand, a "public echo" of criticism of a grand jury that did not exist was printed in the editorial columns. Had the editor been at home doubtless it would have been printed in its proper place, but the Bee takes the matter up seriously, and charges that the News is in part owned by a gentleman who it accuses is seeking to control the politics of the city and county, and who, if we understand it right, is jealous that he does not control the grand jury. The editor of the News on his return wastes half a column in squaring the blunder his paper made, and in telling his antagonist and the world where he can be found during business hours. We do not know where this thing will end, and feel as little interest in it as do the people, but if the combat will come we may be called to act as umpire. In this matter there are amusing features. The News did broadly intimate the grand jury to be would act unfairly, and permitted the publication in its columns of an anonymous attack upon a man whose name had been drawn among the 30 from the box of 100. It is not to be supposed the anonymous correspondent knew what he was writing about—that would be an unreasonable assumption; but the editorial management should have known that the simple drawing of 30 names from the box does not mean that a jury of 30 is to be impaneled. And were it the grand jury of 19 was now impaneled, we can conceive of nothing in worse taste than to characterize the body as corrupt in advance of its action. A grand jury is powerless to punish without justification; we are not aware that it can shield where punishment is deserved. It is solemnly charged, after being sworn, to make diligent inquiry into all wrongs, and its findings must be made upon the consciences of its members. We did deprecate the premature attack that was made upon a grand jury that did not exist, in that we felt it to be indecent to anticipate the action of the body that will be chosen, and felt it an unjust reflection upon the 30 men whose names were drawn from the box. Should any 19 of them be impaneled, we are confident 15, the ruling number, will act fairly and conscientiously. In this regard the News was wrong. The Bee's insinuation that its rival is in part owned by a gentleman who is not identified with journalism is of inconsequence, and it may be admitted that it is true—and, then, what of it? It is no crime for a man to own an interest in a newspaper, and if the proprietor of the News has friends who are willing to take stock in his enterprise, it concerns not anyone but the parties immediately interested. There are very few newspapers that are not in whole or in part owned and controlled by others than their reputed owners; and in this day of personal journalism there is the strongest possible inducement for men to own newspaper stock to protect themselves and their interests from unjust assaults. Both of our cotemporaries lay great stress upon the fact that men prominent in politics are on the jury list, and assume these men will act badly, and that they will be governed by small prejudice. Broad indeed is the editorial mind! We are saints; those whom we ostracise are devils.

It is apparent the citizens are realizing that which the trustees should have known long ago: that our water-works pumps are in a deplorable condition, and that a change in the system is imperative. The situation of affairs is, however, auspicious, as it would seem to omen the change will be radical, both with regard to the quality of the water we will receive and its service. A meeting of prominent citizens was held at the court-house Tuesday evening, and the subject was preliminarily discussed. The suggestions made by Mr. Abbott were sensible: that if, after examination, artesian water in sufficient quantity can be obtained from wells sunk in the gravel beds to the east of the city, there should there be established a plant of sufficient capacity to furnish the city an abundant supply. The question of quality of the waters from the wells that have been sunk has been determined favorably; that of quantity remains to be demonstrated. The meeting appointed a committee to consider the practicability of the project. So long as we will be compelled to abandon our present system, it is but wisdom we adopt a new one that will be the best; and it would seem if an adequate supply can be obtained from wells, we should take advantage of this opportunity. We are well satisfied if the privilege was given to a private corporation to furnish our inhabitants with clear and pure water, it would be so well patronized that the city water-works would not be a successful competitor; and such a privilege should be granted if asked for.

Cathay was China, or rather Tartary. It was called Khitai (accent on the a) by the Tartars, and China was first entered by Europeans in the middle ages from the side of Tartary. The poet Tennyson speaks of it in "Locksley Hall" when he says, "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay."

Katty, Avourneen!

(OLD VERSION.)

"Twas a cold winter's night, and the tempest was suarling,
The snow like a sheet covered cabin and sty,
When Barney flew over the hills to his darling,
And rapped at the window where Katty did lie,
'Arrah jewel,' says he, 'are you sleepin' or wakin'?'
It's a cold bitter night, and my coat it is thin,
The storm is a brewin', the frost is a bakin',
Oh, Katty, avourneen, you must let me in."

"Ah, then, Barney," says Kate, and she spoke through the window,

"How could you be takin' us out of our bed?
To come at this time it's a shame and a sin, too;
It's whisky, not love, has got into your head,
If your heart it was true, of my fame you'd be tender,
Consider the time, and there's nobody in;
What has a poor girl but her name to defend her?
No, Barney, avourneen, I won't let you in."

"Acushla," says he, "it's my eye is a fountain,
That weeps at the wrong I might lay at your door;
Your name is more white than the snow on the mountain
And Barney would die to preserve it as pure;
I'll go to my home though the winter winds face me,
I'll whistle them off, for I'm happy within,
And the words of my Katty shall comfort and bless me—
'No, Barney, avourneen, I won't let you in.'"

Antiquity of Butter.

If the translation of the Hebrew terms "chamca" and "Chaleb metz," as given by the ancient translators, and the LXX interpreters (who lived 300 years after Hippocrates, and who resided in Egypt), by the word "boutyron" is a correct one, then we find butter first mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: Genesis xviii:8; Deuteronomy xxxii:14; Judges v:25; 11 Samuel xvii:29; Job xx:17, xxix:6; Proverbs xxx:33; Isaiah vii:15-22. Aristotle, among the Greek writers, remarks that "in milk there is also a fat substance, which, under certain circumstances, is like oil." After him Herodotus describes the process used among the Scythians for making butter. The word "boutyron" also occurs in Hippocrates, who was almost contemporaneous with Herodotus, as both of them flourished in the fifth century B. C. Butter is often mentioned by Hippocrates, and he prescribes it externally as a medicine under the appellation "pike-iron," which seems to have been in earlier use among the Greeks than the term "boutyron." Soon after the death of Hippocrates we read that the Greeks thought the butter which the Thracians used a wonderful kind of food. The ancient Ethiopians appear to have used butter as food.

Always White, New and Crisp.

You never see a soiled Bank of England note. They are always white, new and crisp, for the reason that a note is never issued from the bank a second time. When they find their way into the bank new notes of the same number and the same denomination, of course, are issued in their stead. They are made from new, white linen cuttings; never from anything that has been worn. So carefully is the paper prepared that even the number of dips into the pulp made by each workman is registered on a dial by machinery, and the sheets are counted and booked to each person through whose hands they pass. They are made at Laverstoke, on the river Whit, in Hampshire, by a family named Portal, descended from a French Huguenot refugee, and have been made by the same family for more than one hundred and fifty years. They are printed within the building, there being elaborate arrangements for making them so that each note of the same denomination shall differ in some particular from the other.—E.v.

Eugene Field takes up the cudgel in favor of pet names for girls. "When," he says, "an American calls Ellen Nellie he obeys a noble, manly instinct. He loves to regard his mother as 'little mother,' his sister as 'little sister,' his sweetheart as 'little sweetheart,' his daughter as 'little daughter;' and this tender and beautiful sentiment he expresses when he employs the diminutives Nellie, Carrie, Susie, Mamie, etc. A powerful argument in favor of the custom is the fact that the girls themselves approve it. I believe in and stand for everything that shall show to the world that our girls, our sweethearts, our wives and our mothers are our pets and are petted."

The distinction of being the most northern line belongs to the Arctic railway. This railway has for its main object the bringing to the port of Lulea the enormously rich iron deposits of the far north. The ore is obtained from the mountain of Glenivara, which is some 300,000 acres in area, and shows traces of ore over its whole surface. The first train to enter the Arctic circle was on this railway, and left Lulea in October, 1887. This line is the recognized route by which tourists who have ascended the North cape can cross the Norwegian mountain ranges and return southward to Stockholm by rail, or by water from Lulea.

When Uncle Sam flings down a patch of soil as big as some of the empires of Europe, there's fun enough in the scramble to last 15,000 people three or four days.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

An actor's life ought to be fruitful; it is filled with dates.

Minnie Palmer is playing My Sweetheart at the Vaudeville, London.

Victory Bateman is Frederick Warde's leading lady this year in The Lion's Mouth.

Mr. and Mrs. Kendall are playing the English provinces before coming to America.

It is said that Zola is going to write a play that will make Ibsen's hair curl. Here is sufficient provocation for Ib. to have his hair cut.

Willie Edouin is playing the Late Lamented at the London Star Theater to immense business. It is known as Wilkinson's Widows here.

Charles Nirdinger has copyrighted a play entitled The Marquise de Pompadour. It is in four acts, and was written to order for Miss Sadie Martinot.

Maggie Mitchell will "take to the road" the latter part of this month, presenting principally The Little Maverick. She plays only in the larger cities. Good.

Mme. Fursch-Madi will appear in opera in Boston the early part of November, and will be heard in both oratorio and opera in New York and other principal cities in the United States during the months of November and December.

Phyllis Rankin is now her father's chief support in the Canuck. Mabel Bert has retired, and she and Rankin are out. If Mabel Bert had retired from the Rankin company, there might not have been occasion for Kittie Rankin to have retired a few years ago.

George F. Root, the man to whom America's musical world owes such melodies as "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp;" "The Battle Flag of Freedom" and "The Vacant Chair," resides in Chicago, and has not become a millionaire through the profits of his productions.

Prof. Ferruccio Busoni, the Russian pianist, who left the imperial conservatory at Moscow to join the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music at Boston, is but 25 years old, but has been before the public for eighteen years. He made his first appearance as an infant prodigy.

A rumor was recently current in London that the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kendall was about to go on the stage, but it is denied. Ellen Terry's daughter, however, will undertake some work in the Lyceum company during a provincial tour this fall. In some quarters it is doubted if she continue in the profession more than a few weeks.

Antoinette Sterling, the well-known contralto, who has lately joined the Quakers, created an unusual sensation at a meeting at Legtonstone. After the meeting had sat for a long time without the spirit moving anyone to speak, Mme. Sterling got up and sang. Singing is unheard of in Quakers' meetings, but she sang. Afterward one of the elders approached her and said: "Thee knowest, sister, that it is against the rules, but if the Lord telleth thee to sing thee must."

The Poet Laureate, Tennyson, has just completed the first work which he has ever written especially for the stage. Augustin Daly, of New York, has secured the exclusive right to produce the play, which is a three-act comedy. The new comedy contains parts designed to bring out the dramatic abilities of Miss Ada Rehan, Mrs. John Drew and Mr. Lewis. The play will be presented in New York during the coming winter. Mr. Daly, accompanied by Miss Rehan, recently visited Lord Tennyson, and they were entertained by him at luncheon. On that occasion the poet read to his guests the most effective passages of the comedy, especially those lines designed for Miss Rehan's part. The reading was a most successful and entertaining one, and Miss Rehan unhesitatingly expressed herself as delighted with the part assigned her.

ACT I.

She's writing a play;
That's the fad of the day;
And many a man erst lighthearted and gay
Has grown wrinkled and gray,
And has nothing to say,
Since the wife of his bosom is writing a play.

ACT II.

She's writing a play,
And she thinks it will pay,
Or, better, the heart of humanity sway;
While her dear, earnest way
Makes us pray that it may—
The bright, foolish woman who's writing a play.

ACT III.

She's writing a play!
But the grief, the dismay,
The surprise that awaits her, let no one portray.
Nor even essay
Friendly hint to convey;
For she simply can't listen—she's writing a play.

Book Chat.

Miss Hildegard Hawthorne, grand-daughter of Nathaniel, and daughter of Julian Hawthorne, is credited with a literary future.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling may see some fighting in Samoa after all in consequence of Mataala's defiant attitude and the increasing disaffection of the natives. A trinity of notable names in literature will soon be associated in Samoa—Mr. Kipling, Mr. R. L. Stevenson and Mr. Bassett Haggard, brother of Rider, of that family.

The poet Swinburne is small, red-headed and a bachelor. His forehead is very prominent, but his mouth is small and feminine and his chin weak. His eyes are large and brilliant. The poet is frank and courteous in manner, but he avoids general society because of his deafness. He talks well, and is fond of taking long walks and reading his own poetry.

Walter Besant claims to have seen "ghosts" on several occasions in his life. Once when he was sleeping in a room which was over 300 years old, and while the door was securely locked, three old ladies in Queen Anne dresses entered and sat down on chairs about the smoldering fire. Then, without waiting for further manifestations, Mr. Besant became horror stricken, leaped from the bed and opened the blinds, letting in the early morning light. The visitors, naturally offended by such unseemliness, slowly faded away. Mr. Besant says, however, that he has never received any communication from the other world.

"Paul and Virginia," as we know them, are threatened with annihilation like William Tell and other characters beginning to be enveloped in the haze of myth. M. Arene has written an article to prove that Virginia de la Tour, who was reported to have been drowned in the wreck of the Saint Geran, was really saved by her lover and duly married him. M. Arene relies largely on a fan said to have been given to Virginia by M. de la Bourdonnais, the colonial governor who married her to Paul, this remarkable fan being in the possession of one of the governor's descendants. M. Anatole France, however, says that the fan from the description is pure Louis seize, and that, as the Saint Geran went down in 1744, it is of no value as an argument against the accepted legend.

John Howard Payne was born in New York, June 9, 1792. He showed a remarkable precocity of talent. When but ten years of age, when a clerk in a New York counting house, he edited a weekly journal entitled the Thespian Mirror, and in 1807, when he was a student in Union College, he published twenty-five numbers of a periodical entitled The Pastime. He made his first appearance on the stage in New York, in 1809, as "Young Norval," subsequently acted in other cities with more or less success, and in 1813 made his debut in London. For nearly twenty years he lived in England, gaining a somewhat precarious support as actor, manager and playwright. He translated French plays and produced original plays and adaptations, including "Brutus," "Therese," "Clari," and "Charles the Second," which had considerable success. "Brutus," which was produced in 1818, with Edmund Kean in the principal part, is still a favorite play on the stage. "Clari," which was brought out as an opera, contains the celebrated song of "Home, Sweet Home." Of all Payne's numerous writings, this alone has rescued his name from oblivion. In 1832 Mr. Payne returned to the United States, and in 1841 was made American consul at Tunis, and held this position at the time of his death, April 10, 1852.

Charles Lamb is one of those few writers who are loved rather than admired. He is not a master by the verdict of the critics, but by the election of hearts he has touched and sympathies his sweet pages have awakened. We never say "How fine!" or "What masterly criticism!" The verdict on laying down his book is "Dear old Elia!" This is very natural, too, for if ever anything was ever written straight from the heart; if ever the soul whispered its inward emotions to the world, Charles Lamb has done so. He doesn't write essays on specific subjects. He merely details for us his musings—opens the windows of a frank and true nature and lets us look upon it in all its joys or sorrows or remembrances. The paper he writes on is his confidant. He whispers to it in the still night, and the words it bears are eloquent with music, tenderness, and pathos, because they so truly shadow forth one of the truest and sweetest and manliest characters revealed to us in all the long and checkered history of letters. What a brave, sweet life it was. How nobly and uncomplainingly all things were set aside for the fulfillment of a harsh and cruel duty! What a dignity and heroism there was in the simple and unpretentious sacrifice of ambition and love to that poor sister. Great epics have told us of mighty sacrifices. In the pages of old dramas and romance we read of stern renunciations and faithful loves, but it takes the cold, unornamented, but infinitely tragic poetry of common life to show us such a heroism as the brave and beautiful life of Charles Lamb.—Howard Hawthorne McGee.

Professional Chat.

The statesman whom the office seeks must be a pretty large pattern of a man.

Princess Christian, one of Queen Victoria's daughters, employs a woman physician—Dr. Julia Maitland—who is a specialist in diseases of the nerves.

In one of the paintings of the Old World is a suggestive picture of hypocrisy. A friar is seen in canonicals and apparently absorbed in his religious devotions. We draw very near. What seemed to have been a book proves to be a punch bowl, into which the clasped hands are squeezing a lemon.

The story of the dismissal of Ignatieff, lately Prime Minister of Russia, is thus told: Ignatieff one day presented some papers to his imperial master, saying: "Your majesty may sign these without reading them, as they are not of much importance." The Czar handed the papers back with the answer: "Keep these for your successor. I never sign papers without looking at them."

Very characteristic was the story told by Canon Scott Holland in his sermon to the university-extension students at Oxford anent Mr. Ruskin and one of his pupils. "Ah, Mr. Ruskin," said a too-eager disciple, "the first moment that I entered the gallery at Florence I saw at once what you meant when asserting the supremacy of Botticelli." "Did you, in a moment?" remarked the great teacher; "it took me twenty years to find out that."

The famous "Parson" Brownlow, who was a vigorous unionist during the civil war, hesitated at the very outset as to which cause he should espouse. It is said that he actually wrote an article for his paper, the Knoxville Whig, defending secession. By chance it was left out for a day; and in the meantime his chief journalistic rival took the same attitude. Therefore, Brownlow "killed" his own editorial and wrote another taking the northern view.

An Irish train was carrying in a compartment of the third class a clergyman and five or six ragamuffins. The rascals, to annoy the minister, kept up scoffing at religion and telling disagreeable stories. The good man endured it all, hearing it all without answering, without being moved. Arrived at his journey's end, he remarked to them: "We shall meet again, my children." "Why shall we meet again?" asked the leader of the band. "Because I am prison chaplain," was the reply.

In one of the earliest trials before a colored jury in Texas the twelve gentlemen were told by the judge to "retire and find the verdict." They went into the jury-room, where the opening and shutting of drawers, and other sounds of unusual commotion, were presently heard. At last the jury came back into court, when the foreman announced: "We hab looked eberywhar, judge, for dat verdict—in de drawers and behind de doahs—but it ain't nowhar in dat blessed room."

Shortly after the battle of Gettysburg President Lincoln was being shown over the battle field. "Here," said the general who was escorting him, "here on the brow of this hill stood our brave men, who three different times repelled the assaults of the rebels. I shall always be proud to know, Mr. President, that the men who held these heights were American citizens." "And I," replied President Lincoln, "shall always be proud to know that the brave men who charged up these heights, and, though repulsed, charged again and again, were likewise American citizens."

As illustrating the meekness of Rufus Choate, someone tells this story about him: Riding in a stagecoach one day in company with Joseph Bell Mr. Choate remarked: "What a fine wall surrounds that house." In the same vehicle sat a burly Englishman somewhat the worse for liquor. "That is not a wall, sir; it is a fence," said he. Mr. Choate replied: "I call it a stone wall." "I say, sir, it is a fence, and I insist upon it." For the sake of peace Mr. Choate admitted that it was a fence; when Mr. Bell jumped up and addressed the Englishman. "I say, sir, that it is a stone wall; and if you again call it a fence I will throw you out of this coach!" His threat proved effective.

During Bishop Newman's missionary trip around the world awhile ago, he spent some time in India. One day a lot of native pastors were called together to hear the bishop's views on the best methods of carrying on evangelical work. Native converts, according to the missionaries, are apt to think they know just what to do and are perfectly qualified to get along without advice. Bishop Newman began his talk, but was constantly interrupted by the native brethren, who jumped up, one after another, to remark that they thought this or that would be preferable. "Now, look here!" finally exclaimed the bishop, losing his patience a little, "if any of you think you can conduct this meeting better than I can, will you please rise?" There was silence for a moment as the bishop glanced around the room; then four of the brethren gravely rose and waited to be counted.

NOTES.

Sawdust and shavings, when reduced to powdered charcoal, are now used in wine to absorb unpleasant odors.

Business government, honest, efficient, careful and prudent, is the sort that makes a city prosperous and sought for as a place of living.

To destroy the odor of paint in a newly-painted room put a handful of fresh hay in a bucket of water and let it stand in the room over night.

Although diamonds will stand a very high temperature when held in vacuum, the admission of air causes them to burn almost as readily as coal.

When a man or woman goes wrong now-a-days it is charged that they are hypnotized. Hypnotism seems likely to come in for a good deal of the sin and follies of the day.

The young Yale sophomores who were last year freshmen and earnestly opposed to the unwarrantable practice of hazing, are still devoting much attention to the same subject.

Jupiter is larger than all the other planets and satellites of the solar system. The sun is a little more than 1,000 times larger than Jupiter. But Arcturus is 550,000 times larger than the sun.

The British lion seems to have an interesting time of it these days in making such disposition of his caudal appendage that no one will tread on it. Incidentally it may be remarked that Russia's ponderous foot seems to be always around where the tail is.

The Prince of Wales has ordered some cigars of a Cuban manufacturer at $1,800 per thousand. It is lucky for him that his elevation to the throne does not depend upon the votes of the people, or his chances would go up in the smoke of those $1 80 cigars.

The death of Hon. Thos. J. Hart, of Colusa, is much to be regretted. He had been ill for a long time with consumption, and his death was not unexpected. Mr. Hart was a lawyer of ability, and for two terms represented Colusa county in the Assembly. He was a brother of Gen. A. L. Hart and Hon. E. C. Hart of this city.

A Connecticut town boasts of a society of old maids, formed thirty years ago with a membership of fifty, and vows of perpetual celibacy. As the membership is now reduced to a mere handful, all the rest having been married in the interim, it would seem as if old-maid societies were not adapted to set a shining example of constancy to their fickle-minded sisters.

In Madrid no special regulation exists with regard to itinerant guitar players, but they are required to obtain a municipal license before being permitted to beg, and this may be refused. It would seem, from the number of healthy beggars that at times appear on our streets, that it would be a good idea to require them to take out licenses or do service in the chain-gang.

From all outward indications Uncle Sam will have to teach our Chili neighbors a lesson in diplomatic ethics. While we have admired the pluck and energy of the Junta, we feel that the Chilians have gone a step too far when they interfered with American citizens in the unwarranted manner announced by the telegrams. Blaine will be in Washington in a few days, and will straighten out these affairs in true American style.

Somewhat of a contrast is there between the Rothschilds and the Astors. The latter are notably penurious, while the former are liberal. How the Rothschilds are housed at Ferrieres, near Paris, may be judged by their five establishments, worth $4,000,000, needing the services of 150 people. The stables contain 100 horses. When Louis Napoleon visited Ferrieres the Rothschilds gave a grand breakfast in his honor, the cost of which was $300,000.

The Sacramento Athletic Club gave another popular entertainment this week, and which out of compliment was called "Ladies' Night." Our young friends of the club leave nothing undone to make their exhibitions exceedingly entertaining. We understand that in the near future there will be a grand combination exhibition, wherein the Sacramento athletes will be assisted by some of the Olympic club members. We shall look forward with earnest anticipation for this event.

"Can a hypnotized person be made to commit crime?" was very emphatically answered in the affirmative by Dr. Voisin, of Paris, in a paper delivered before the British association. He suggested to a subject under his influence to commit acts of incendiarism while hypnotically asleep, and there was obedience in each case. More than that, a woman was recently sentenced in Paris for a succession of acts of robbery. It was ascertained that she had been habitually hypnotized, and upon investigation it was discovered that she had robbed under the suggestion of outside parties.

We did hope that, as hostilities prevail in Chili and Guatemala, our evening journals could be kept apart until there would be a finis to the foment elsewhere in the world; but it would seem they have determined to engage, notwithstanding we have lifted our harmonious voice and asked them to go slow. On Thursday evening the batteries opened on both sides. The News declared, very truthfully, that the public cared little for such disagreements, but wound up by charging its antagonist with owing heavy amounts to a well-known capitalist. The Bee consumes over half a column in reviewing the history of the war up to this point, and pointing out the advantages it claims to have gained. Let them fight.

Professor W. T. Harris, United States Commissioner of Education, is opposed to corporal punishment in schools, and claims that it brutalizes and terrorizes pupils. His theory is to teach pupils to govern themselves. There is, perhaps, much philosophy in the professor's doctrine, but when we look back to our school days and recall the dispositions and acts of some of the boys, we feel disposed to justify the warlike attitude the teachers did assume. It may have had the effect of brutalizing, but in many cases it resulted not in terrorizing. In some of the country schools the teachers had to maintain their authority by "bow and spear," and soft words had no more effect than to whistle at the north wind. The professor seems disposed to overturn the old adage "Spare the rod and spoil the child."

We are glad to note that the citizens of Sacramento have, through their committee, evinced such good judgment in selecting the Steffens property for a Governor's mansion. This is the most desirable location, as well as best fitted property. It is indeed a remarkably cheap bargain. The State could not erect anything like such buildings and furnish such grounds for five times the amount fixed as the consideration for the Steffens residence. The terms are such that it is difficult to ascribe any reason why the transaction should not be closed at once. There is no possible doubt of the next Legislature making suitable appropriations to relieve the citizens in consummating this very excellent bargain. The State should be proud of the considerate action of our citizens in furnishing our Executive with a place to live in due dignity as well as comfort.

"Marriage and Divorce" was the subject of an interesting paper read by Hon. Carroll D. Wright at the Unitarian Conference at Saratoga. Commenting on the fact that from 1867 to 1886, inclusive, there were granted in the United States 328,716 decrees of divorce, he pointed out that the increase was steady and rapid yearly, showing an increase of 157 per cent. in twenty years, in which period the population increased only 60 per cent. Of the 328,716 divorces granted, 216,176 were secured on the petition of the wives. The duration of the married time averaged 8.97 years for the men and 9.27 years for the women. Less than 20 per cent. of the parties were divorced in other States than those in which they were married. To restrict divorces, it was suggested that marriage should be made more difficult, and that the law should be changed so that the State should be a party to all divorce proceedings.

It is an every-day occurrence to hear individual exclamations of surprise over the brilliant, successful career of an apparently commonplace man or woman. "To save my life, I can see nothing remarkable in her," is what the amateur critic, with rather fretful impotence, complains; and yet, one by one, the triumphant seeker after fortune captures every citadel, storms the fortress, and finally plants her colors on the topmost turret for all the world to cheer. Of course no one ever does see the one thing able to accomplish these wonders, for the sole agent is hard, patient toil, the sort that is done in the closet, in odd hours, when the rest of mankind is asleep, ever digging away at an idea, and breathing life and activity into it by sheer force of will—over and over again, the same old story of tortoise and hare, until one marvels to hear lack of talent given as excuse for want of fortune. In material matters genius, unless supplemented by energy, does not count for a tuppence, while, on the other hand, grit is an independent factor, spinning flax out of hay and long straw, indifferent of means at hand, and only caring for the end in view.

It was Thaddeus Stevens who once, when an appropriation bill for an exhibit in some foreign exposition was before Congress, said the best thing Americans could do would be to equip and send to Europe a party of old "negro mamies" with a cargo of cornmeal to teach the people of Europe how to make hockeak and corn bread. Stevens has been dead for many years, but the European has not yet learned how to make hockeak and corn bread. Indeed, the poorest people of the old country look with detestation on American "maize" and its food products. They regard it as food for animals, and imagine that it is unfit for any other purpose than the feeding of live stock. But now, with famine staring them in the face, there is likely to be more attention paid to American maize. Without wheat, without rye, without even potatoes, nothing is left available at a low price but corn. With the admission of American pork into Germany, and the prospect of the utilization of corn for human food as it is used in America, there will be presented the spectacle of the hungry poor of Europe satisfying themselves on "hog and hominy" in a genuine Yankee fashion.

We trust the Board of Trustees will see the wisdom of Major McLaughlin's proposition to call an election for fifteen freeholders to frame a new charter. Now is the time to commence this much needed work, in order that there may be an organic law devised which will meet all the necessities of this community. Much labor and care is required in framing a charter to provide for the various departments of local government. It is a wise resolve to thus institute the work at this early day so as to give the people an opportunity to understand and discuss the work. Great care must also be taken in selecting the right men for the labor. Men with crank notions should be avoided in such important matters, and only thoroughly practical men who have an adequate knowledge of political economy and science of government detailed to perform this task. No questions of a partisan nature can possibly arise, therefore the fifteen freeholders should be strictly non-partisan. All political parties should join in the selection of these freeholders, having in mind only the question of fitness. By all means, gentlemen trustees, call an election at the earliest possible date, and have the gentlemen selected as a board of freeholders proceed at once to the formulation of a new organic law.

One of our local hobbies is the suppression of gambling, and with our people it has assumed a variety of phases. In the flush times of "the days of old, the days of gold, and the days of '49" gambling was tolerated without limit, and the gilded floating palaces that plied between this city and San Francisco rivaled in that regard the old-time Mississippi river steamboats. The first anti-gambling law in California was drafted by Chief Justice Hugh C. Murray, himself a "high roller," as the expression now goes. It was as ineffectual as the existing statute. Perhaps the most sensible adjustment of the matter was during the administration of Judge Clark, before the adoption of the present Constitution. Then a grand jury met every quarter, and the gamblers were indicted and fined. Practically, it was a license, and the fines helped out the county funds materially. The gamblers knew it was coming, and like Daniel Boone's coon, came down without the firing of a shot. Those who were proceeded against naturally informed against all others, so none escaped. In one instance a grand jury indicted one of its own members for gambling. Now things are more unsatisfactory. Gambling goes on; the money for its protection goes into private hands, and when there is an official investigation it proceeds but to the "vanishing point."

The Flight Into Egypt.

It is thought that the route taken by Joseph was along the edge of the wilderness of Judea, by a line going directly south from Bethlehem, trending a little toward the west. The country was hilly, but not difficult to traverse. It was inhabited by the Hittites, a people that at this time were friendly toward the Jews. This flight, we are assured, was just exactly what every other Jew, at that time similarly circumstanced, would have determined upon. There was quite a Jewish colony in Egypt, made up of those who had been driven thither by the usurpations and injustice of Roman rule. The distance from Bethlehem to a point beyond Herod's jurisdiction was not more than seventy miles—about three days' journey.

The early Christians observed the first day of the week in commemoration of Christ's resurrection. They also observed the Jewish Sabbath, in accordance with custom. After they became quite numerous they began to neglect the Jewish day, confining their observance to the other, which they called the Lord's Day. In the year 321 the Emperor Constantine officially recognized the day by an edict ordering that all work should cease on it except necessary husbandry. The Emperor Theodosius, about 382, ordered that all legal business should be put aside on that day. So it came to be the one day of rest for Christians.

Cape Cod, the sandy peninsula which extends into the Atlantic ocean and forms the southwest extremity of Massachusetts, was so named by Bartholomew Goswold, May 15, 1602, from the quantity of codfish caught off its shores. He described it as a "mighty headland."

Colors of Sea Waters.

Ever since poet indited verse in praise of the "deep blue sea," or painter took up the brush in order to portray the glories of the "azure main," it has been settled for us and for all time that the sea is blue; and such expressions as the "blue deep" and the "blue ocean" have become stereotyped phrases. Yet the fact that the waters of the sea sometimes appear, and very often are, of a different color forces itself on the attention of the most superficial observer. Such names as the Red sea, the Yellow sea, the Black sea, the White sea, testify that other colors beside blue have attracted the attention of seafaring men from the earliest times, although in some of those instances the name probably had its origin, not in the actual color of the water, but in the aspect of the surrounding land; such, for example, as the gloomy coasts of the Black sea and the snow-clad, ice-fringed shores of the White sea. Numerous theories have been offered in explanation of these changes, some ascribing them to the varying color of the sea bottom, some to differences in depth, others to the presence of certain coloring substances, others again to the chemical composition of the water. Most of these suggestions contained an element of truth, although no one of them, taken by itself, sufficed to account for alterations in color which have often been observed to occur in the course of a few hours' sail, or even within a distance measuring less than a ship's length. Of late years numerous scientific expeditions have been dispatched for the express purpose of exploring the secrets of the deep, and much light has been thrown, for the first time, upon the conditions which affect the color of the sea. "Science for All" sums up the results as follows: "The various tints of blue and green which constitute what may be called the proper color of sea water are due to a greater or lesser proportion of salt held in solution, the color being an intense blue when the water is very salt, and changing by degrees to a green blue, or blue green, and green color, as the water becomes more fresh. On the other hand, the abnormally colored red, yellow, brown and inky seas owe their appearance to the accumulation of large masses of seaweed, from the gigantic algae, which fringe the shores of oceanic islands, to the microscopic diatoms; but almost as frequently the discoloration is caused by myriads of animal organisms collected in shoals at the surface of the ocean."

Mother Shipton's Prophecy.

The following, which is known as "Mother Shipton's Prophecy," was first published in 1488, and republished with wide circulation in 1641:

"Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the world thoughts shall fly
In the twinkling of an eye.
Water shall yet more wonders do.
Very strange, yet shall be true—
The world upside down shall be,
And gold be found at the foot of tree.
Through hills man shall ride,
And no horse or ass by his side.
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.
In the air men shall be seen,
In white, in black, in green.
Iron in the water shall float,
As easy as a wooden boat.
Gold shall be found, and found
In a land that is not now known.
Fire and water shall wonders do;
England shall at last admit a Jew.
The world to an end shall come
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one."

Childish Faith.

An example of childish faith, of a kind a dull age wears away, was seen the other day. A little boy was sitting in the yard of an old country homestead; on either side of him sat a huge dog, patient and loving. The sun shone down scorchingly on the trio, and its rays were uncomfortable. Shading his eyes with his curved hand the child looked skyward and said: "Put in that sun, please." The sun shone brightly, and the little fellow repeated softly: "Please put in that sun, man up in the sky, it hurts my head." Just then over the face of the blazing orb there sailed a white summer cloud, then another, and the yellow blaze turned suddenly to a lazy, restful gray. Turning to the dogs, the little boy, putting an arm around the neck of each, said: "Did you see the sun pulled in. Romeo and Chieftain? When you wants anything, if you is good, and you asks God for it, he gives it to you. The sun hurt my head, and I asked him to put it in, and don't you see how he did reach out and put it in for me?" The dogs looked wise, leaned their heads lovingly towards the diminutive theologian, and, whatever might have been their belief, kept an inscrutable silence.—Providence Journal.

A huge toadstool has appeared every fall for the last ten years on a low branch of an elm tree near Woldeck Park, Berlin. It stands about twenty-five inches high, and has a cap almost two feet in diameter. Two years ago a policeman picked it, cooked it, and ate, and suffered no bad results from the meal. On September 3d the big toadstool sprouted for the eleventh time.

FLASHES.

It is strange how quick we tire of a once-coveted prize.

Some men may learn to eat with a fork and yet not be gentlemen.

The eagerness to get married never equals the desire to get divorced.

When we see a man-hating woman we can be sure some man has made her so.

The stump which should receive the attention of the farmer is not the political stump, but the one on his farm.

We are always suspicious of purely disinterested actions by some people. We have some such public-spirited men in this city.

It would be a good thing if we could hold our tempers as long as we hold our spite. In that case we might not have occasion for the latter.

The Horseshoe Superstition.

The custom of nailing a horseshoe over the door of a house or other building as a protection against evil spirits and as an assurance of good luck is widely spread over the United States and England. It also flourishes among the Teutonic and Scandinavian races, and has been recognized as far east as Hindoostan. The horseshoe unites within itself three lucky elements—it is crescent-shaped, it has been, or is to be, in contact with a horse, and is made of iron. Popular superstition has for ages endowed iron with protecting powers. The Romans are known to have driven nails into the doors and the walls of their houses as an antidote or as a preventive of the plague. The Arab who is overtaken by a simoon in the desert seeks to propitiate the Jinns by shrieking: "Iron! iron!" Since time out of memory the Scandinavians have sought to exercise the river spirit, Neckaw, by sticking an open knife in the bottom of the boat, or driving a nail in the mast or oar. In the mythology of England the horseshoe has always been considered a "luck bringer."

The popular belief in the horseshoe attained its greatest diffusion about the end of the last century. Aubrey, in his "Miscellanies," tells us that in his time most all the houses in West London had a horseshoe over the door. Lord Nelson nailed one to the mast of the Victory, and "Lucky" Dr. James used one as a crest for his carriage.

Beginning to Pay Dividends.

Wife: How in the world can you afford to buy those expensive cigars?

Husband: I don't buy 'em.

"Dear me! You don't mean to say any friend of yours is rich enough to give you such cigars, do you?"

"Well, not exactly. That young man who has got so smitten with our daughter—"

"Huh! No more than she is with him."

"Well, he's an agent or something for a big firm of cigar importers, and generally has his pockets full of their best samples. Well, after we go to bed, and the lights are turned down, he takes them out of his pockets and puts 'em in the mantelpiece—to keep 'em from getting crushed, I suppose. Then when it comes to leaving, between the desire to skip out without making any noise at such a late hour, and the pain of saying good night to our daughter, he forgets all about them. I tell you, Maria, our daughter has been a pretty heavy expense, but she's sort o' paying for herself now."

The Boston Farmers' Almanac for 1836 thus describes the farmer's girl of that day: "Give me one of your ruddy farmer's daughters, who thinks more of the yellow harvest's abundance than of the spring posies—a good, buxom country lass, who knows how to boil a potato and can tell a mealy chenango from a blue nose; one that can make good brown bread and is never afraid to be seen in the dough. Our genuine farmer girl is modest, but has no affectation. She affects not to be delighted with the effluvia of a marigold nor to be disgusted at the sight of a cow. She can make butter as well as eat it. She can ride a trotting pony without being strapped on; and, though she never cut a pigeon-wing or whirled in the mazy motion, yet she can leap a fence like a fox-hound and dance good old 'Rural Felicity' to a charm."

In Fenelon's "Fables," written in 1690, may be found an interesting chapter entitled "Voyage Suppose." Of the marvels related in that story we read: "There was no painter in all that country, but when they wished the portrait of a friend they put water into large basins of gold and silver, and made this water to face the object they wished to paint. Soon the water would congeal and become as the face of a mirror, where the image dwelt ineffaceably. This could be carried wherever one pleased, always giving as faithful a picture as a mirror." Who will say that Fenelon did not anticipate the photograph?

The last French survivor of the battle of Trafalgar, Louis Cartigny, has just completed his 100th year. He was a cabin-boy on the Redoubtable in 1803 at the time the fatal shot was fired from that vessel at Lord Nelson. Cartigny is still hale and hearty.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

A Midnight Bell will be heard October 15th and 16th.

The President, a new farce comedy, will be presented on October 5th and 6th.

Chas. Dickson, with Mrs. Pacheco's latest comedy, Incog, will hold the boards October 12th and 13th.

On October 9th and 10th the universal favorite, Sol. Smith Russel, will be with us, at which time he will introduce his new piece, A Peaceful Valley.

During the month of November we will have Sinbad on the 2d; Goodyear, Elitch and Schilling's Minstrels, 13th and 14th; Dr. Bill, 19th and 20th; Tom Keene, 23d and 24th; Geo. Marion, in Mr. Macaroni, 25th and 26th; Yon Yonson, 27th and 28th.

Chas. P. Hall, who has given us the best attractions on the American stage during his three and one-half years' management, has retired from the control of our local theaters. While Mr. Hall was usually looked upon as a cold, morose man, it was only on account of a lack of a knowledge of the man. His management of the stage in this city has been excellent and popular. Many attractions have been brought here at a positive loss to the manager, but we have never heard him complain of the people of this city. Mr. L. Henry, who has been Mr. Hall's treasurer, will assume the management of the theaters. The young man's experience will no doubt serve him well in his new undertaking. Mr. Henry is a quiet, careful man, and has thorough knowledge of the wants of the theater patrons of this city. We feel confident that he will endeavor to please the public, for in that lies his hopes for future success. We are aware that the duties and trials of managers are arduous, and that he has a class of people to deal with that often tries his patience, but we will rely on Mr. Henry's good judgment to become a popular manager.

Too Indulgent by Far.

"Yes," said Mr. Easyman to the Rev. Dr. Prudent, the new minister, who was paying his parishioner a friendly visit; "you are unquestionably right. I do not believe in being over-sterm with children. Now, mine treat me as they would an elder brother or playmate. No scampering up stairs when they hear my latch key turn in the door; not much! Make your home cheerful; that's my motto."

A frowsy-haired youth of some six summers appeared on the scene at this juncture, says the New York Herald. After eyeing the clergyman critically for a moment, he broke out with:

"Say, pa, what is a jay?"

An ominous frown settled on the brow of the indulgent parent as he replied: "A jay, my son, is a rather showy bird having a low, erectile crest of feathers and—"

"But, pa, they can fly, can't they?"

"Certainly, my boy. They are noted, too, for their propensity to chatter, and, for instance, to ask foolish questions."

The frown deepened as the boy went on:

"But how can they fly, pa, without any wings?"

"My son, I think I heard your ma calling you a few moments ago—"

"Yes, pa, I'm going, only, as I heard you tell ma last night that our new minister was a regular jay, I just wanted to come in here to see whether he could fly. Say, mister (to the astonished clergyman), you ain't got any feathers, have you?"

There was a sudden rush on the part of the indulgent parent, followed by the sudden disappearance of the youthful inquisitor. Then came a series of discordant howls from the hall beyond.

"My dear sir," observed the parent upon entering the room, "while I admit that I am a kind and indulgent parent, why—"

At this point the front door was heard to slam violently. The minister had disappeared, and now Mr. Easyman is talking about renting a pew in another church.

The traces of the Incas in Peru are indistinct. Centuries have served to absorb them into the general population. Much, however, of what belonged to their civilization has been preserved. The dynasty of the Incas may be said to have run its course from 1130 to 1571. It was preceded by the Aymara dynasty, and was reigning when, in 1533, Pizarro conquered Peru. The Incas called themselves descendants of the sun. The first Inca was Manco Capac, in 1130, and his successors were Sinchi Roca, Illoqui Yupanqui, Mayta Capac, Capac Yupanqui, Roca, Yahuar Huacac, Viracocha, Pachacutec, Yupanqui, Tupac Yupanqui, Huayra Capac, Huascar, and Atahualpa (taken prisoners by the Spaniards and put to death in 1533). Tupac Amaru was beheaded in 1571.

At a G. A. R. reunion in Dover, Oklahoma, the other day, the white and colored comrades got into a fight. As yet none of the wounded have applied for pensions.

If Melbourne can make half the rain he claims, his name will go into history as a synonym for mud.

A Desperate Combat with a Jaguar.

A Demerara correspondent describes a desperate fight between a man and a jaguar, which recently took place on the Demerara river. The hero of the combat, a black named Lally Davidson, a farmer, was out with his dog, which roused a jaguar from its lair. The ferocious animal made tracks for the thick scrub, followed by Davidson and his dog. Being closely pressed the jaguar climbed a tree, where Davidson shot it, wounding it in the head. This made the animal descend, and again he dived into the bush, pursued by Davidson. The beast concealed himself in some brambles, and as Davidson was again trying to take aim the jaguar leaped upon him, knocking him bodily into a drain full of water. Davidson now engaged in a desperate struggle with the fierce brute, and, siezing the jaguar, now somewhat exhausted from loss of blood, he exerted all his strength and managed to hold his head under water until he was slowly suffocated. But before this the jaguar had severely wounded the courageous man; his hand was badly bitten, the scalp on the left side of his head was partly ripped off, and his left eye was gouged out. Suffering as he was, Davidson slowly crawled home, and while he went into the hospital sent his friends for the dead jaguar. The latter measured 5 feet 11 inches from head to tail. Davidson, on whose happy escape his friends warmly congratulated him, was slowly recovering when the last mail left Demerara.

Charlemagne's Tablecloths.

Several Sharpshurg ladies are anxious to learn how Charlemagne's tablecloths were washed by throwing them in the fire. One faction argues that each cloth was burned as soon as it became soiled, thus rendering washing unnecessary. It is a fact that the tablecloths from which the great ruler ate his royal boar's head and boiled cabbage were cleansed by casting them into a hot fire. They were made of asbestos. This substance is found in the Alps, the Pyrenees and the Ural mountains, in many parts of Asia and Africa, in the Alleghanies and Blue Ridge, in several western States, in the Andes of South America and in the mountains of Australia. The best samples come from Sardinia and Corsica, whence was probably obtained that for the manufacture of the celebrated tablecloths mentioned. Asbestos may be woven into textile fabrics, though no great proficiency has been obtained in this art, its principal use being for fireproof flooring and as packing in safes, in journal boxes and around steam pipes. It is indestructible by heat; and for the entertainment of his guests Charlemagne would, at the conclusion of a feast, order the tablecloth to be thrown into the fire, whence, to the mystification of all, it would come forth cleansed, but unconsumed.—Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

Familiarity Breeds Contempt.

No man is the author of the proverb, "Familiarity breeds contempt." It is from the Latin Nimia familiaritas contemptum parit of Erasmus, written about 1536; and the same thought is indicated in Plutarch, Livy, Cicero and others. An early use of the proverb in an English form is found in Heywood's "Observations and Instructions, Divine and Morall, in Verse," written in 1560:

Good things wer through commones;
Some plants by accident growe wilde;
Neyer was of familiarnes
Contempt esteemed the proper childe;
But this our nature is so vile
It oft turnes to ill the while.

Proverbs, it may be added, are perhaps as old as any writing of which there is knowledge. Erasmus defined a proverb "A well-known saying remarkable for some elegant novelty;" Cervantes as "A short sentence drawn from long experience," and Lord John Russell as "The wit of one and the wisdom of many."

A Bookmark that Drew Interest.

Aaron Holman, a life-long resident of West Millbury, died a short time ago, leaving an estate valued at nearly $10,000. When the administrator examined his effects he found, among other things, an old-fashioned clasp Bible that Mr. Holman had been in the habit of reading every morning before breakfast. The administrator was told that the owner of the Bible had used a very odd-looking bookmark, and looked to see what it might be. His surprise was very great when he discovered it to be a certificate of deposit of $700 in the Worcester Safe Deposit and Trust Company. The deposit had been made in March, 1881, and for ten years the $700 had been drawing interest at three per cent. The old man had evidently felt wealthy enough to use this valuable bit of paper as a mark in his Bible; and thus combined finances and Gospel inside the same covers.—Worcester Gazette.

The temperature of the atmosphere diminishes as the elevation above sea level increases, because the upper regions of the atmosphere are rarer than the lower and the sun's rays pass through them readily, imparting little heat; besides, they are not warmed at all by the radiation of heat from the earth's surface.

Queer Superstitions About the Dead.

The belief that diseases are caused by the dead is of great antiquity. It was applied in the case of vampires, which were supposed in the middle ages to be the spirits of deceased individuals, which left their graves at night and sucked the blood of the living. The most horrible part of the fancy, which set all Europe panic-stricken a few centuries ago, was the theory that the victims were obliged themselves to become vampires after death. To prevent this, thousands of suspected corpses were dug up, in order that their hearts might be transfixed with stakes, to prevent the fiends from going abroad. In 1875 the body of a woman in Chicago who died of consumption was exhumed and her lungs burned, under the persuasion that she was drawing others after her into the grave. Passing over a hidden grave is thought in some parts of England to produce a rash, while in New Jersey the same cause brings about incurable cramps in the foot. In China and Scotland, also, people are reluctant to save a drowning man, for fear that the latter, if his life is preserved, will do some dreadful injury to the savior. The Scotch believe that the spirit of the last person buried has to keep watch in the churchyard until another is entombed there, to whom he delivers his charges. The duty of the latest interred to stand sentry at the graveyard late every night until relieved often gives much uneasiness to the deceased's surviving friends in thinly inhabited portions of the country.—N. Y. Recorder.

DON'T BE CARELESS ABOUT YOUR COMPLEXION

It is woman's chiefest physical charm. It is often her only capital. It is always worth a great deal to her in business, love or social affairs. No matter how browned, or rough or sallow your skin may be, or how much it is disfigured with freckles, moth-patches, blackheads or pimples will remove every blemish and leave your skin as pure and clear and white as it was in baby days. Your complexion will then be as nature made it. Instructions go with each bottle how to keep it so. Price $1.50. All druggists sell it.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

Fine Table Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Charles H. Humphreys & Co.
Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

A Gentleman.

"Are my biscuits light, John?" asks the charming young wife,
As she smiles on her husband; and he,
With emphasis, answers: "They're lovely,
my life—
As light as the foam of the sea."

"Is the steak cooked to suit you?" she gently inquires;
And he says, as he smilingly nods:
"It might have been cooked at celestial fires,
And is tender enough for the gods."

"And the coffee; that pleases you, too, does it, dear?"
She asks, overjoyed with his praise,
Which rather than strains of sweet music she'd hear.
"I never drank better," he says.

So she sits down beside him, and with him partakes.
And the rigid, no doubt, will confess
That, if John tells her lies in the answers he makes,
He's a gentleman, nevertheless.

Clouds—Their Nature and Forms.

A cloud is a mass of visible vapor or water particles held in suspension in the atmosphere. If it rests upon the surface of the earth we call it a fog. We see a mass of vapor on the summit of a high mountain and we call it a cloud, but if we climb to the top of the mountain and find ourselves in the cloud we see it to be simply a fog. To our observation, clouds take on forms that are almost infinite in variety, yet they may be divided into six classes, each presenting quite distinct characteristics. These are known as cirrus, cumulus, and stratus cloud, as simple divisions; and cirro-cumulus, cirro-stratus and cumulo-stratus as compound divisions. The cirrus cloud consists of long, slender filaments, either parallel or diverging from each other. These clouds have the greatest elevation and the least density of all clouds. Even in fair weather the sky is seldom free from small distant groups of cirrus clouds. They are thought to be made up of spicules of ice or flakes of snow, since at the great height at which they float, from five to eight miles above the earth, the temperature of the air is below freezing point even in midsummer. The cumulus cloud is much denser than the cirrus, and is formed nearer the earth. It usually has the form of a hemispherical or convex mass with horizontal base. This is the cloud often seen in large masses near the horizon, looking like huge mountains of snow. The rounded top of this cloud results from the mode of its formation. As the earth is heated by the sun's rays, currents of warm air rise, carrying with them invisible vapor. When they reach a certain height this vapor is condensed and forms cloud, and since the upward motion is greater under the center of the cloud, the vapor is then carried to its greatest height. The stratus cloud is a widely extended, horizontal sheet, often covering the entire sky, and hanging so low that it frequently touches the earth's surface in the form of a fog. For the compound modifications of cloud forms, the cirro-cumulus is seen in small, rounded masses, often very near together. On account of their fleecy appearance these are often called "woolly clouds." This cloud is very frequent in summer, but seldom precedes rain. The cirro-stratus consists of fibrous clouds spread out in strata, which are either horizontal, or slightly inclined to the horizon. Sometimes the whole sky is mottled with this cloud, looking like the back of a mackerel, and therefore is called a mackerel sky. This cloud always presages wind and rain. The cumulo-stratus is the large, dark cloud formed by the massing of the fleecy cumulus in great heaps. These clouds are to be seen in great magnificence on the approach of a thunder-storm, and are therefore often called "thunder heads." Some meteorologists also classify with the above the nimbus cloud, which is a stratus cloud from which rain is falling, but others do not think it worth while to keep this division. The height of a cloud is measured by trigonometrical rule by observing its direction simultaneously at two stations. In mountainous countries it can be compared with the peaks near which it passes. Most accurate results, however, are obtained by ascending in a balloon and noting the height of the barometer when entering the cloud and again when emerging from it, the barometer giving the means of computing corresponding altitudes. The height of clouds is very variable. The stratus, as we have said, often descends to the earth. In pleasant weather the lower limit of cumulus clouds varies from 3,000 to 5,000 feet elevation, and their upper limit from 5,000 to 12,000 feet. Cirrus clouds never descend below the summit of Mount Blanc, which has a height of 15,744 feet, and are often seen to be far above mountains that are 20,000 to 22,000 feet high. It is estimated, however, that they would not be visible at a height exceeding ten miles. In vertical thickness clouds are supposed to seldom exceed half a mile, but the enormous masses of cumulus are sometimes estimated at over three miles. Clouds move with the wind, and there is no way of estimating their movement but by measuring the velocity of the wind currents. Clouds reflect light, of course, or they would not be visible; such light as can pass through them is refracted out of its path by the presence of the vapor particles. Thus, when we see objects through a fog we often notice that they are distant from their true position or unnaturally magnified. The effect of clouds on heat is to lessen it, the water particles absorbing it, and lowering the temperature of the air by their conversion into invisible vapor. Nevertheless, clouds hanging low in cold weather prevent a fall of temperature by preventing the radiation of heat from the earth's surface. As to moisture, clouds are, obviously, moisture itself as well as its cause.

Osceola.

Osceola was a half-breed, the son of an English trader, Willis Powell, and a Creek Indian woman. He was born on the Chattahoochee river, Georgia, in 1804. In 1808 his mother went to Florida, and when the boy grew up he became by his eminent ability the governing spirit of the Seminole nation, always foremost in sport and military exercise. When in 1834 the Government proposed to move the Seminoles from their reservation across the Mississippi, Osceola stirred up the nation to resistance. Because of his insolent replies to General Thomson—the officer sent down to remove the Indians—the chief was one day seized, put in irons and thrown into prison, where he was kept for twenty-four hours. Osceola's wounded pride called for vengeance, and he obtained it through a war which harassed the whites for seven years. He began the war by killing the innocent white inhabitants on the borders of the Everglades. A few days later the chief surprised General Thomson and five of his officers at their dinner and murdered them all. The Creeks joined the Seminoles in 1836, and by bravery, skill and treachery, Osceola frequently overmatched United States troops sent against him and commanded by experienced officers. These depredations were pushed into Georgia, and they plundered and killed the peaceful settlers in all that region of country. General Scott, sent down to command the United States forces, prosecuted the war with such vigor that the Creeks surrendered, and were removed across the Mississippi. But the Seminoles kept up the war for a time with desperate energy. Finally, in March, 1837, some of the chiefs signed a treaty of peace. Osceola, however, caused this treaty to be violated, and the war was renewed and continued all through the summer of 1837. In October Osceola was induced to go with several other chiefs to the camp of Colonel Jesup under the protection of a flag of truce. Jesup was determined to repay Osceola for his many acts of treachery. The conference was held in a grove of magnolias. When Osceola arose to speak Jesup gave a signal and several of his soldiers rushed forward, seized the chief and bound him. He was sent to Charleston and confined in Fort Moultrie, where he died of fever January 31, 1839. The place where he was buried is still to be seen near the main entrance to the fort, marked with a small monument. Colonel Jesup was severely censured for this violation of the sanctity of a flag of truce, but his plea was that it was the only way to check the distressing war, as Osceola could not be held by the most solemn obligations of a treaty. The Seminoles, however, continued the war for several years. A treaty was concluded in 1839, but though many of the tribe were immediately removed to the Indian Territory, peace was not permanently secured until 1842.

The Moment of Death.

"Many persons wonder," said the house doctor of a well known hospital to a New York Telegram reporter, "how physicians can watch unmoved the death of persons whose dissolution is seemingly accompanied by evidence of great suffering, and the remark is a common one that doctors are heartless and unfeeling. This harsh criticism is founded on a wrong idea of things. The fact is that what is known as the death agony is largely restricted to the imagination of the watcher at the bedside of the dying person. The visible spasms and distortions of the facial muscles, which in many cases mark the ending of life, are not only painless, but take place unconsciously as far as the dying person is concerned.

"Even in cases of death by hanging, where the prolonged agony of the sufferer is feelingly described by witnesses, it is reasonably certain that in a few moments the person becomes unconscious, and dies in that condition. Such has been the experience of persons accidentally or purposely hanged, but afterwards resuscitated. It is a fact that persons who have been nearly drowned agree in the statement that after a few moments of painful struggle a feeling of tranquility ensues. The suffering is while the resuscitated person is being brought back to consciousness. Then it is he often suffers physical pain and mental misery. It is a merciful dispensation of God and nature that when the last moments of the dying man are at hand vital forces give out, and the long drawn out gasps for breath come and go, the apparent sufferer is happily in a comatose condition, and so passes painlessly into the other life."

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

HOWE'SHigh School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and original. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTOFOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Guttenberger's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTTENBERGER, Proprietor.

CELEBRATEDWEINER LAGER BEER*CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

CHANGED HANDS.SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars.
ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.

KEEP YOUR EYEOn the Window.

CHANGED DAILY DURING FAIR WEEK.

W. F. Purnell, 609 J St.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

UNCLE IKE'SCOLLATERAL o LOAN o OFFICE,

302 K Street, Sacramento.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Packers and Shippers of California
Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St.

SACRAMENTO.

A. D. BOWLEY.

M. J. CURTIS.

CURTIS & BOWLEY,Real Estate and Insurance Agents.

Pacific States Savings, Loan, and Building Company.

1012 Fourth Street, bet. J and K, Sacramento.

REPRESENT THE

Assets.
Atna Insurance Co. of Hartford, Conn.	$10,000,000 00
Hartford Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn.	5,750,000 00
German-American Insurance Co.	5,000,000 00
Manhattan Life Ins. Co. of New York	11,739,400 00
Fidelity and Casualty Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Co. of New York	774,550 20

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFICHOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSENER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and

Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET.

SACRAMENTO.

Rare Southern Coins.

The commission which has counted the millions in the mint in this city, in examining the curious coins in the mint museum, came across a one-cent piece with a rare history. It is a coin struck from the only complete dies made for the coining of money for the late Confederate government; and these dies were made in Philadelphia in 1861.

Investigation discloses the fact that the only part of these dies is in the possession of J. Calvin Randall, the coin collector of this city. There were only eighty-six pieces struck from the dies, after which they were defaced. The story of this coin is quite interesting. The dies were made by a Mr. Lovett in Philadelphia, who says that they were ordered in 1861 from the south, and were to be for one-cent copper coins.

After manufacturing the dies he was not able to get them out of the city, and, becoming alarmed, hid them away, after striking off twelve nickel pieces. No one except himself knew of the existence of either dies or coins until 1873, when Mr. Randall and John W. Haseltine discovered their existence by accident.

Mr. Lovett had been carrying one of the pieces as a pocket piece, and one evening, by an oversight, passed it in a restaurant. The proprietor, knowing Mr. Haseltine as a collector, sent the piece to him. The latter, recognizing the head of Liberty as Mr. Lovett's work, succeeded, jointly with Mr. Randall, in negotiating the purchase of the dies.

The two gentlemen then agreed to strike off fifty-five pieces in copper, twelve in silver and seven in gold. This accomplished, they mutilated the dies and held the struck coins for sale to collectors. The following is a description of the coin:

Obverse—1861; head of Liberty; inscription, "Confederate States of America." Reverse—A wreath of ears of corn and wheat, with a cotton bale at the bottom; in the center the words "1 cent." The restrikes were struck by Peter L. Krider, 618 Chestnut street.

This was the only coinage ever contemplated by direct authority of the Confederate government, and the original nickel pennies and the restrike pieces are now very valuable. In 1874, when Messrs. Randall and Haseltine offered them for sale to collectors, they asked $30 each for the gold, $15 for the silver, $4 for the copper and $20 for the nickel coins, they having bought from Lovett what he had left of the last struck in 1861. The coins are now very rare and are worth a great deal more than the prices asked in 1874.

The only other coin issued in the south during the war was a half dollar. This was coined at the United States mint at New Orleans in 1861, and for its obverse the United States die for the half dollar was used, being a seated figure of Liberty that still appears on our coins. For the reverse a die was cut whose design consisted of a shield surmounted by a liberty cap, and surrounded by a cotton and sugar cane wreath. The legend was "Confederate States of America Half Dol." A number of these were afterward restrike and the die destroyed. Single pieces have been sold for $25.—Philadelphia Record.

Married on a Poker License.

Recently at Pizen Switch a queer case came before the court. John Malandry was on trial for assault and battery, his offense consisting of having beaten in the face of a man named Trumbo for having stated that Malandry was not married to his wife. When the case was tried Malandry produced his marriage license, which was dated about four years ago, and handed it to the court for inspection. The court read it over through a large pair of silver-rimmed spectacles and remarked:

"Do you consider this a marriage license?"
"I do, sir."
"Where did you get it?"
"I got it of you several years ago,"
"Did you get married on the strength of it?"

"I did, sir."
"Can you read?"
"No, sir."

"I am sorry to inform you," said the court, "that this is not a marriage license at all, but a license to run a poker game for three months in Pizen Switch."

Malandry was very much disconcerted and the spectators burst into a loud laugh. When the matter was investigated it transpired that Malandry had applied to the justice of Pizen Switch for a license to open a poker game, and said he would want it soon. The justice made out the license, and a few weeks later Malandry decided to marry, but his bride insisted that he give up gambling and take to agriculture. The happy groom then sent his brother to get the license, and the justice supposed, of course, that he wanted the gambling license, and gave it, after charging the usual fee. The preacher was a trifle hilarious when the ceremony was performed, so he did not critically inspect the document. Thus it happened that the error was not discovered until the battery case came up in court. The justice made all the amends he could by issuing another marriage license free of charge, and the boys gave the newly wedded couple another charivari.—Carson Appeal.

Girl Life in Portugal.

Comparatively little can be said of girl life in Portugal, for girls have such a very slight role in the life of the nation, says the Atlanta. In childhood they are bright, clever and precocious, very much spoiled, and very much dressed. A formal respect to their parents is insisted on, however; they address them in the third person, kiss their hands and ask their blessing at bedtime. They are constantly in the company of grown-up people, sit up late at night, and are frequently taken to the theater and opera. A little girl of nine amused me very much one day by a grave criticism on the voices of Mmes. Nevada and Theodorini, who were then singing at San Carlos, and the parts in which they respectively shone. Conversation is not restricted in the presence of children, so they are early initiated into that freedom of ideas and freedom of expressing them that is so marked a feature of society in southern Europe.

The education of Portuguese girls is superficial, consisting chiefly in what used to be called "accomplishments"—music, embroidery and languages. In all three they attain great proficiency, and in the latter they excel. Portuguese, unlike the Spaniards and Italians, are first-class linguists; they are in many cases as fluent in French, English and German as in their mother tongue, and conquer the difficulties of accent and idiom with great accuracy. There are schools of all sorts in Lisbon—government schools, private schools, and convent schools belonging to the French order of St. Vincent de Paul; for since the suppression of the national religious houses in 1834, these nuns have quietly spread their influence and multiplied their institutions, and have now almost exclusively in their hands the education of girls of the higher classes. They leave school at 15 or 16, sometimes earlier, and marry very soon after. Among the "upper ten thousand" the young people meet each other constantly at balls, receptions, bull fights, and at the summer resorts, and their courtship is cosmopolitan, rather freer than in France, much less so than in England. It is in the middle and lower classes that it is characteristic of the country and the nation. The Portuguese are very conservative in their ideas of the position of women in society, and they got their ideas from their Moorish masters in bygone centuries. Consequently, girls lead a shut-in life; they go regularly to mass on Sunday mornings, and take occasional walks during the week, always accompanied by one or two chaperons. Young men never call at the house, and if they did would not be admitted "except on business." This strictness leaves but one way open for an interchange of sentiments, and that is the window, and it is quite the thing to make use of it. It is not considered ill-bred to stare in Portugal; a man may stare at a girl he does not know as long as he likes; he must not do so to a girl he has been introduced to, unless she gives him some encouragement by returning his glances. A girl will sit at the window all the afternoon looking into the street, and her adorer from the street looks at her; and this is so much the custom that it attracts no attention from the passers-by. From looks they proceed to bows, to smiles, to a few words; then he follows her to church, finds out if she is going to the theater, and goes, too; serenades her with his guitar on moonlight nights, and finally makes an offer to her father. He is then received by the family, and allowed to come to the house in a quiet way till the wedding, and after that the young couple live either with her parents or his, and the even tenor of their life continues.

I heard a Portuguese gentleman who had traveled, and was considered homme du monde, say: "Marriage makes no difference in the life of a woman; before it she lives with her mother; after it she lives with her mother; what more could she want?"

Judge Waxem's Proverbs.

The Declaration of Independents has got a wider foundation than all the throats of Urup put together.

Public schools furnishes the best fatening for the Amerikin Egel.

Some men would rather be president for fore yers before they die than be the Lord Almity for eternity afterwards.

No wonder some of our statesmen air sitch pore material when you come to think what wages they git.

Patriotism won't grow in cittys like it will in the country.

Wimmin that marrys the rite kind of men ain't hankering to vote.

It's a good sine for the country when boys differs with their daddies in polliticks.

Most candicates overdoes it.

Newspaper edditors air the real kings of polliticks.

Thar's a mity comfortin' sort of a shine to a pocketful of silver money.

A vice-president is mostly fer meetin' emergencies.—Detroit Free Press.

The German Emperor has been measured for a new crown. It will be made in the most approved fall and winter shape. Some people, says the New York Tribune, think that this is an unnecessary bit of extravagance. They say the old crown is just about as good as new, and would do very well for another season with a little renovating.

A Copious Spring.

One of the most copious springs in Great Britain is the famed St. Winifred's well near the town of Holywell, in Flintshire. The well is an oblong square, about 12 feet by 7, and its water, say the people of the district, has never been known to freeze. This latter assertion may be true, as, besides containing a fair percentage of mineral matters that lower its freezing point, the well is inside a beautiful chapel which was erected over it by Queen Margaret, the mother of Henry VII. The water thrown up is not less than eighty-four hogheads every minute, and the quantity appears to vary very little either in drought or after the heaviest rain, showing, doubtless, that its primitive sources are numerous and widely distributed. St. Winifred's has been the object of many pilgrimages.

A. L. HART, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Sutter Building, cor. Fifth and J.

GROVE L. JOHNSON, ALBERT M. JOHNSON, HIRAM W. JOHNSON, JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON, LAWYERS.

504 J street, Sacramento, Cal.

CHAS. T. JONES, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, 607 I Street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, 627 J Street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Southwest corner Fourth and J Streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Practices in all the Courts. 607 I Street.

W. A. ANDERSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, No. 209 J Street.

JAMES B. DEVINE, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, No. 604 J Street.

W. A. GETT, JR., ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Bryte Building, cor. Seventh and J.

CHAUNCEY H. DUNN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

S. SOLON HOLL, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, LAWYERS, Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, 1007 Second Street.

J. W. HUGHES, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

MCKUNE & GEORGE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Northeast corner Fourth and J.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Southwest corner Fourth and J.

CHAS. H. OATMAN, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, No. 418 J street, up-stairs.

L. S. TAYLOR, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Bryte Building, Seventh and J.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, LAWYER, Rooms Nos. 13 and 15, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE G. DAVIS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVEK, LAWYER, 920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney), ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, upstairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, N.W. corner Sixth and K.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—TAKE Notice.—That on the 30th day of October, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 181 to 184, inclusive. The nature of the business to be conducted by me is keeping a dairy and selling milk; the place of my said business is Sacramento County, Sutter Township, and the name of my husband is J. L. Clark. KATIE E. CLARK. se26-5t

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor. E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor, having applied to this Court for a discharge from his debts, it is hereby ordered that the Clerk of this Court give notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, to appear before this Court, at the court-room thereof, on the 2d day of October, 1891, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock, p. m., and show cause, if any they have, why the said E. M. Stevens should not be discharged from all his debts, in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided. It is further ordered, that notice of said application be given to the creditors by mail, and by publication for four weeks in the THEMIS, a newspaper published in said county. W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated September 30, 1891. W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. se25-4t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of F. L. Bates, an insolvent debtor. F. L. Bates, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said F. L. Bates is hereby declared to be insolvent. All persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association, for his use, and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the county of Sacramento, on the 9th day of October, 1891, at 1:30 p. m. of that day, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, September 30, A. D. 1891. W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.

Filed September 30, 1891. W. W. RHODES, Clerk.

CLINTON L. WHITE, Attorney for Petitioner. se5-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of V. CURRAN, an insolvent debtor.—V. Curran having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said V. Curran is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said V. Curran, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 18th day of September, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock p. m. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated August 13th, 1891. JAMES B. DEVINE, Attorney for Petitioner. a15-5t

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O. S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S. Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and $\frac{3}{4}$ Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for \$1,418.15, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHODES, Clerk. By J. F. DOODY, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to THEODORE J. KERLIN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1891, in which action, Nettie R. Kerlin is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To have the bonds of matrimony now existing between you and the plaintiff dissolved; that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the children, issue of said marriage, and for alimony, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 14th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHODES, Clerk. By J. F. DOODY, Deputy Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & PLATNAUER, Attorneys for Plaintiff. jy18-8t

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO, State of California.—In the matter of the Columbus Brewing Company, a corporation, an insolvent debtor. An adjudication of insolvency herein having been duly made, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the 23d day of October, 1891, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., at the court-room of this Court, in Department No. 1, in the city of Sacramento, be and the same are the time and place appointed for the meeting of the creditors to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the city of Sacramento, at least once a week during the period prior to the time appointed for the meeting of creditors. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated this 17th day of September, 1891. A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Attorneys for Petitioners.

Thoughts.

Fuss is the froth of business.—Hood.
Whoever is out of patience is out of his soul.—Bacon.
The curtain of the future is always drawn.—John Bigelow.
Idleness is both a great sin and the cause of many more.—South.

Ability involves responsibility. Power to its last particle is duty.—MacLaren.
To be famous when you are young is the fortune of the gods.—Beaconsfield.

A man cannot learn to be wise any more than he can learn to be handsome.—H. W. Shaw.

The world is so unjust that a female heart once touched is thought forever bleached.—Steele.

We always live prospectively, never retrospectively, and there is no abiding moment.—Jacobi.

For a while, at least, I think almost every man or woman is interesting when in love.—Thackeray.

The work of an unknown good man has done is like a vein of water flowing hidden under ground, secretly making the ground green.—Carlyle.

There is nothing which this age, from whatever standpoint we survey it, needs more—physically, intellectually and morally—than thorough ventilation.—Ruskin.

I would rather dwell in the dim fog of superstition than in an air rarefied to nothing by the air pump of unbelief—in which the panting breast expires, vainly and convulsively gasping for breath.—Richter.

Burning of Pennsylvania Hall.

The Abolitionists of fifty years ago were a despised and rejected class. They were few in number, and popular clamor was nearly everywhere against them. They were not permitted to hold meetings in the churches and halls of Philadelphia, and determined to erect a hall of their own. The place erected was called Pennsylvania Hall, built at a cost of $40,000. It was dedicated May 14, 1838. David Paul Brown delivered the oration, the subject being "Liberty." John G. Whittier wrote for this occasion a poetical address. During three days meetings were held and speeches were made, says Henry Wilson, to crowded assemblies for temperance, for the Indian, and for the slave. At the same time there was in the city an anti-slavery convention of women, and it was announced that on the evening of the third day some of its members would address the audience. There were such great crowds in attendance that thousands had to go away unable to gain admission. There were gathered around crowds of people, who hurled stones against the windows, and the audience was interrupted by every riotous demonstration. In the hall were many who joined in the yelling and the disturbance. William Lloyd Garrison made an address, as also did Mrs. Maria W. Chapman, of Boston; Miss Angelina Grimke, then an exile from her native State because of her abhorrence of slavery; Miss Abby Kelly, of Massachusetts, and others. On May 17 the mob again began to gather around the hall. Those who held the hall in trust appealed to the police and mayor for protection, but the day passed without any measures being taken. The mayor informed the board of managers that he would disperse the disturbing elements, provided the hall was placed in his hands. He addressed the mob, that separated for a little while, only to reassemble at the hall, and to begin attacking its doors and windows. The mayor called on the police and fire companies, and was unable to protect the place. The hall was soon set on fire and destroyed. During the two days following the rioters attacked the negroes of the city. Among the places attacked was "the Shelter for Colored Orphans," a charitable institution which had no connection with the abolitionists. Bethel Church was attacked and damaged, and the dwellings of colored people were surrounded and the inmates threatened with violence.

Gods of the Bantus.

The great majority of the Bantu people of South Africa have no idea of the place of habitation or mode of existence of their deities; some of the more enlightened, however, especially those who have had some communication with the Boers, have an idea that the Great Spirit lives some place above them, most of them believing that his place of abode is in the top of an immense tree. One curious fact regarding Bantu superstitions is this: Although the more northerly tribes have an idea that the Great Spirit resides some place above them, those to the south, which come in contact with the Boers almost every day in the year, cannot be persuaded that their deities do not dwell in lonely caves and subterranean cavities underneath the earth. Before their intercourse with the whites it never entered the Bantu's mind that the acts of this life could have any effect upon the spirit after death.

Miss Helen Gladstone, the grand old man's daughter, is always laughing, joking, telling stories, and invariably keeps the dinner table in a roar.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

Imperial

GALLERY,
No. 415 J Street,
Between Fourth and Fifth,
SACRAMENTO.

Finest Finished Cabinet Photographs, $2.00 per Dozen.

All Other Work in Proportion, and Guaranteed First Class.

CALL AND EXAMINE OUR SPECIMENS BEFORE GOING ELSEWHERE.

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,

Photographic Art Parlors

426 1/2 J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK

Restaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET.

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice,

SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

October, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

LV.	Trains Run Daily.	ARR.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.40 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.20 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.35 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
11.50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express
	Ogden and East	5.25 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.05 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.40 P
10.00 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
10.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.40 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.40 P
3.05 P	Vallejo
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2.40 P
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*4.45 P	Folsom	*8.00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank
DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank
SACRAMENTO, CAL.

CAPITAL STOCK PAID UP.....$225,500.00
RESERVE AND SURPLUS.....54,253.26

Term and Ordinary Deposits Received.
Dividends Paid Semi-annually.

Money Loaned on Real Estate Only.

WM. BECKMAN, President.

GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier.

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER. WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,
CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE FARMERS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1891.

No. 34.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

It would seem the Farmers' Alliance in this county is committing the blunder most new reform movements fall into: of permitting itself to be made the avenue through which publicity is given to the vaporings of professional cranks. Insanity has its degrees; in some instances the person affected conceives his mission is to reform the world and all the inhabitants thereof. The great mass of humans recognize that men of such defective mental organization are, as a rule, harmless, and permit them to voice their hobbies in speeches before "reform" meetings and in the column of "Public Echoes" in the daily press. At a gathering of the Farmers' Alliance at Galt recently, one of the name of Reed broadly stated that three of the members of the Board of Supervisors of this county had been paid $15,000 corruption money for their votes on a certain ordinance. It is hardly necessary to pay attention to a charge so grossly absurd, save to suggest that an organization such as the alliance—that by well-directed effort can accomplish good—should muzzle its cranks and not permit them to bring the organization into ridicule. It is the rule of human life that there do exist men who, when permitted to address an audience or write anonymously in a paper, will grossly abuse their privilege and will make broad, visionary statements. In this matter the supervisors have demanded, formally, an investigation by the Grand Jury. What is the use of going half way?—we have a commission of experts to examine lunatics.

We did speak in our issue of September 26th concerning Maximilian, the "ill-fated" Emperor of Mexico. In that article we stated that he was executed by shooting on July 19, 1867. Therein we were in error; he died June 19, 1867. We accepted the date given in a reprint of Chambers' Encyclopedia, and it was a month wrong. A correspondent has asked us to, among other things, give the reasons for his execution. That cannot be done, save generally, in the scope of a newspaper article. At the time of the French invasion of Mexico (for it was really an invasion by that country, and one of the schemes of Napoleon III), civil war prevailed in the United States, and it did seem there would be established a permanent confederate government whose territory would lie between that of the remnant of the old Union and Mexico. The weak policy of Buchanan had led the powers of Europe to believe the formidable revolution of the Southern States meant the ending of the federal compact; and it took some time for them to realize the force of the determined and aggressive policy of Lincoln, and those he had selected to aid in the cabinet, on the field and upon the ocean. At the time the sway of Maximilian was at its height, our government was not in position to assist its republican neighbor, except incidentally, yet it was President Juarez did receive substantial aid in money and personal service from individuals here. It is said that Samuel Brannan, of this State, loaned the Liberal President some one hundred thousand dollars, and for it afterward received the land concession of which so much has been written. It had been expected Juarez could not maintain himself and the Liberal party, of which he was the head, against the forces at the command of Maximilian, and there did prevail among the Mexicans a superstition that the moment the indomitable President should be driven over the line of his country there would be no hope. At a time when it seemed Juarez would be forced to retire into the United States, Maximilian issued a proclamation denouncing all who opposed his government as brigands, and condemning them to death. Under this brutal and far-reaching proclamation indiscriminate murders were committed. So far even did it go that the cadets in the Mexican military college—mere boys—were slaughtered. True it was, Maximilian claimed these murders were the acts of subordinates, yet he cannot be excused. Our civil war terminated, and the United States assumed a decisive stand. Our armies had not been disbanded; Napoleon was told he would have to encounter not alone Juarez, but Grant, Sherman and Sheridan. He retired and left Maximilian to his fate. Sympathy naturally is aroused that one of the prominence of Maximilian should have been tried summarily and executed; there is, however, a forgetting of the justification of the act of his adversaries. At the time his execution was denounced as a violation of the rules of civilized warfare; however, under his infamous proclamation, slaughter had been the rule; those who opposed his government were ruthlessly slain. Had President Juarez fallen into his hands he doubtless would have met the fate that had been meted out to very many of his compatriots. We reproduce an editorial article from the Sacramento Union, of July 6, 1867, relative to the execution of Maximilian, and commend it as being a careful and correct estimate of the matter.

THE END OF A TYRANT.

There seems to be no question of the authenticity of the intelligence which reached us a few days ago announcing the tragic end of the tyrant who, for about four years, has lorded over Mexico. He fell into the hands of the republican forces at the surrender of Queretaro, and, after summary trial by a court martial, was sentenced to death, and, by the orders of Juarez, was shot on the 19th of June. He shared the fate which so many of his class deserve and which not a few of them have received. The enormity of the crime thus expiated will scarcely be comprehended by the present generation of men, either in Europe or America—in the former, because there was too much complicity there in the crime itself; and in the latter, because the public sense has been blunted by a nearer contemplation of other enormities equally repulsive and shocking. History, moreover, views great events from an eminence and through the medium of a clearer light than is vouchsafed to the actors in the stirring and confused scenes which time and philosophic truthfulness resolve into consistency and order. Upon the historic page the career of Maximilian will make a striking episode. No parallel to it will be found in the record of any usurper that ever risked his head to wear a crown. The most selfish, the most brutal, the most sanguinary, have had their apologists and defenders; some claim, growing out of unrepented wrongs, or some semblance of inheritable right exhumed from the dusty records of the past, could be found with which to supply a motive more or less defensible. But Maximilian's case stands upon the naked ground of an invader, without the shadow of a justifying or excusable cause. He had not even the robber's plea that might makes right. He had neither men nor money of his own to carry on the wicked enterprise, but used the mercenaries furnished him by a brother in the cause of spoliation and robbery. An antipode and an alien in the most extended sense to Mexico, its form of government and its traditions, no conceivable motive can be ascribed to him but the lust of power—the hankering after a crown. He assumed the airs of a philanthropist, and professed that the social order which a despotism enforced were better for the Mexican people than the republican confusion in which they were involved; and in order to give effect to these favorite dogmas of kingcraft and priestcraft he deluged half a continent in blood and confiscated the estates of all who opposed him. He came as a royal missionary to introduce European civilization where it was falsely alleged a semi-barbarism existed; and his instruments were the bayonets of a band of trained African savages and an army of French soldiers, employed without mercy upon the common people, while the halter and the scourge were relied upon to subdue men and women of distinction. His armies devastated the fairest fields in Mexico, and his rule of warfare against the inhabitants who resisted was such as our Government does not feel authorized to practice against the merciless savages. His edicts denied to the patriots who bore arms against him the privileges of honorable warfare, and thereby turned his prisoners over to indiscriminate slaughter. In this mad career he persisted after his allies had deserted him, and was only stopped when his own blood sank into the soil saturated with that of thousands of his victims.

The wisdom of the act of Juarez in permitting the ax of justice to fall upon the neck of so illustrious a subject has been questioned by some who, we apprehend, do not sufficiently appreciate the importance of always maintaining an erect and resolute front against the pretensions of royalty. The contest in Mexico is yet between republicanism and imperialism. The weight of this royal name, the odor of sanctity which surrounds the person of a Caesar, the divinity which doth hedge a king, were so many forces marshaled against Juarez in his struggle. To have spared Maximilian because he was the brother of the Emperor of Austria and protege of Napoleon would have been to acknowledge a principle always in active hostility to republicanism in Mexico. But more practical reasons than these not only justify the act, but make it clear that Juarez would have shown himself unequal to his position if he had faltered in so plain a duty. The public voice of Mexico demanded it, and a refusal on his part would have weakened his own authority, now so needful in reconstructing a shattered government; besides, it was a necessary blow, in order to destroy the imperial party. With Maximilian retired to Europe, a new plot to establish an empire in Mexico could be worked out at leisure. While the hope of restoration existed there would be enough material in the Mexican element for it to work upon, and traitors would be found in the bosom of the republic as long as a banished emperor lived to nourish them.

Juarez has proved himself a statesman in his past career, and has not acted in this important affair without a full consideration of the subject in all its probable bearings. There are none in Europe that will care to resent the death of Maximilian except Napoleon and Francis Joseph; and neither of these can afford to undertake a war against Mexico for such a cause. Juarez has but vindicated the Monroe doctrine, and that is a principle for which the United States can now afford to fight. When that question again comes up for diplomatic discussion our government will not have the southern confederacy at its throat choking its utterance, but it will be free-handed and willing to defend itself, and its neighbor if needful, against the next effort at imperial propagandism on this continent.

Concerning the article we have quoted from the Union, there is an interesting history. Henry C. Watson became the editor of that paper in 1861; he was then a man of but thirty years of age, and he filled the editorial chair during the years of the war. To his writings in that paper of power there was due in large measure the integrity of California to the union, yet he is almost forgotten. He died suddenly in this city, June 24, 1867, and was succeeded by Judge A. P. Catlin as the editorial writer. The article concerning Maximilian was translated and published in the leading Mexican papers, and later on a letter was received at the Union office commendatory of Watson and enclosing a copy of the translated article. Watson had died some two weeks before the article was published in the Union; the editorial was written by Judge Catlin. That we speak of Watson it is but meet that we reproduce the editorial reference to his death, published in the Union of June 25, 1867. It is our understanding it was written by Senator Booth:

Henry C. Watson, editor of the Sacramento Union, is dead. The announcement will come as a personal sorrow to the readers of this paper, and his death will be mourned as a loss in every household where the Union is a guest. To us, his co-laborers, this calamity comes with awful suddenness, and his vacant chair before us suggests a void that will not easily be filled. We have neither time nor inclination now for a critical or biographical sketch. The life of a newspaper editor is so impersonal, his thoughts form and are blended with public opinion so imperceptibly, that his individuality is scarcely realized by those in daily communion with him until his labors have ceased. He is better known by the vacuum he leaves than by the place he filled. Mr. Watson was a native of Maryland, and died in his thirty-seventh year. Few men served a more thorough apprenticeship in his profession than he. He was connected with the Philadelphia press from his boyhood. He grew up and was educated in a newspaper office. He was a practical printer and thoroughly familiar with every department of editorial duty. Writing became a habit; it was easier than talking, and he thought best pen in hand. Of quick perceptions, his art criticisms were kindly and appreciative. As a reviewer, he seemed to tell the literary quality of a book by turning over its leaves, or he would cut into the heart of its subject and seize upon its central thought with unerring force. As a news editor, he limned the outline of passing events with great accuracy. The world told him its story from day to day, and he intuitively separated the little from the great, the permanent from the passing away. But it was as a political writer that he was best known and will be longest remembered. He came to California as one of the Union staff late in 1861. Before, he had been a journalist by profession, writing with ease and grace upon any subject his editorial duties required; but the great events then rising in the political horizon stirred all the manhood within him, and aroused him to the highest expression of his best thought; journalism became more than a profession—it was a means to reach the public heart, to lead popular feeling, to educate the public mind, form public opinion and incite the right action. Who will forget, during the long and doubtful struggle, how hopeful he was, how firm in the faith that right would triumph? yet, withal, how intolerant of shams, how impatient with weakness, how relentless in his denunciation of the wrong. How often, in the dark hours, from behind the thin veil of his impersonality, has his war cry rang out, stirring the blood like the blast of a trumpet. When the physical contest was over, he realized that the moral battle—the battle where men of thought are the silent, unknown heroes—had only begun; he took his place in the line, measured his strength for the contest; he knew that the questions of peace were difficult and dangerous as the problems of war, and he would be content with no other solution than the recognition of the manhood of man and the policy of freedom.

The throbbing brain will throb no more—
No longer toil the toiling breast—a hero of the pen has fallen!

MARTHA'S GHOST.

"But surely there are more rooms?"

The young widow who had come down to Garland to hire a little house for the summer had followed the agent into the two-story cottage and was staring about her.

"Only four rooms?" she said. "Surely there were ten—I mean that the house looks larger on the outside."

"Oh, there were ten originally, ma'am," the agent replied; "there were ten, but the rest are boarded up. This is simply the wing; but you have a parlor, a dining room and two bedrooms, besides the little outside kitchen, which is a building by itself; and the rent is actually nominal."

"But the folly of boarding up six good rooms!" said the lady. "The parlor, with the wainscot and the black-marble mantelpiece—"

"You know the house?" cried the agent.

"Oh, in houses of this sort you always find a black-marble mantel and a wainscot," said the lady. "And on the other side of the hall the sitting room and spare bedroom; and three bedrooms up stairs, and the linen closet and bathroom—the long, dark linen closet."

"The ghost always comes out of that," said the agent.

"Oh—oh!" cried the lady. "The cat is out of the bag. The house is haunted?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied the agent; "it has that reputation among ignorant people; but since the main building has been boarded in, the figure has never been seen by any one."

"The figure?" asked the lady. "All in white, like an ironing board?"

"All in white, but like a pretty girl of sixteen," replied the agent. "I remember the murder myself. My father was in the real estate business where I am now. I was a schoolboy. I remember how the news ran through the village that Martha Penny had been killed by wild Jack Parker, and how I rushed up with the crowd to see her. Yes, ma'am, I saw her lying weltering in her blood, across the threshold of the linen closet."

The lady shuddered and sat down in the large, chintz-covered arm chair of the room they had entered.

"You can go and play in the garden," she said to the little boy whom she led by the hand. "Don't go out of sight. Now, tell me the story, Mr. Brick."

"Very sensible to send the child away," the agent said. "Well, the facts were these: Martha Penny lived as seamstress with Mrs. Parker. They made her one of the family. Jack fell in love with her. The story goes that she refused him, and that he said that she should never marry any other man. Then she declared that she meant to go away; and she was getting ready to go, when she saw him, with blazing eyes, coming down the passage, and ran into the linen closet. A servant watched it all. As he passed the door he shot her. They arrested him and took him off to prison. But while the body was waiting for the coroner it disappeared, no one ever knew how. Mrs. Parker had taken to her bed. Ann had been afraid to sit in the room with the murdered girl. In the night the corpse vanished."

"The jury made up their minds that Jack was crazy, and he was locked up for awhile, though he swore that the pistol went off by accident. When he was let out again his mother was dead. He is quite a rich man, but he never could bear to live on his property. He has a room at the hotel, and has let all the land. At first he let the house also, but the tenants were all scared away—by the ghost, they said; so, five years ago he boarded up the main building, and only lets the wing. Every summer people hire it. It is prettily furnished, you see, with new things. The old stuff is all in the old rooms. They do say that they hear noises in the big building; but probably rats make them. And, Mrs. Smith, you don't look like a lady who would be afraid of—"

"Martha Penny's ghost?" interrupted the lady. "Indeed I am not. Poor little Martha would do no one any harm. I should be much more afraid of Jack Parker, though; he is alive."

"He's an altered man, ma'am," said the agent; "quite broken, though he is rather young in years."

"I'll take the house, Mr. Brick," said the widow, rising and beckoning through the open window to her little boy. "And my servant and I and little Tom will move in on Monday."

They did so, and soon flowers bloomed in the garden and at the windows, and the pretty child swung under the elm trees or tossed his ball on the lawn. The mother, reclining in her hammock, read or crocheted, or walked with her boy when the day grew cool. The maid was pretty and alert. No home in the country seemed less likely to attract ghosts to itself; and Mrs. Smith, when questioned, always said that she had never caught a glimpse of Martha Penny's specter.

But though Mrs. Smith told the truth, she did not tell the whole truth. Sometimes at night—yes, at midnight—when little Tom and the maid were sound asleep, the lady, wrapped in a double gown, and with woolen slippers on her feet, would glide out into the hall, and there, with her ear to the light partition that divided the wing from the main building, would listen to feet that went to and fro; to wails and moans; to what seemed to her prayers, and to many repetitions of the name "Martha Penny"—"Martha Penny," but oftenest "Martha" alone. She never spoke of this to anyone, and it was plain that she felt no terror; but sometimes she wept bitterly, as if she were very sorry for the poor, wandering ghost.

This went on for months, until one night Mrs. Smith did a strange thing: she arose in the middle of the night and let down the great coil of her brown hair and braided it in one braid and tied it with white ribbon; she dressed herself all in white, and over her head threw a square of tulle; then she left her house, taking a lantern with her, and stole towards a side door of the main building and tried a key in the lock and entered in.

The place was dry with dust, and dust rolled beneath her feet as she climbed the stairs, and spiders crawled along the balustrades and up the walls. She passed the big chamber and the little chamber and stopped at the linen closet.

Opening the door she saw piles of cloths and sheets and towels and pillow-cases, once white, but now powdered grey, as though a snow of that hue had fallen on them.

She lowered her lantern and beheld across the sill a stain of blood, and within, on the floor, a deeper one; but she did not shudder; indeed, a smile crossed her face—a pitiful, tender smile.

"Poor little Martha Penny!" she said, and, without a quiver or a cry, she entered in and shut the door behind her.

A small, round window, high up in the wall, let in a little gleam of moonlight; a broken pane admitted a breath of air; but amid the woolen blankets at the further end moths burrowed. She could see their tracks, and a curious smell that lingers in moth-eaten wool made the air heavy.

Already her lantern's light attracted insects that came through the broken pane above to flutter about it. She closed the slide, and now looked like a very ghost herself—all white in the faint moonlight.

She listened intently. Soon she heard the sound of a door closed carefully, feet upon the stairs, feet in the passage without the door. Someone began to pace slowly up and down.

"Martha," said a voice, "Martha!" Then there was silence. Then again, "Marta—Martha!"

It was a man's voice which spoke. Now it went on—

"They say your ghost haunts this house. I have come here so often and heard nothing, seen nothing. Martha, give me some sign that you hear me."

The widow lifted her hand and tapped lightly on the door.

There was a little cry without, then "Martha" came again, and now the widow spoke:

"You call Martha. She is here. For once, and once only, she is permitted to listen to you. Who are you?"

"The man who loved you—Jack Parker," replied the voice. "May I see you, Martha—angel Martha—may I see you?"

"If you swear not to move—not to try to touch me," said the widow.

"I swear," replied Jack, in a choking voice.

The door of the linen closet moved slowly. The man on his knees in the passage without saw a white-draped figure with long braids of hair hanging below its waist.

"My God!" he gasped. "Do I see you again, Martha?"

"I am Martha Penny," replied the widow, in a soft whisper. "Why have you called me?"

"To ask your forgiveness," the man replied. "Without it I am lost in this world and the next. Speak to me, sweet angel; tell me that you know I did not kill you with intent to do so. Let the world think what it will. Tell me you know it was not so—that you knew it even when you fell there, where you stand now—tell me so, and save my soul!"

"When I fell," the faint voice whispered—"when the blood gushed from the wound you gave me—I believed that you had shot me purposely. In this belief I lost consciousness. Yes, when I seemed to die I thought that you had killed me."

"But now?" asked Jack.

"Oh, unhappy man," replied the spirit, "night after night I have heard your moans; night after night I have heard you swear by all that is holy to your innocence. I do not doubt you now. Be at peace. We shall meet again, and I forgive you."

With a cry the man flung himself upon the floor, and great sobs burst from his bosom.

"At last!" he gasped. "At last! Oh, dear angel, at last! Oh, God be praised!"

The white figure came nearer to the fallen man; it bent over him.

"Jack," it said, in more earthly tones, "I am so glad that you did not mean to kill me. Poor boy, you were always handling that revolver recklessly; but you know you threatened me. I loved you, Jack, but I could not marry you: your mother was so proud, and yet she had been so good to me, a poor little orphan. So I swore to myself that I would go away and never see you again, unless she called me back. That is why I refused you, Jack—that is why."

Thrilling and chilling, Jack lifted himself on his elbow, and stared into the veiled face.

"Certainly I am really mad at last," he said.

But the voice, now even more distinct and full of earthly tenderness, went on:

"No, Jack, no, you are quite sane, quite sane. Remember how the body of poor Martha Penny was spirited away. Have you never thought that perhaps she was not dead, though that stupid old doctor, in his dotage, declared her so? Jack, poor Jack! she was alive. But when she came to herself, the horror she felt that you should murder her was very great. And yet she did not wish to give any evidence that would send you to prison. She resolved to fly. The old servant helped her away, and lied to cover the act. Jack, I am no ghost; I am alive; I am flesh and blood. Touch my hand; I give you leave. Poor Jack, poor fellow; how you have suffered all these years!"

"As they suffer in hades," he said, and humbly put his lips to the hem of her robe.

"I worked hard for awhile, then a good old man married me," she went on. "He was kind as a father, and I have a little boy. I am a widow now, and I came back to see the old place. I live in the wing that the agent had to let, and night after night I heard you through the partition, weeping and praying forgiveness of my ghost, swearing you did not mean to harm me. And I meant that you should only think that my ghost forgave you. But I—I could not help telling the truth, dear Jack, once I saw you so near me and so broken-hearted."

Then, indeed, Jack grew bolder, and dared to touch her hands and to lift them to his lips. He was thankful and humble, as though heaven had vouchsafed him a vision of angels, and he left her at her door as he might have parted from one.

But after all, she was a living woman, he a man who loved her, and ere the autumn leaves fell they were wed.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Mrs. Potter is to make a six months' professional tour of Africa. The idea is a good one. She can't possibly act worse than the Africans do.

Louis James and Frederic Warde pool issues next season and star jointly. They promise to produce the new plays The Lion's Mouth and Memnon.

The leading actor of Copenhagen is Joachim Ludwiff Phister, who for more than fifty years has been connected with the Royal Danish Theater. He has appeared in 700 roles and has marvelous control over the muscles of his face.

"Old Anse, otherwise Capt. Anson., of the Chicago league team, will be an actor by and by. Charley Hoyt has half promised to write a play for him, and Charley Hoyt's plays have made actors of even less promising material than Anson.

The Wheeling Intelligencer declares positively that Mojeska smokes the villainous smudges manufactured in that town and known with terror by consumers of tobacco as "stogies." Mojeska is a woman, and cannot on that account whip the libeler, but she can sue him for damages.

The costumes to be used by Henry Irving in his forthcoming production of Henry VIII, in which he will appear as Cardinal Wolesey, will cost $15,000. If Mr. Irving will take his text from the lines of his role and serve his art as well as he has served his costumer he ought to score a great triumph.

Patti is very fond of parrots, and when she sees one that strikes her fancy she does not hesitate to pay the price asked for it, however exorbitant it may be. Some years ago she actually paid $5,000 for a parrot, and this loquacious bird is still to be seen and heard in her winter garden at Craig-y-Nos. One of the diva's parrots speaks Welsh, another French and others English.

Bobby Gaylor's farce comedy, Sport McAlister, was written by Charles J. Vincent, the author of The Editor, The Grass Widow, Lady Tom, and Patti Rosa's new play Dolly Varden. When Bobby Gaylor is in New York he stops at the house of an Irish lady, who hails from the historical city of Cork. Bobby claims that he tries all his new gags and songs on her first, and that she is the best audience he ever played to.

Some relics of Shakespeare, said to have been heretofore unknown to the general public, have just been discovered and brought to light by William Winter, the well-known journalist and dramatic critic of New York. Mr. Winter has been spending some weeks here and got on the track of those articles in his rambles about the adjacent country. The relics consist of a jug and cane. The jug has a metal lid, and the cane is of malacca wood, just such a stick as was customarily carried in the days of Elizabeth. The articles came from Gloucester where they have been preserved in the family of a Mr. Fletcher.

People certainly do make queer testamentary dispositions. A Parisian widow left by will a tidy sum to the Theater Comique, asking that it be invested and the income used to supply real champagne in all performances where wine was one of the properties. Now she has an English imitator, also a widow, who has bequeathed to Henry Irving £3,000—that is $15,000—for exactly the same purpose. The giver, it is said, was the daughter of a well-known and very eccentric London physician. Charitable folks no doubt think she could have devoted her money to better use, but actors and actresses will probably bless her and keep her memory moist if not green.

A recent domestic difficulty between some collateral relations of the late actress Laura Keene develops an interesting fact and an equally interesting falsehood. The first is that the dress which Laura Keene wore in Our American Cousin on the night President Lincoln was assassinated was cut into small pieces and distributed among the friends of the amiable old gentleman who was holding the property in trust for his daughter. The son-in-law, who was arrested for running away and marrying that daughter, naively says that he could have sold the garment for $1,000. The last is the statement of both parties that the dress was stained with the blood of the President. Laura Keene had nothing to do with Mr. Lincoln. He occupied an upper box when he was shot, and she was back in the wings. She was nowhere near him at any time. She appeared in that costume again and again afterward, and it is needless to say that there was no blood of the martyred Lincoln on it.

Dramatic authors in America may safely learn a lesson from the playwrights of France. For that matter, the more prosperous body of English dramatists may well be guided by the French example. There was once a Dramatic Authors' Society in England, but it never amounted to much; and there was also at one time a prospect of a similar society in America, but it went to pieces from a variety of causes, chief of which was incompatibility of temperament. In France, however, the Société des Auteurs Dramatiques not only gets for the poorest playwright his 10 per cent. of the gross receipts, but it also writes its own history as it goes along. And what a history its is! The catalogue just published by this society of the plays of a century—from 1789 to 1889—comprises the enormous total of 26,033 tragedies, comedies, melodramas, operas, and farces performed in France alone in one hundred years. That is a far more prolific showing than can be made by either England or America. It indicates the early production of over 260 new pieces in France. It is only within the past ten years that America has been able to produce over 200 fresh plays yearly, and yet we have ten times as many theatrical centers as France has.

Book Chat.

Dr. Sigurd Ibsen, son of the pessimistic dramatist, and Bergliot Bjornson, daughter of the poet and politician, are engaged to marry.

Alfred Tennyson and Henry James have been writing plays fearlessly challenging comparison with Charles Hoyt and other authors of farce comedy.

"Set aside ideals," wrote Goethe to a friend, "and of the present moment make use, more and more. Each moment is of infinite worth, for each represents a whole eternity."

A recent visitor to Ibsen found him in a shabby dressing gown buttoned over gray trousers. On his feet were felt slippers, and his hair was in great disorder, as were his big side whiskers. His face appears comical at first sight, but there is a line of satire between his clean-shaven lips.

The composing stick used by Benjamin Franklin when at work in a London printing office is now owned by an Englishman. On one side of the setting-rule, now in the stick, is an engraving of the original printing press, with the words, "Printing, the Art Preservative of Arts," whilst in the left-hand corner are the initials "W. G.," and on the right "Shallus fecit."

Beatrice Whitby, author of "The Awakening of Mary Fenwick," which was one of the most original novels published last year, has just collected half a dozen of her short stories in a volume, "On the Lake of Lucerne" being the title. "Studies of Girls" might have been the name, with good reason, for each is a girl's tale, generally told in the first person. They are in different moods, but one, called "Poor Dear Mamma," being the confessions of a discontented young woman, will appear to many interesting creatures who are quite charming—except to their parents—like a series of recollections of their own sentiments.

The mysterious power of originality, which is one of the few natural gifts that even envy must bow to, was the distinguishing characteristic of Abraham Lincoln's literary character. It was conspicuous in his humor; but it was not less so in his higher and more serious compositions and speeches. Though it is as a President of the United States that his name will live in history, it must not be overlooked that he was before the public as a man of ideas, as an expounder of the law and constitution, as the champion of free soil, as a speaker, generally, in political canvasses. His genius shone forth resplendent in logic, wit, humor, pathos, and, at times, in an eloquence that for effectiveness has never been surpassed. There is no reason why he should not take his proper place in the list of American literary names.

Professional Chat.

The ministry of justice of Russia has framed a law by which a Jewish barrister accepting the Christian religion has to serve a three years' term of probation before he gets the right to practice his profession.

The Congregationalist tells of an erring church brother in Vermont whose conscience forced him to get up in open meeting one day and make the following confession: "Brethren, my conscience compels me to confess that, when boiling down my sap this spring, I put into the kettle two buckets of water, and sold the sugar at the same price as that made from pure sap!"

Doctors—good doctors—are a thousand times more tender-hearted than any other men, because they know just what the pain is, and how it is hurting not only your body, but your mind. They know just when you are worrying over something; yes, and just what medicine you need beside that which comes in bottles from the chemist. They know you need cheerful words; not too many. They know you need something to distract your attention from yourself, and they come into your sickroom as if they brought rays of sunshine with them, and leave you feeling as many times better as you felt before they came.

An English tramp, arrested and brought before the justices of the Petworth Police Court for the crime of "damaging some cut clover by sleeping on it," was fined by the justice, with the alternative of going to jail for eight days. In another case, at the Bromsgrove Petty Sessions, where a woman was charged with stealing some apples, it was alleged against her that the stems of the fruit "fitted" the trees from which they were said to have been stolen. An odd thing is British justice. Perhaps the popularity in England of Bret Harte's tales of the anomalies of western frontier justice in the early days may find its explanation here.

The Law Gazette has told a story about some one of the Irish judges, and lawyers are trying to find out which one of the judges is referred to. It appears that a certain learned judge is accustomed to doze at times during the speeches of counsel, and on awakening does not always realize the situation immediately. An eloquent queen's counsel was lately addressing the court on the subject of certain town commissioners' right to a disputed waterway. In his address he repeated somewhat emphatically: "But, my lord, we must have water! we must have water!" The learned judge thereupon awoke and startled the lawyers by remarking: "Well, just a little drop, thank you; just a little. I like it strong."

The following spicy delineation of the medical situation in Connecticut is taken from the bulletin of the Connecticut Board of Health: "Sir: Anybody can practice medicine in Connecticut. You do not need to register; you do not need a medical diploma; you do not need to know the difference between opium and peppermint; you do not, indeed, need to know anything. You can simply come here and live and begin to practice. The laws of Connecticut will sustain you in collecting your fees for professional services, if you render any which you choose to call such. But if you undertake to carry me or my trunk to the depot for pay you must get a license. If you peddle matches or peanuts you must get a license. If you collect the swill from your neighbors to feed your pig you must get a license. If you want to empty your cesspool you must get a license; but you can practice medicine in Connecticut without a license!"

The recent death of Lord President Inglis recalls this incident: He was requested by the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts of Scotland to allow his portrait to be placed in one of the stained-glass windows of their new library, the other portraits being those of eminent men now deceased. In accepting the honor the learned judge wrote: "I trust you have not forgotten the wise counsel given by a great law-maker—Solon—to Cræsus, King of Lydia, in the height of his prosperity—that no man's life could be pronounced altogether happy till its close. The moral is, that whatever a man's eminence may be during the greater part of his life, it may be all blotted out and destroyed by some fatal lapse before he dies. With this caution, and protest I leave myself in the hands of the society. I will not undertake to fulfil Solon's condition of becoming altogether happy by predecease of the execution of your stained-glass windows, though such an event is by no means unlikely." As a matter of fact, the lord president did die before the window was placed in position.

The depths of the wisdom of the English common law appear sometimes to the mind of the laity to be unfathomable. Such is probably, at least, the opinion of a lady of Enfield who supposed herself to be the owner of a jackdaw, but who discovered that her title was only that of precarious possession. She allowed the bird his liberty for a few minutes, and he, true to the nature attributed to him in common parlance, stole away, and was captured and sold in "market overt" to a purchaser, who declined, when the bird was found in his possession, to relinquish him. His former possessor called the law to her aid, but the law, through the Enfield magistrates, declared its inability to respond. The law protects persons and property; but the jackdaw was evidently not a person, and it was equally clear, according to the court, that it was not property. Had the jackdaw been a cat or a dog it would have been different; or had it been, like the parrot, of foreign birth, it might have attained the dignity of a chattel; but being only a native wild bird, this character flies back to it as soon as it flies from captivity. Although, therefore, the present possessor of the jackdaw has no title to him, yet he has the bird, and there is no way known to the law of dispossessing him. If the former possessor should entice the bird back to herself, she in turn would illustrate the maxim Beati possidentes. But, unless she succeeds in this undertaking, she will probably repeat for the rest of her days that hasty and irreverent speech of Mr. Bumble: "The law is a Ass."

NOTES.

A new process for making whisky is now being tried at Peoria, Ill. A species of bug that is found on rice is used for fermenting in lieu of yeast. The whisky made by this process is literally bug juice.

With Colonel Ingersoll running a $14,000,000 will contest in Montana, and Mr. Choate starting a $30,000,000 job in New York, it is plain that the arid and arduous profession of the law has its compensations.

There are two dangers to France, says Jules Simon. "Geruany and socialism." The former is less important since Cronstadt, but the danger from socialism has been increased since the congress at Brussels.

A Washington man wants a divorce because his wife goes off preaching faith cures and leaves him to get the dinner. He ought to have it; and if his wife is unable to pay him alimony he ought to have a pension.

In every great political campaign the Democrats preach the doctrine of "disaster and despair." "Thank God," says Major McKinley, "the Republican party never taught any such doctrine. Ours is a doctrine of hope and cheer."

It has been semi-officially recorded somewhere that General Grant was the only President who ever dared to perpetrate a pun in a state paper, and that he did it in one of his messages when he said: "Agriculture is the groundwork of our national prosperity."

The worst thing that can be said of a town is that it is dead. The world has no more use for a dead town than it has for a dead man. The best thing to be done with either is to bury them out of sight; but, unfortunately, a town lives on and on after it is dead.

Professor Mitchell, of Kingston, N. M., says that he can dissipate snowstorms in his latitude by driving them on the plains and turning them into gentle showers. He is very sanguine, and says the handling of storms will in time be as familiar as the bottling of the lightning by Franklin.

Mr. Theodore Bent, who was sent to investigate the famous Zimbabye ruins in South Africa, writes home that these ruins are undoubtedly of Phœnician origin, and that the inscriptions and other evidence he has found unmistakably indicate the form of worship, the manner of decoration, and the system of gold smelting practiced by the vanished people who erected the structures. They are relics of a people who were far advanced in civilization, though the present inhabitants are mere savages.

At best fires are a calamity, but the late conflagrations in Chinatown have much of compensation to the city. They have wiped out a score or more of rookeries that were eyesores and the breeding places of disease. It is now in order for the Trustees to compel the filling in of those offensive water lots, and the construction of suitable sidewalks. As it is, the north side of I street is impassable. If the lots were filled no doubt the owners would find it to their advantage to put up brick buildings suitable for wholesale stores; it is the natural locality for such houses, and with their establishment there Chinatown would in consequence become a thing of the past.

Nearly every man is endowed by nature with some power or faculty which enables him to do easily some feat impossible to any other. This faculty makes him necessary to society. The man that can lay brick and mortar, and the man that puts down the cobblestones and gravel in our streets, is as useful and necessary as the farmer who raises our food products; as necessary as the doctor or lawyer, editor or statesman. Every man has his place in the great economy of nature. Nothing is beneath us if it is in the direction of the conduct of life. It is the law of nature that every man shall do what he was created to do.

The death suddenly of Charles Stewart Paruell is announced. That he was a man great in his time cannot be questioned; that he was conscientious in his political career must be accorded. He was the advocate of home rule in Ireland, and demanded from England such rights for Ireland that are just—the right of self-government. Of Paruell's course, and that of his followers, we have but one criticism: their troubles should be settled at home, and not obtruded upon our people, who have nothing but a general interest in the issue. It has been for years that the relations of Ireland and England have been prominently discussed in this country.

From the last census returns we find that the assessed valuation of property in the several States of the United States is $24,249,589,804. This, of course, is nothing like the true value, which may be estimated at $62,610,000,000. The per capita will amount to about $1,000. According to these returns, California's assessed valuation of property is $1,071,102,327. It is safe to say this is less than one-third of the actual value of real and personal property in this State. We have to but refer to San Francisco alone, where we find men worth millions only assessed for a few hundred thousand dollars. The statistics furnished by official assessments are not very reliable, and only serve to mislead as to the true wealth of the country.

We use common expressions in our parlance that on even a superficial analysis are manifestly absurd. To instance, the expression "dumb brutes." It is applied to cats, dogs, roosters and everything except the more refined descendants of the monkey family. We were struck with the absurdity of the statement when listening to the trial of Hagerty this week. Much stress was paid to the defendant's fondness for "dumb brutes," to wit: bull dogs and roosters. How it can be contended that a bull dog is "dumb" we cannot conceive, though we do admit he is a brute. There is about a rooster refinement, but a fowl that will wake up in the wee hours of night and disturb the neighborhood by his shrill crowing, is by no means dumb. And cats—the boot-jack loss testifies that they are not voiceless.

The News-Messenger, of Lincoln, announces that it proposes to collate and publish a history of its town and of the country surrounding. Certainly a series of carefully prepared articles on local history in any community will be of interest. Concerning that particular locality, we have knowledge of its early days, and know that much of more than local interest could be written. Lincoln was founded by the late Colonel Charles L. Wilson, and was named, not from the president, but from the middle name of the colonel. There is a circumstance that was to us of interest. We last met Colonel Wilson in the Golden Eagle Hotel in this city, and we remarked the curious watch he carried—an old-fashioned, open-faced gold watch; and it had a history. It had been the property of the distinguished statesman De Witt Clinton. Mr. Clinton died suddenly, and this watch was on his person at the time. It passed to his son, and from him to Wilson. Speaking of it, the colonel related that, after burning brush on his farm at Nord, he missed the watch, and afterward found it in the ashes. It had passed through the fire, but was repaired, and registered the time the same as in its former days. It is of coincidence that the death of Colonel Wilson was sudden—on December 11, 1890—and that the Clinton watch was then on his person.

California Press Association.

The annual meeting and election of officers of the California Press Association was held in San Francisco on Monday, October 5th, and was largely attended. At the meeting much business of importance was transacted, many entertaining papers read and interesting remarks made, concerning the welfare of the association. To the work of the California delegates—Messrs. Scipio Craig, Wm. H. Mills and W. S. Green—to the National Editorial Association recently held in St. Paul can be attributed in a great measure the victory of securing California for the next meeting of the National Association, to be held in January, 1892.

On the evening of the 5th inst., at 9 o'clock, the members, accompanied by their wives and daughters, left on the Shasta route for a trip as far north as Sisson, stopping at Redding, Shasta mineral springs and Mott. At all points the excursionists were hospitably entertained by the people. On Tuesday evening a reception was held in the school-house at Mott, when the freedom of the town was tendered the party in a neatly worded address by Mr. A. Bloom, which was responded to by Mr. J. A. Filcher, of Auburn. Mr. Wm. H. Mills being present was called upon, and entertained his hearers with a very interesting and instructive discourse, his remarks upon the denudation of our forests being listened to with wrapt attention. During the day quite a number of ladies and gentlemen took the "sawdust" trail for a walk to the Shasta mineral springs, located about a mile and a half from Mott. On their return the ladies insisted that they had tramped about fifteen miles. Tired out as they were, however, they could not forego the pleasures of a country dance given in the evening. On the return trip an hour's stay was made at Lower Soda Springs, where a magnificent hotel, to be known as "The Tavern of Castle Crags," is in course of construction by the Pacific Improvement Company, and which is bound to become one of the most famous resorts on the Pacific Coast, owing to its charming and picturesque location. An open-air meeting was here held, when the following was read and unanimously adopted by the association:

WHEREAS, We, members of the California Press Association, and our families, have, through the generosity of the Southern Pacific Company, been the recipients of a delightful excursion along the line of the California and Oregon Railroad as far north as Redwood; and, whereas, we recognize the public spirit and enterprise of the corporation which undertakes through the public press to inform the world of the resources, possibilities and beauties of the country along its route; therefore,

Resolved, That the thanks of the members of this association are tendered to the Southern Pacific Company, personally represented by William H. Mills and W. C. Morrow, for courtesies received in connection with this excursion, and especially to Division Superintendent Agler for his kind offices in managing and contributing to the comfort and pleasure of the guests on this division.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this association that the road is well built and equipped and efficiently managed; and that the scenery along the line is grand beyond description.

Resolved, That we appreciate and commend the enterprise of the people of Redding for their cordial greeting and magnificent exhibition of the products of the surrounding country, consisting of all the staple fruits and vegetables, and a splendid collection of minerals.

Resolved, That we tender our obligations and return our thanks to the people of Mott for their generous hospitality and the magnificent reception tendered by them on the occasion of our visit; and to the citizens of Sisson for the splendid dinner provided for us on our return trip.

Resolved, That the association note with pleasure the establishment of numerous summer resorts on this line in the vicinity of Mount Shasta, chief among them being Lower Soda Springs, at which a magnificent hotel, to cost $200,000, has been begun, and is to be completed before the opening of the next season for the accommodation of tourists and health seekers.

Following is a list of the persons composing the excursion party:

W. C. Morrow and wife, San Francisco; G. M. Francis and wife, Napa; Miss Mildred Francis, Napa; P. B. Graham, Middleton; W. J. Hassett, Sacramento; Miss Regina Hassett, Sacramento; Watson Chalmers and wife, Chico; C. F. Montgomery and wife, Antioch; J. Buckingham and wife, Ukiah; J. F. Thompson, Eureka; E. B. Willis and wife, Sacramento; J. A. Filcher and wife, Auburn; H. A. McCrany and wife, Lakeport; S. S. Boynton and wife, Oroville; William H. Mills and wife, San Francisco; J. M. Coffman and wife, Biggs; E. B. Price and wife, Oroville; R. A. Marshall and wife, Los Angeles; A. B. Lemmon and wife, Santa Rosa; Miss May Thompson, Eureka; R. Ellis and wife, Woodland; Raleigh Barcar, Vacaville; E. C. Rust and wife, Winters; F. J. Burns, San Miguel; J. H. Durst, Wheatland; J. M. Laswell, San Miguel; L. W. Taylor, Arbuckle; C. L. Cain, Placerville; C. B. Whitling and wife, Colusa; A. J. Pillsbury, Tulare; W. B. H. Dodson, Red Bluff; Miss Nellie Dodson, Red Bluff; L. H. Woodworth, Yuba City; T. H. Dawson, Corning; S. J. Matthews and wife, Ukiah; E. E. Grover, Yuba City; Mrs. E. Grover, Yuba City; R. R. Bunker and wife, Martinez; Miss L. Francis, Castroville; W. F. Perkins, San Francisco; R. Beers Loos, Sisson; F. M. Swayze and wife, Redding; S. M. Cassidy, Petaluma.

R. Beers Loos, of the Sisson Mascot, is a genius. A bright and witty writer, a graceful dancer, a versatile actor, and an accomplished type setter form a combination of talents which cannot fail to make a paper enjoyable to the subscriber and profitable to the advertiser. The following address of welcome was prepared by Col. Loos for presentation to the California Press Association on their recent visit to Sisson:

Members of the C. P. A.:—It does me honor to welcome you beneath the shadows of grand old Mt. Shasta, where chivalry prevails and men die with their dancing pumps on. Here is where the droopy-eyed tourist comes in the summer to rejuvenate his other lung, where the fortune huntress comes to seek a rich catch and departs in the fall with an Italian woodchopper; and where the railroad snowplow battles with the "beautiful" from Thanksgiving Day until it is time to mail your valentines.

As men and editors I am pleased to welcome you. I hope that none of you cherish any ill-will because I have neglected to put you on the exchange list. Daily papers in towns of not less than 50,000 inhabitants, will receive the Mascot in exchange by publishing our 22-inch double column ad, for six months. We also offer extra inducements to publishers who wish to club with the Mascot. Do not think that because I have been successful as an editor and publisher that I hold myself above you. I would willingly take by the hand such men as Jones, Reid, Waterson, McLean, Pulitzer, Childs, Bennett, DeYoung or Hearst, which goes to show that I am not proud. Right here at home I will speak to you on the street in the presence of my friends. I will see that you enjoy your visit. I have leased the brewery until your train pulls out. I will take you around personally and will have the Sunday School turn out if he is well enough. I will show you the exact spot where Carmine Charley shot a kidney out of Cold Deck Richard. I will take you to Dr. Flett's office and show you a two-gallon jar full of pickled eye balls that were gouged out in the Europa saloon the week we had the races. I have had the lynching of By-Gone Williams, the best authority on horses in the State, postponed until this evening so you could enjoy it. I will also escort you to the city laundress, where nine as fine gentlemen as you ever met are awaiting examination for "killing their man." They will be released after their hearing in the morning, and if you will remain a few hours longer to-morrow, I can promise you a dandy blow-out. We will also go over to Gore Slough and see Crank Hatterly. Most eccentric man you ever saw. Hasn't taken a drink of liquor since the Fourth of July. At my office I will show you a Waterbury newspaper press with a long stem on it that runs with only the aid of one man, a boy and some profanity. I will present to your worthy President a skull that I use on my desk as a paper weight. It has sixty-two bullet holes in it and once adorned the shoulders of an Eastern man who put up at a hotel here and asked for a finger bowl.

Now boys, I give you the freedom of the city, in whose name I welcome you. Go forth and enjoy yourselves. Remember, the lynching takes place at 8 sharp and that the square game of faro in town is dealt in the rear of the Mascot press rooms.

Among the current stories about Mr. Spurgeon, this is one of the latest: He was traveling in Scotland at one time, and trying to preserve an incognito. So distinct is the individuality of his face, and so freely has he been photographed, that one may question whether he was entirely successful in this latter endeavor. However this may be, he heard a sermon which touched him, and thereupon hunted up the minister to thank him. Whereupon the young preacher frankly confessed that most of it was taken from Spurgeon himself.

Housekeeping Habits of Prominent Women.

Not a few of the wealthy women of New York, says Ada Chester Bond in the Ladies' Home Journal, have every detail in their home at their fingers' ends, and retain the education of their children under their own management.

One example is Mrs. Cyrus W. Field, wife of the great financier. She employs a butler and numerous servants. Mrs. Field has been married over fifty years. She was born in New England, and still believes in taking care of her own house and doing her own marketing. To be sure, she is no longer young, and often is not able to go out, but only on rare occasions does she delegate the power to make purchases to her servants. Day in and day out she drives to the market in her own carriage, going from one shop to another, selecting such articles of food as she wishes; and she can tell the price of any article of food in the market. In her home she supervises everything. A fleck of dust is quickly detected.

Mrs. William C. Whitney, wife of the ex-Secretary of the Navy, is really one of the busiest women in New York society. She has a splendid home. Mrs. Whitney comes from Ohio, and the women of the Buckeye State have been taught to believe that a happy fireside is the nearest approach to heaven we shall get in this world. Mrs. Whitney does all the ordering for her family, goes to market very frequently, employs and discharges her own servants, and, better still, she retains her servants by rewarding them for their faithfulness. She does not allow instructors to have their own way in teaching her children. She supervises their education herself, goes to the children's table with them for meals at least once a day, and when the early evening comes they play about her knee, listen to delightful fairy stories and have a general frolic.

Mrs. Levi P. Morton is absolutely the head of her own establishment. She engages her own servants, and does all the ordering for her table; she also devotes much time to the care and education of her children. She keeps an accurate account of all the moneys she receives and spends, and is punctilious in not running long accounts with the tradespeople. She pays all bills weekly by check.

Though Mrs. Chauncey M. Depew employs a butler and three servants, she is as absolutely the queen of her own home as her husband is the king of after-dinner speakers. She does all the shopping for her family, and pays cash for each purchase, a plan that cannot be improved upon.

Mrs. Astor employs twenty servants, and a butler and chef. She never makes any purchases for the household, and gives few instructions as to what she wants served for meals. In the case of a big dinner party, she simply notifies her butler that on such an evening she will give a dinner to, say, twenty four persons, that is all.

Mrs. Charles A. Dana, the wife of the editor of the Sun, is a thoroughly old-fashioned housekeeper. Her servants do as she tells them. She makes all her own purchases, and superintends the preparation of all meals.

In the case of Mrs. Burton Harrison one finds a woman thoroughly in touch with everything about her home. She is an adept at taste in a room, and there is not a picture, piece of bric-a-brac or ornament in her home which is out of harmony with its surroundings. Mrs. Harrison is a southern woman, and though reared in a home of wealth, where others did her bidding, she has all the qualities of a good housekeeper. She is a splendid cook, and when illness comes into the family everything is prepared with her own hands.

All the ladies of the Vanderbilt family are thrifty and business-like. They inherit these traits, and they are bringing up their children to follow their example. They each keep a bank account, make all their own purchases, and employ and discharge their own servants. They also help in the education of their children, go into the kitchen now and then, and are noted for being excellent cooks.

How the Average Man Sees It.

The letter flittered into the sanctum. It was from a man to a woman, and he was trying to give her, in his enthusiastic, masculine way, his idea of the girls at Narragansett Pier, and the costumes they wear. Here is what he says. Comment is unnecessary:

"I want to tell you that the women here are the most glorious creatures on the face of the earth. They go swinging about in the independent, healthy manner you never see except at the seashore or among the mountains. Say, why are they always sick in town, and ready for twenty-nine tramps when they get out here?"

"Of course you want to know what they're wearing. They all have dresses made of flannel or something, with white shoes, white caps, lots of ribbons and furbelows flying, and white parasols with loads of white lace bunched all over the top. The skirts are cut bias (is that right?), and there's something around the bottom that I think you women call a panel—or perhaps it's a flounce. Why can't women dress like that all the time? Why don't you speak to 'em about it."—N. Y. World

FLASHES.

The trouble with cranks—they only turn one way.

When the hop crop is light the prices jump up.

We may have gray hair, but that is no reason to die.

When you want to know all about yourself inquire without.

This is a tough world; we never expect to get out of it alive.

A bride, although given away, is not free. They are often sold.

There is nothing more meaningless than a woman's kiss of a woman.

Dentists may not be large landed proprietors, but they live off achers.

As a class literary women are indifferent as to their personal adornment.

The fellow that tells all he knows, don't generally have much to impart.

To get an honest living without work requires the hardest kind of work.

The fool destroys his own health while drinking to the health of others.

Sometimes a man grows so mean that even the devil is willing to excuse him.

We ought to be able to regulate moisture because any teamster can draw rein.

Some of the alleged Alliance men are not farmers enough to even cultivate an acquaintance.

No man ever succeeded by snarling at his neighbor. Our local papers might take this lesson to themselves.

A Remarkable Plumber.

A fire occurred during the week in a stable up town located on the lot adjoining that of Smith, the plumber, and it looked for a time that his stable would also go. We have read the accounts of the fire as published, but Mr. Smith relates incidents concerning it that have not found their way into print. He relates them as follows: "It was late at night, and a neighbor called out, 'Smith, your stable is on fire,' and I heard a commotion. There was no other Smith nearer than half a block, and I knew it meant me. I jumped out of bed, and you know how it is with a man when he is suddenly awakened in the dark; I was perfectly dazed; blame me if I could find the gas. I thought of my poor horse, and of course wanted to save him, and started for what I supposed was the door of the room, and blame me if I did not run into the closet. I never felt so foolish in my life, but you know how a fire will excite one. No; there had been no Caledonian banquet the night before. This horse of mine could not be replaced in my business. He is a model of patience, and will stand all day uncomplainingly without hitching, while the boys are in a house doing a job of plumbing. Now, most horses would get tired of that sort of business." We congratulate Smith that he rescued his steed, but cannot understand how it was a plumber could not find a gas jet, even if he was half asleep and the night was dark. It does not comport with human experience with plumbers.

The Gas Well Test.

A test of the product of the gas well at Fifth and R streets was made last Thursday evening in the presence of a rather small crowd, and that mostly composed of people living in the immediate neighborhood. The "prominent citizen" was conspicuous by his absence, probably because there were to be no posts of honor worth filling, and feeling that the escape from his "valve" couldn't hold its own against the belchings of mother earth. The test must, however, have been highly gratifying to the promoters of the enterprise. The improvised gasometer was so small as to permit much the greater share of the gas to escape with the water under its submerged edges, as was evidenced by the constant state of effervescence of the water surrounding the receiver. Still, gas jets burned brightly, cook-stoves were supplied, an asbestos parlor grate blazed cheerfully, and a gas engine made to whiz at a lively rate. To abandon the work in its present half-developed state would be to wipe out what little remaining reputation we have for public spirit and enterprise. It certainly will not require a great sum to push the undertaking to a definite result, and the means should be immediately forthcoming from the abundance of our "well-to-do" citizens.

New Advertisements.

Among the new advertisements appearing in THEMIS to-day, will be found those of Messrs. Mohr & Yoerk, butchers and packers, 1024 and 1026 J street; Mrs. M. A. Pealer, leading milliner, 619-623 J street; and Mrs. M. L. Swilling, French dressmaker, 1012 Eighth street.

The coaching season has resumed the road in Paris. America does the bulk of her coaching on a bicycle.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Sol Smith Russell has never failed to fill the house when he appeared in this city. Last night the Metropolitan was filled to its capacity to witness Mr. Russell's new play, Peaceful Valley. Mr. Russell has in this play a wider and richer field for his inimitable art. The support is good. To-night Peaceful Valley will be repeated.

Monday and Tuesday Mrs. Romualdo Pacheco's new comedy, Incog, will be presented by a strong company. Mrs. Pacheco is well known in Sacramento, and her literary attainments have been displayed in various manners. She has written several excellent plays. Incog is said to be a bright and attractive comedy. The striking likeness of "Tom," "Dick," and "Harry," furnish opportunity for no end of funny situations.

The Theatrical Advance Agent Relieves His Guilty Mind.

I am an advance agent and my duties are manifold, but the principal one is to lie. To the uninitiated this may seem easy, but do not deceive yourself. The lies which the advance agent has to tell must bear the impress of truth and ring eighteen-carat every time. To lie in this manner requires a special faculty, an inventive brain, and full control over the muscles of the face. Truth, even in its humblest garb, is naturally so acceptable to man that lies, to pass for truth, must go forth in silk apparel.

I tell big lies, little lies, white lies, and black lies, and the object of this wholesale lying is to convince a skeptical public that my star is the greatest living actor, that the play is the one novelty of the season, that the supporting company is the best that money could procure, and that those who fail to go to the box office next week and plank down their dollars to see my attraction will have lived in vain.

Early in the season I get out a pamphlet filled with press notices, credited to various papers, in which they appeared in an entirely different form from that in which they are reprinted. All the mean things which they have said about my star are carefully cut out and in their place I substitute high-sounding praises or lies. Copies are sent to every city in which my star is to appear.

On my way to the next stand I begin by lying to the train conductor. I tell him that certain members of the company were formerly railroad men. This arouses his interest, and then I pile on the agony about the star and play, expecting, of course, that he will repeat what I say to his friends. When I arrive at the station I lie to the agent of the transfer company. Instead of having the company's baggage hauled by the piece, I have them agree to haul the entire amount for a certain figure, so I tell the agent that it can be easily transported on one wagon, though I know very well that it takes two. Thus I secure a cheap contract. To outsiders I say that we carry more scenery and baggage than any other company on the road and that it requires two baggage cars to transport it from town to town.

If the receipts in the last town were $1,600 for the week, I swear that they exceeded $4,000, and offer to back up my assertion with a bet. If on the first night, with the aid of my friends and by taking the ushers out to see a man, I succeeded in stirring up the faintest ripple of applause at the end of the strong scene, I say that the star received a curtain call at the end of every act. Sometimes I even smuggle boys into the gallery to cry Bravo!

When I have told about all the lies I think necessary around the theater I set out for the newspaper offices and seek out the unfortunate dramatic or city editor, as the case may be; and here is where I spread myself. Knowing that an editor on a paper that amounts to anything is a busy man, I have to lie against time. I spin yarns about my star's distinguished family, speak of his accomplishments, of his estimable qualities, of his fondness for newspaper men, and try to create an impression that he is a royal good fellow as well as a great actor. Nor do I lie with my tongue alone. When I think I have stayed long enough, I apologize for taking up his time, and leave with him written lies, sometimes called puffs, to be worked into the columns of the paper, and very often get them printed exactly as I wrote them, without the blue penciling of a single lie.

When I have finished with the newspapers I go around the hotels, ostensibly to get their rates, but in reality to lie about my attraction.

To flatter the star and make him think that he is a great actor I disguise my handwriting and send him letters over fictitious signatures, asking him to make a return date, and assuring him of a large business on his second visit. I go here, there and everywhere, always extolling the merits of my attraction and always lying. I plaster the dead walls with lying posters; I distribute lying circulars; I do a hundred and one things, and leave no stone unturned which I think will help to advertise the star. Yet some people think advance agents have an easy time.

I have lied so much that I have acquired a profound respect for truth; but I have become so accustomed to lying that I could not tell the truth even if I wanted to. From mere force of habit I lie about everything; I even lie about myself. If I buy a new hat and pay $7 for it I tell my friends that it cost $12. If an acquaintance, in the goodness of his heart, invites me out in the evening to enjoy a glass of beer and a pretzel, I relate next day that I had a champagne supper.

I have lied so much that I have tired of it, and would like to tell the truth. I would like to tell the public that my star cannot act at all, that he is a conceited self-worshiper, and, in my estimation, not even fit to carry a spear in the third row of supernumeraries; that he is knock-kneed and bald, and that instead of being of a distinguished family, he has a hod-carrier origin and eats with his knife; that his support is composed of the worst lot of "hams" that was ever gotten together for the purpose of imposing upon the public; that his leading man, instead of getting the exorbitant salary accredited to him, receives just $30 a week (some week), and is compelled to worship at the shrine of the star's greatness; that the leading lady is a poor deluded mortal, whose friends have persuaded her that she can act, but whose true sphere of usefulness would be to clean windows, or to push a perambulator; that the members of the company have been "specially selected" not "to fit the characters of the play," but because of their utter incompetency, so as not to outshine the star, and that everything else connected with the "show" is on a par of general badness.

But it would not do. The company would soon be counting the ties back to New York, and my occupation as an advance agent would be at an end. As it is, my lies only serve to draw a fair audience on the opening night. When the true nature of the attraction becomes known, the attendance diminishes, and toward the end of the week the actors appeal to the immovable seats. It is as necessary for an advance agent to lie as for the star to have the center of the stage.—N. Y. Times.

The First of Garrison's "Liberator."

On the 1st of January, 1831, he published the first number of the Liberator. His only associate was Mr. Isaac Knapp, like himself, a printer. They were too poor to hire an office, or even to afford to do their own work only; so they got the friendly foreman of the Christian Examiner to give them the use of his type in payment for their labor at "the case;" and then, after their day's task was over, they labored far into each night on the Liberator. It is easy to see that no feeble soul was to drive an enterprise thus begun. Of Mr. Knapp's after career not much is known, but Mr. Garrison is identified from that moment with his paper. Accustomed to poverty, with wants simple and few, of hardy frame and a cheerful temper, he made light of privation, while his courage never flinched under disappointment or danger. It is of this beginning that Lowell wrote:

"In a small chamber, friendless and unseen, Toiled over his types one poor, unlearned young man.

The place was dark, unfurnished and mean, Yet there the freedom of a race began. Help came but slowly; sure no man yet Put lever to the heavy world with less. What need of help?—he knew how types to set;

He had a dauntless spirit and a press."

Mr. Garrison thus describes his reasons for starting his paper in the north: "A greater revolution was to be effected in the free States, and particularly in New England, than at the south. I found contempt more bitter, opposition more active, detraction more relentless, prejudice more stubborn and apathy more frozen, than among slaveholders themselves." And he thus explained the temper with which he entered on his work: "I am aware that many object to the severity of my language; but is there not cause for severity? I will be as harsh as truth and as uncompromising as justice. On this subject I do not wish to think or speak or write with moderation. * * * I am in earnest. I will not equivocate. I will not excuse. I will not retreat a single inch. AND I WILL BE HEARD!" He soon received convincing evidence, pleasant and otherwise, that he was heard. James Foster (colored), of Philadelphia, sent him $50 and the names of twenty-five subscribers. This was his first recognition. His next was quite different. The "Vigilance Association," of Columbia, S. C., "composed of gentlemen of the first respectability," offered a reward of $1,500 for the apprehension of any white person detected in circulating in that State the newspaper called the Liberator.

Zola on War.

M. Zola writes to a Paris paper: War must come. War is life itself. Nothing exists in nature, nothing is born or grows or multiplies save by combat. The world can live only by eating and being eaten. And it is only the warlike nations that have prospered; a nation dies when it disarms. War is the school of discipline, sacrifice, and courage. We must wait for it gravely. Henceforward we have nothing more to fear. Germany, so proud for the last twenty years, is at the apogee of her power; but do we not already seem to hear the threatnings of disruption?

Something that you must not forget: If you have your mind made up to buy a Mathushek upright piano, do not be induced to change your mind by false representations of parties offering new, cheap, showy and trashy pianos, which will be worthless in this climate in a very short time. Mathusheks sold twenty years ago are as good as ever, and, tuned properly every few years, sound as well as the day they left the factory. See the new improved ones at Cooper's.

L. B. MOHR.

C. A. YOERK.

MOHR & YOERK'S
MARKET AND PACKING HOUSE

1024 and 1026 J Street, Sacramento.

Dealers in Fresh and Salt Meats and all kinds of Sausages. On hand during the Packing Season: Spareribs, Tenderloins, Hogs' Heads, etc.

MRS. M. L. SWILLING,

FRENCH DRESSMAKER,

No. 1012 Eighth Street, between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

Agents for Mrs. Graham's Face Bleach for Beautifying the Complexion.

THE COQUETTE.

A Very Neat, Stylish Shape, from $3.90 to $6.00, at Mrs. M. A. Pealer's, 619, 621, 623 J St.

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and original. Those who desire a thorough education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

UNCLE IKE,

THE DIAMOND BROKER

302 K Street, Sacramento.

Day Dreams.

Who says that noon is not the hour of dreams?

The breezes drowse amid the lifeless leaves;
The swallows rest beneath the sheltering eaves,
And languor-lulled are all the meadow streams.

In idleness, hidden from the burning beams,
The gleaners lie behind the barley sheaves;
No soaring note the sleepy silence cleaves,
And for a space Time slumber fettered seems.

Vague visions haunt this still enchanted hour,
When e'en the bee, drugged by the poppy,
droops,

And the sharp locust in the tree-top broods;
Dream spirits borrowed from night's charmed dower

Are these dim shapes, these shadowy, shifting groups,
Fantastic forms in airy multitudes.

How Crows Catch Crabs.

Fishermen in Havre de Grace, at the mouth of the Susquehanna river, tell amusing stories of the way crows catch crabs and prepare them for eating. When the crows first fly in the spring they visit the streams connecting bay and ponds every morning looking for crabs. They commonly arrive before crabs begin running, but the crows exhibit great patience, sometimes waiting ten or fifteen days. The crows scan the stream from small tree-tops or mounds of sand. Others stand on the banks of the rivulet with heads cocked sidewise and an eye staring at the water. When the crabs begin running the crows dive into the water from any coign of vantage near by, clutch a crab, soar into the air and drop their prey with great precision on the stone-covered beach which fringes the bay. By this means the crabs are reduced to pulp, and the crows, with much wing-flapping and discordant cawing, voraciously bolt the meat.

Captain Tom Carroll of Chincoteague says he once saw five crows teasing a crab. One of the birds caught and carried it to a big dry sand-bar. There it was put down. The crow's cawing brought five of his tribe. They pulled it about, turned it upon its back and fumed over it. These gymnastics were accompanied by hoarse chattering and a gurgling sound which, Carroll avers, was laughter. To vary the sport they would make believe to fly away, but dropped softly to the sand forty or fifty feet off. From that point the dusky quintet of practical jokers kept their eyes intently fixed on the crab rolling along in the direction of the water, a hundred yards away. The crows, without a sound, craned their necks watching their hard-shelled victim flopping laboriously through the soft, dry sand. Suddenly they broke into a wild chorus of caws, and made after the crab. One picked it up and soared away to the beach, followed by his fellows. There he was dropped to death, and the crows flew away to their roost.—New York Recorder.

"Moon of the Mountains."

Among the Russian crown treasures is found a large prism-shaped diamond over two inches long. It is called the "Moon of the Mountains" and has had a remarkable fate. Once it ornamented the Persian throne of Shah Nadir; and after the death of this mighty monarch, when his treasures were plundered, the "Moon of the Mountains" also disappeared.

Several years later, among other treasures, this diamond was offered for sale by an Afghan to Armenian jewelers at a remarkably low price. These jewelers were three brothers named Schafras. During the pending negotiations the Afghan began to fear betrayal from the jewelers and secretly left the city. One of the three brothers hurried after him and overtook him at Bagdad just as the Afghan had sold his diamond to a merchant for 60,000 piasters and an Arabian horse. As the merchant refused every offer of the Schafras, the brothers murdered him and fled to Egypt. Here they fell into a quarrel about the division of their booty, and the youngest of the Schafras sent his brothers out of the world by poison and then went to Holland.

From there he entered into negotiations with the Empress of Russia to sell her his treasure. He went to Russia for this purpose, but could not agree with her plenipotentiary about the price, and left St. Petersburg, going to parts unknown. Not until ten years later could Russian agents bring Schafras, who had settled in Smyrna, to terms. The "Moon of the Mountains" was sold for 80,000 rubles and a title of nobility. The newly made baron went to Astrakhan, became impoverished through speculation and died a beggar in misery.

The blood-stained diamond is the largest in the world, but is not perfectly cut. On account of its peculiar shape, it cannot be used for insertion in crown insignias.—From the German.

Once the big preacher saw a small boy trying in vain to reach a door bell, and going up with a pleasant word gave the bell a vigorous yank, whereat the lad, with an impish grin, exclaimed: "Now I guess we'd better cool."

Pearls to Order.

A process for making real pearls by artifice is the basis of an application for a patent newly filed by an ingenious person, who expects to find in his invention a source of wealth compared with which Monte Cristo's means were poverty. The material of which pearls are composed is cheap enough. Take the shell of a pearl oyster and remove by grinding, or with an acid the rougher coat. What have you left? A sheet of perhaps an eighth of an inch in thickness of pure pearl, the precise substance which the bivalve deposits around any foreign body, like a grain of sand, or occasionally a little fish that gets caught under its mantle, thus producing the pearls of commerce. Why not take this sheet of nacre, dissolve it in acid, and then re-deposit the pearl in layers about a buckshot suspended in the solution, thus imitating as nearly as possible the method of nature?

If it were practicable to make pearls at all in this way perfect ones could be formed every time of any shape desired. There would be no difficulty in turning them out as big as billiard balls. The trouble is that the concretions thus obtained would be mere lumps of carbonate of lime, lacking entirely the iridescence which in the pearl is due to structure.

It is claimed, however, by this inventor that he has overcome the difficulty, so as to be able not only to manufacture pearls, but also to plate articles with the material as forks and spoons are coated with silver.

Conchologist Dall, of the Smithsonian Institution, according to the Washington Star, speaking recently about the practicability of pearl manufacture, exhibited a very remarkable treasure. It was a pearl as big as a pigeon's egg, of a most exquisite rose color, and the receptacle containing it was the fresh water mussel, wherein it had been originally formed. Explanation was made that the nucleus of this incomparable gem was nothing more nor less than an oval lump of bees wax, which had been placed a few years ago between the valves of the mollusk.

To protect itself against irritation by this foreign body the animal surrounded it with the pink nacre it secreted for lining its shell, thus transforming the wax into an ornament fit for a royal crown. The mussel which produced this thing of beauty grew in an Ohio river, and was kept in an aquarium while performing its unwilling task.

It is a species of bivalve plentiful in streams all over the United States, and there is no reason whatever why any one cannot make pearls in this way by keeping a few "mussels," as they are called, in a tank at home. Care should be taken to introduce the intended nuclei well under the mantle of the fish, not making them too large, because an object the size of a pea will acquire a thickness of nacre much more rapidly than if there is a greater surface to be covered.

It seems rather curious that this method of making pearls should not have proved a commercial success in Europe, where it has been known for more than two centuries. Linnæus, the famous naturalist, received knighthood in 1757 for his discovery of the process, but the trouble appears to be that it is too slow to be satisfactory as a means of turning out pearls on any scale for market. Nevertheless, it is surely very interesting as illustrating the only real success which man has thus far achieved in manufacturing gems after nature's own methods. The rubies obtained recently in Paris by melting together ruby "sparks," which so alarmed the French jewelers that they secured the passage of a law prohibiting their fabrication, are but imitations defectively crystallized, while the almost microscopic diamonds which Professor Maskelyne claimed to have produced in the laboratory a few years ago are now believed by chemists to be true stones.

For thousands of years the Chinese have known how to cause oysters and mussels to form pearls to order. The monks at Pu sa ch' i pang place inside the shells small figures of Buddha, cut out of very thin lead foil. These are soon made part of the shell itself by being covered over with a deposit of nacre, and the valves thus adorned with sacred pictures in relief are sold by the wily priests to pilgrims, who suppose them to be of miraculous origin.

The Figure Nine.

A remarkable figure is the 9. Set them down in multiplication, thus:

$$\begin{array}{r} 1 \times 9 = 9 \\ 2 \times 9 = 18 \\ 3 \times 9 = 27 \\ 4 \times 9 = 36 \\ 5 \times 9 = 45 \\ 6 \times 9 = 54 \\ 7 \times 9 = 63 \\ 8 \times 9 = 72 \\ 9 \times 9 = 81 \\ 10 \times 9 = 90 \end{array}$$

Now, do you see in the ten column that it runs, reading down, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and reading up the unit column it is 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9; and another curious fact is that the two columns when added across make 9: 1 and 8, 2 and 7, 6 and 3, 5 and 4, etc.

The friend who holds a mirror to my face,
And hiding none, is not afraid to trace
My faults, my smallest blemishes, within;
Who friendly warns, reproves me if I sin—
Although it seems not so—he is my friend.

DON'T BE CARELESS ABOUT YOUR COMPLEXION

It is woman's chiefest physical charm. It is often her only capital. It is always worth a great deal to her in business, love or social affairs. No matter how browned, or rough or sallow your skin may be, or how much it is disfigured with freckles, moth-patches, blackheads or pimples will remove every blemish and leave your skin as pure and clear and white as it was in baby days. Your complexion will then be as nature made it. Instructions go with each bottle how to keep it so. Price $1.50. All druggists sell it.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors and Cigars.
ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County Coroner. Telephone 134.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh, Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.
1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St. SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware.

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.
ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS.

Dispensed by urbane and competent attendants.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED.

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S St. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISSEMAN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Staud,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISSEMAN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSENER.

BAVARIA HERSBRÜCKER.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

To a Picture.

A long dusty ray of sunlight falling straightly
The small-paned window's hindrance through,
It touches so soft the kerchief crossed sedately
Above her gown of homespun blue.

And the tender eyes and bright brown head bent lowly
To the slight hands which wind the reel;
Sweet Dorothea! now with true touch and slowly
She spins, she spins upon the wheel.

In the dewy dawn ere night is fully over,
I strike the gray road's level line;
Each tree-tipped hill, each meadow rich in clover—
This quiet hour the world is mine.

Through that low red farmhouse life is faintly stirring;
How can it guess the joy I feel
As ever on and on, with a rhythmic whirling
I spin, I spin upon the wheel?

A left-handed damsel, by the window sitting,
I ride adown the country lane,
And my foolish fancies, round your image fitting,
Stamp the dear picture on my brain.

Were to-day a hundred years ago, or nearly,
Then might I whisper all I feel:
A century apart—and I love you dearly—
We spin, we spin upon the wheel.
—Ruth Hall.

'TWAS ALL A JOKE.

"We should very much like to have you come, and Rose will be at the station Saturday night, so do not disappoint her. Your loving aunt, JESSIE."

Lois Langford held this open letter in her small, fair hand, and read it over and over again before showing it to her brother.
Then, unable to answer it herself, she went into an adjoining room, where a young man sat painting.

He looked up as she entered, and laying aside his brushes, smiled and said:

"Something you want, Lois? Ah—a letter."

"Yes," she answered, handing it to him;
"I wonder if I ought to go?"

The young man read it over, then, turning to his sister again, quickly said:

"Yes, Lois, go and enjoy yourself. I declare you are looking ghostly of late," then turning to his work, Lois sat down to read her letter again.

"Saturday—do you think you can spare me, Tom? Oh, how lonesome it will be for you," she said, rising and standing behind his chair.

He looked up at her and smiled kindly.
"Never mind me, sis, I shall have my work to keep me busy. I have a great deal to do now, so perhaps when you return I will be a rich man."

"Oh, Tom, it seems hard for me to be enjoying myself and you working so hard.
Yes, I'll go," and she left the room.

It was Tuesday night, and on the morrow Lois was to start on her journey. She and her brother sat together in the little parlor, she finishing some sewing, and he looking over some papers and orders. After a few minutes he drew out a cabinet photograph, and, handing it to his sister, said, laughingly:

"Here, Lois, is something for you to treasure."

She took it and blushed. It was a photograph of a young man whose dark, laughing eyes peered up into her own, and whose smiling face caused her to blush.

"Oh, Tom, this is the copy you were painting from! Did you finish the painting?"

"Yes, I sent it to him to-day. I should have liked it better if he had come and sat for the picture. I don't like to copy photographs. However, I think I did it well."

"It seems a hard face to paint. Was it, Tom?" she asked, holding the photograph at a distance.

"No, not very. It seems to me, Lois, that you admire that face very much. I wish you could see the original."

"So do I," she answered quickly. "Did you ever see him?"

"No, I never did. Better take the picture with you, and play the part of the Prince in Cinderella—find the original," and Tom laughed merrily, as Lois blushed again.

"May I have it, Tom? I must confess I like this face. It always cheers me. I'll take it with me, and if I should get lonesome and cross I'll just take a peep at this picture," and giving her brother a mischievous look she continued her work.

"All right, take it." It is of no other use.
I suppose you will meet the new professor out there. I heard cousin Rose speak about a young professor," and not waiting for a reply, he went to his room, while Lois sewed on until midnight.

* * * * *

"So you have come, dear. Oh, what splendid times we will have. I was afraid that you'd disappoint me," and two girls embraced each other affectionately.

Lois Langford surveyed her cousin with much interest, and what she saw was a slim, girlish figure wrapped in furs, a small, baby face, and a pair of large black eyes looking up into her own; and Rose Thorne admired her cousin, also.

"Come, the sleigh is waiting over here," said Rose, taking her cousin's arm, and they were soon on their way home.

"I wish the professor were here," said
Rose one evening, as she and Lois sat alone by the glowing fire in the drawing-room.

"We should not be so quiet, I fear."

Lois looked inquisitive
"Prof. Stone, I mean. He is away now—in New York, I believe. Perhaps you have met him?"

Lois shook her head
"I will tell you something if you choose to listen."

Lois did choose to listen, and soon learned that Prof. Stone was her cousin's lover, and that they were soon to be married.

"You will meet him, dear. He is to be back this week, I believe."

Lois would be pleased to meet him.
"Have you a lover, Lois?" asked Rose;
and Lois blushed and smiled.

"Not a real lover—but—yes, I have;
I will show you his picture," and smiling and blushing she ran to her room to find the unknown photograph. The handsome eyes once more looked into her face and seemed to be laughing with her.

She hurried down to show it to Rose, her pretty face flushed with excitement.

What fun it would be to tell her and make her believe that this handsome man was her lover. "Here is his picture," she said, proudly, as she handed it to her cousin.

Rose took the photograph, and, holding it down where the light of the fire fell full upon it, she looked once, then grew deathly pale.

"Is this your lover, Lois?" she asked, faintly. Lois bowed her head, not noticing the awful change in her cousin's face.

"Your lover!" she repeated; then fell back in her chair, the picture falling into the glowing fire. Lois uttered a little scream and was soon by her cousin's side.

She bathed the pale face, rubbed the cold hands; and still the eyes didn't open; then, growing more and more frightened, she was about to run for help, when a low moan was heard and Rose sprang up from the sofa.

"What is it, Lois?" she cried.

"You fainted, dear. Come, sit down," answered Lois, drawing her to a chair.

"Oh, yes; I remember. Lois, take me to my room; I can't stay up;" and Lois, unconscious of the cause of her cousin's illness, took her to her room; then returned to the drawing-room.

The fire had nearly died away and the room was quite dark, but finding her way to a chair, she sank down to think of all that had happened. She had shown the picture to Rose, and then she did not faint; it was after that; so it couldn't have been the picture that caused it.

Then she thought of the picture. Where was it? Rose was holding it near the fire; it must have fallen in.

She knelt down before the grate and looked anxiously among the dying embers, but saw nothing. She was about to turn away, when her eyes rested on something, and, reaching for it, she drew the half-burned picture from the ashes.

Nothing but one eye remained visible, and that one looked laughingly into her face.

She felt as though she had lost her best friend; and, looking sadly at the one eye, she threw it back into the fire; then went to her room. She had to pass Rose's room on her way, and on reaching the door she hesi-tated whether to go in or not. She heard a noise as the scratching of a pen. Rose must be writing. She would go in and see that she was better, at any rate. She knocked and a faint voice asked, "Who is it?"

"It is only Lois, dear."

There was a moment of silence; then the answer: "Don't come in to-night, Lois. I am better, and want to see no one." And poor, innocent Lois passed on to her room.

A few days afterward Lois and her aunt were in the drawing-room alone, Rose having gone for a drive.

"You won't mind, dear, if Rose isn't home after this week, will you?" asked her aunt looking up from her work.

"Why, auntie, is she going away?" asked
Lois quickly.

"Her aunt sent for her before you came, but she didn't care to go. Now she isn't feeling well and wishes to go away from everybody, she says."

"Oh, no, I will not mind," answered Lois, and the subject was dropped.

The next Monday Rose bade Lois good-by and departed.

It seemed lonesome to Lois now, but being lively herself, she managed to stay and enjoy herself as best she could.

Spring had come again in all her loveliness, and Lois enjoyed the long walks through the woods by the side of a babbling brook, and every afternoon was spent in that way.

It was one of the warmest days in May;
so taking her books she wandered off to her favorite haunt. She had a great deal to think of to-day, for while in Rose's room she found a miniature photograph of the same young man whose picture she had had.

Rose must have known him; she would write that very night and ask her. Then, after reading for awhile, she sat still and looked into the water at her own reflection.

She did not hear footsteps behind her until a voice roused her from her reverie.

"Pardon me, but can you direct me to Mr.
Thorne's residence?"

She looked up and her face flushed crimson, for there beside her stood the original of the unknown photograph.

She stammered a few words, and he must have understood her, for he went on his way.

Lois gazed after him, and he looked back once at the pretty girl by the brook.

It was almost dark when she reached home, and her uncle was sitting on the veranda with some young man. As she drew near she recognized him.

"My dear, this is Professor Stone," said her uncle. She seemed to hear no more; only remembered that Professor Stone was her cousin's intended husband. Then memory of the burned photograph came back, and she understood why Rose had acted strangely.

There was not so much sport in it after all. Professor Stone was also thinking. He remembered a mysterious letter he had received from his fiancée relieving him of his engagement because she had heard of his deceit and of his loving another. It was all very strange, he thought. That night Lois wrote to her cousin, explaining her joke and asking for an explanation from her. She soon received it; and as Professor Stone had asked for the same, he received an explanation of the whole affair.

Lois was very silent the following days, but after she had told Professor Stone of her cousin's engagement she was not so still and lonesome, for the professor was constantly in her company; and she soon answered
Rose's letter in the same style, at the same time writing to Tom to tell him that she had found her prince.

Queer Indian Names Translated.

The red man has gone, but he has left many remembrances behind him, notable among these being the names of numerous rivers and places. Most of these given in the list below are in New England, and the accompanying translation will be found of much interest:

Memphremagog—Lake of abundance.
Chicopee—Birch bark place.
Skowhegan—Spearing.
Chautauqua—Foggy place.
Adirondacks—Iroquois name of the Algonquin, signifying "He eats bark."
Damariscotta—Alewife place.
Cocheco—Very rapid or violent; applied to falls or rapids on various streams.
Ammonoosuc—Fish-story river.
Menan—Island.
Aroostook—Good river.
Nashua—Between (the rivers).
Winooki—Beautiful stone river.
Housatonic—Stream beyond the mountains.
Massachusetts—About the great hills.
Pawtuxet—At the little falls.
Saranac—River that flows under a rock.
Pemiagewassee—Crooked place of pines.
Merrimac—Swift water.
Winnepiisogee—Land of the beautiful lake.
Shetucket—The land between the rivers.
Quinaboug—Long pond.
Cochituate—Land on or near falls or rapid streams.

Katandin—The highest place.
Nahant—At the point.
Ossipee—Strong river.
Wiscasset—Place of yellow pine.
Monadnock—The spirit's place.
Piscataqua—Great deer river.
Cohasset—Place of pines.
Kearsarge—Pine mountain.
Quinsigamond—Fishing place for pickerel.
Passamaquady—Great place for pollock.
Contoocook—Crow river.
Norwalk—The middle land (a tract between two rivers).
Kennebunk—Long water place.
Wachusett—The mountain.
Umbagog—Clear lake.
Coos—Place of pines.
Kennebec—Long lake.
Pawtucket—At the falls.
Norridgewock—Place of deer.
Casco—Crane.
Passumpsic—Much clear river.
Sagadahoc—Ending place; i. e., mouth of the Kennebec.

Homely women are always more entertaining than pretty specimens of the fair sex.
The latter rely on their beauty to carry them through the world, and it generally does until they get married, when it commonly fails them. The homely girl, knowing she has no beauty to rely on, goes to work and improves her mind; she learns some accomplishment, becomes a clever artist or pianist, reads a good deal, and so learns to converse readily and well. She is better company than the pretty girl, for the beauty does not think it worth her trouble to be entertaining, as she has spent all her efforts in trying to look pretty. The beauty may make a good wife, but the chances are that she will learn nothing after marriage, and so will soon become dull and uninteresting. The ugly girl, with a little brains, stands as fair a chance of getting a good husband as her pretty sister, and a much better prospect of having a happy home.

Attorneys at Law.

A. L. HART, Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J streets.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON, 504 J street

CHAS. T. JONES, 607 I street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST, 627 J street, Rooms 3 and 4.

R. M. CLARKEN, southwest corner Fourth and J streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON, 607 I street.

A. ANDERSON, No. 209 J street.

JAMES B. DEVINE, 604 I street.

W. A. GETT, JR., Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J streets.

HOLL & DUNN, Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER, Northeast corner Fourth and J Sts.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

G. GEORGE A. BLANCHARD, 405 J Street, up stairs.

J. W. HUGHES, Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE, Northeast corner Fourth
and J Streets.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN, Southwest corner Fourth and
J Street.

CHAS. H. OATMAN, No. 418 J Street, up stairs.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, No. 405 J street, up stairs.

G. GEORGE G. DAVIS, Room 26 Postoffice Building.

P. PHILIP S. DRIVER, 920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY, Court House. Practices in all
Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney), Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

I. ISAAC JOSEPH, N.W. corner Sixth and K streets.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAmento—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to O.
S. BOARDMAN, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 22d day of July, 1891, in which action W. S.
Hickey is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain judgment against you for the sum of One Thousand Four Hundred and Eighteen and $\frac{3}{4}$ Dollars, alleged to be due, owing and unpaid from you to the plaintiff for the balance of an account; all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made. And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will take judgment against you for \$1,418.75, and costs of suit.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. RHOADS, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand
[SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 24th day of July, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. DOODY, Deputy Clerk.
W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. a8-2m

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, COUNTY OF SACRAmento, State of California.—In the matter of the Columbus Brewing Company, a corporation, an insolvent debtor. An adjudication of insolvency herein having been duly made, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the 23d day of October, 1891, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., at the court-room of this Court, in Department No. 1, in the city of Sacramento, be and the same are the time and place appointed for the meeting of the creditors to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the city of Sacramento, at least once a week during the period prior to the time appointed for the meeting of creditors.

A. P. CATLIN,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated this 17th day of September, 1891.
A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Attorneys for Petitioners.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—TAKE
Notice.—That on the 30th day of October, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department
One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 1811 to 1821, inclusive. The nature of the business to be conducted by me is keeping a dairy and selling milk; the place of my said business is Sacramento County, Sutter Township, and the name of my husband is J. L. Clark. KATIE E. CLARK.

se26-5t

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor. E. M. Stevens, an insolvent debtor, having applied to this Court for a discharge from his debts, it is hereby ordered that the Clerk of this Court give notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, to appear before this Court, at the court-room thereof, on the 2d day of October, 1891, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock, P. M., and show cause, if any they have, why the said E. M.
Stevens should not be discharged from all his debts, in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided. It is further ordered, that notice of said application be given to the creditors by mail, and by publication for four weeks in the THEMIS, a newspaper published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated September 3d, 1891.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. sep5-4t

Bright Thoughts.

The society of good people is always good society.—Julia Ward Howe.

Be a lamp in the chamber if you cannot be a star in the sky.—George Eliot.

I never judge a man by the length of his creed, but by the breadth of it.—Uncle Ezek.

Every noble life leaves the fiber of it interwoven forever in the work of the world.—Ruskin.

Thoreau's advice was: "Read the best books first, or you may not have a chance to read them at all."

Be content with such things as ye have, for He hath said: I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.—Heb. xiii, 5.

Many of us have two standards—one for ourselves that reaches the clouds, while the other, which we give to others, trails low in the dust.

The following rules for the government of children, which were first presented in one of John Abbott's books, are said to have been of great service to many successful teachers:

When you consent, consent cordially.
When you refuse, refuse finally.
When you punish, punish good naturedly.
Comment often. Never scold.

A Homely Simile.

"When I was on my way to visit my kinfolks in Texas a month or so ago," said C. N. Chappell to a Springfield (Mo.) Democrat man yesterday, "I saw my first field of sugar cane. I mistook it for Indian corn, which it somewhat resembled. A seedy-looking farmer shared my seat on the train. Intending to be affable I said to him:

"That's a fine field of corn, sir."

"Call it corn up your way, do you?" was the reply.

"Why, isn't it?"

"Well, it might be corn, mebbe," said the farmer, with a grin. "It might be corn just as our old cat might have been a rabbit the time he got shot for one."

"How's that?"

"Well, I'll tell you. Old Tom was licking his way through the woods back of our house one day as fast as he could eat, and my son Jack was out with his gun huntin' rabbits, and shot him down for one. When Jack came in the house me and my old woman commenced to jaw him about it, and he says, says he: 'Wall, I 'low as how he might have showed more ears.'"

"I laughed heartily as I glanced again from the car window at the early stalks of sugarcane, and laughed again as the farmer concluded:

"'And jest in the same way, stranger, that thur cane might have been corn if it had showed more ears.'"

Different Colors of Gold.

"Most people suppose," says an assayer, "that all gold is alike when refined, but this is not the case. An experienced man can tell at a glance from what part of the world a gold piece comes, and in some cases from what part of a particular gold district the metal was obtained.

"The Australian gold, for instance, is distinctly redder than the Californian, and this difference in color is always perceptible even when the gold is 1000 fine.

"Again, the gold obtained from the placers is yellower than that which is taken directly from quartz. Why this should be the case is one of the mysteries of metallurgy, for the placer gold all comes from the veins. The Ural gold is the reddest found anywhere.

"Few people know the real color of gold, as it is seldom seen unless heavily alloyed, which renders it redder than when pure. The purest coins ever made were the $50-pieces that used to be common in California.

"Their coinage was abandoned for two reasons; first, because the loss by abrasion was so great; and, secondly, because the interior could be bored out and lead substituted, the difference in weight being too small to be readily noticed in so large a piece. These octagonal coins were the most valuable ever struck."

He Took It for Wit.

Singleton—I'm sorry to hear that you have trouble with your wife. What's the matter?

Benedict—It's her way of talking. She says the most cutting, ironical things to me on every occasion. Never misses a chance to spring something horribly sarcastic. It's dreadful, I tell you.

Singleton—Well, you knew her long enough before you were married to learn of the trait.

Benedict—Oh, I did; but I took it for wit then.

An eastern barber who recently went west says: "A clean shave is an abomination almost exclusively confined to the west. It is quite an unusual thing in the east, and is something unheard of in Europe. A clean shave means really taking off a certain thickness of the skin, and the man who will submit to this torture for the looks deserves no sympathy. To clean shave a man without drawing blood is to prove one's self an artist, and that is why a western man is popular in the far east."

CURES CONSTIPATION.
LASH'S
KIDNEY AND LIVER BITTERS
CURES HEADACHE.
CURES MALARIA.
CURES DYSPEPSIA.

W. D. Comstock, 501 -- 507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

THE GREATEST OF AMERICAN WATERS
A NATURAL MINERAL WATER OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT.
"SHASTA WATER"
BOTTLED FOR EUROPEAN TRADE
MOUNT SHASTA, ELEVATION 14,442 FT.
TRADE MARK.
MOUNT SHASTA MINERAL SPRING CO.
GENERAL OFFICE 908 & 910 2nd Street
SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA U.S.A.
BOTTLED AT THE SPRINGS

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,
Photographic Art Parlors
426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK
Restaurant and Oyster House
1019 SECOND STREET,
Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.
First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.
BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.
1022 FOURTH STREET.
Next door to Postoffice, SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.
Importers and Wholesale Dealers in
Wines and Liquors.
CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.
116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,
SACRAMENTO, CAL.
JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.
Artificial Stone Sidewalks
Latest Designs and First-class Work.
Estimates Furnished for Residences.
Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

October 1, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6-50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11-15 A
3-05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8-40 P
12-50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4-30 A
4-30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7-00 P
7-35 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7-40 A
10-50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9-35 A
11-50 A	Second Class, Ogden and East	11-05 A
11-00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5-25 A
	Ogden and East
3-00 P	Oroville	10-30 A
3-00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10-30 A
10-35 A	Redding via Willows	4-00 P
2-50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11-25 A
4-35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12-30 A
6-50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11-05 A
5-40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10-40 P
3-05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	5-40 P
*10-00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	26-00 A
10-50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2-50 P
10-50 A	San Jose	2-50 P
4-30 P	Santa Barbara	9-35 A
6-50 A	Santa Rosa	11-05 A
3-05 P	Santa Rosa	8-40 P
8-50 A	Stockton and Galt	7-00 P
4-30 P	Stockton and Galt	9-35 A
11-50 A	Truckee and Reno	2-25 A
11-00 P	Truckee and Reno	5-25 A
6-30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2-30 P
6-50 A	Vallejo	8-40 P
3-05 P	Vallejo
*8-20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*2-40 P
*12-15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*10-20 A
*4-45 P	Folsom	*8-00 A

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning, P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT..... N. D. RIDEOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT..... FRED'K COX
CASHIER..... A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER..... W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Rideout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. R. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

CAPITAL STOCK PAID UP - - - - $225,500 00
RESERVE AND SURPLUS, - - - - 54,253 26

Term and Ordinary Deposits Received.
Dividends Paid Semi-annually.

Money Loaned on Real Estate Only.

WM. BECKMAN, President.

GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier.

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,
[CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THELEMS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1891.

No. 35.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The annual convention of the International Press Association will be held in San Francisco in January, 1892, and many of the brightest minds in the newspaper world will be in attendance. Measures should be immediately inaugurated by our citizens for the reception and entertainment of the association in Sacramento, as the resources and possibilities of California from the prolific pens of the gentlemen representing the association will find millions of readers through the influential journals and magazines controlled by them. Sacramento has always been noted for her generous hospitality, and upon this occasion should eclipse all her previous efforts, as the opportunity will be offered her people to set forth the advantages and resources of the great Sacramento valley and of northern and central California, upon which the capital city so much depends for her future greatness.

From an examination of the new election laws, it appears that there is no recognition of committee nominations. The nominations must be made by conventions of the respective parties, or by petition of at least five per cent of the voters at the last election preceding the ensuing election. If this view is correct, it will become necessary for a call for a convention and the election of delegates for the school election on the first Monday in December. Heretofore the selection of party candidates for superintendent of city schools and school directors has been exercised by the city central committee. Perhaps, after all, the importance of our school elections will be better realized by having the candidates chosen by a nominating convention. It would be well for the city committee to take early consideration and action in this matter. There are many important matters that must be considered regarding the operation of the present reform ballot law. Indeed the masses will have to be educated so as to understand its operation, to enable the voter to exercise his elective right properly. We shall take occasion to explain the law in a future issue.

Several days ago Congressman McKenna is reported to have declared California to be a Blaine State; that its love of Blaine has not waned; its admiration for him has increased. Mr. McKenna expressed the belief that Blaine would not be a candidate for the presidency, and gave as one reason, that if he desired to become a candidate he would not remain in the cabinet. Now, it has been declared that Blaine has decided not to resume his duties as Secretary of State. Putting all the circumstances together, and adding the magnificent endorsement of Blaine by every State convention that has met in the last year, there is but one conclusion, and that is—Blaine will be the Republican standard-bearer next year. Quoting from Congressman McKenna: "What Mr. Blaine has done since he has been Secretary of State has been to the glory of the administration as well as to himself." It appears that the general impression heretofore has been that Blaine and Harrison had an understanding that Harrison should not be opposed by Blaine. But if Blaine retires from the cabinet there is a reasonable ground to believe that he may respond to the wishes of the people and become the nominee of the party. President Harrison's administration has been popular, and he has added greatly to his strength through the grand sentiments expressed by him during his trip over the nation; but the idol of the people is Blaine.

Man arrogates to himself a status among animal life that does illy become him, it would seem. Disparity of the lower orders of the animate has been the rule. The expression "What a goose you are!" implies that the fowl lacks in discernment and intelligence. It would seem this estimate was placed upon the goose in the earlier ages, for in the Egyptian hieroglyphics the emblem of a vain and silly fellow is a goose. Far from truth is human estimate. The goose is shrewd and wary, difficult to deceive, and about it there are not the characteristics of vanity or silliness. Then we have the goat, not at all as numerous as his relative the sheep, that is ridiculed. He was in early time placed under the seats in church stalls as a mark of dishonor and abhorrence, especially to ecclesiastics who took a vow of continence. Now it is we speak of an inebriate that "he is as full as a goat." Is the comparison just to the goat? Perhaps, however, the ass is the most maligned of animals; and it comes, perhaps, that his ears are in size exaggerated, that he is very determined in his convictions, and that his voice is not as pleasant as that of a song bird. In truth, it was the ancients accorded him a more honorable place than do the people of to-day. Upon the back of the ass Al Borak (the lightning) the prophet Mohammed went to heaven, though some authorities hold it was a camel. In our own Scriptures there is reverence paid to the intelligence and service of this animal. Balaam it was who, at the command of God, rose up in the morning, saddled his ass and went with the princes of Moab. It was the animal saw that which Balaam saw not: the angel of the Lord, with menacing sword, standing in the pathway, and she exercised a judgment superior to that of the man. Smitten thrice by her angered master, she did speak: "What have I done unto thee that thou hast smitten me these three times?" It was Balaam did reply that she had mocked him, and he did affirm: "I would there was a sword in mine hand, for now I would kill thee." It was when the eyes of the man were opened he perceived his folly and comprehended the wisdom of his chattel. He did admit he had sinned, and that his treatment of his beast had been unmerciful. It would seem in the unique Proverbs the animal of modern ridicule should be honored above the animal esteemed more noble—the horse. "A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool's back." In the vision of the prophet Isaiah wherein he did complain of Judah for her rebellion against God it is written: "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." Another phase there is in Scripture concerning the ass—the emblem of lowliness, of social caste. Zachariah, in prophesying the coming of Christ, did say: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." There did come a fulfilment of the prophecy; it was the Son of Man did ride into Jerusalem upon an ass (Matthew xxi). There is a dark stripe running down the back of this animal, crossed by another at the shoulders. The tradition is that this cross was communicated to the creature when the Lord rode on the back of an ass in his triumphant entry into the Jewish capital. In the sixteenth century, in France, a bankrupt was mounted on an ass, with his face to its tail, and was made to ride through the principal thoroughfares of the town. Æsop could not refrain from an unjust attack on this unfortunate animal. He did represent him as masquerading in the skin of a lion, frightening the other animals until he betrayed himself by attempting to roar. There was injustice.

And the dog has received his share of unjust indignity; yet he is the most faithful of animals; one that will sacrifice his life to save his master from peril; surviving him, will keep vigil over his grave. He is sensitive to praise, censure or ridicule to greater degree than any of the lower animals. He does cling to the master when his star of fortune wanes; when even the friendship of his kind is denied him. Fidelity: How few of us do not recall the story we read in youth of Gelert, the greyhound of Llewellyn; that a wolf entered the room where the infant son of the Celtic prince was asleep; that Gelert flew at it and killed it; that when Llewellyn returned home he saw blood on the mouth of his dog, hastily concluded he had killed the child, and thrust him through with a sword; that the dying howl of the dog awoke the child, and the prince saw his rashness too late. Little was there of reparation that Gelert was buried with pomp and honor, and that his name has gone into history. In the museum of Berne is preserved the stuffed skin of the noble mastiff of Great St. Bernard, that early in this century was instrumental in saving the lives of forty human beings. His most memorable achievement was rescuing a child whose mother had been destroyed by an avalanche. The dog carried the boy on his back to the hospice. In the olden-time monuments the dog was placed at the feet of women to symbolize fidelity and affection; the lion at the feet of men to represent courage and magnanimity. The Crusaders did represent themselves with their feet on a dog to show they followed the standard of the Lord as faithfully as the dog followed the footsteps of his master. Unjust is the estimate generally accorded the dog. In Deuteronomy xxiii:18 the price of a dog is degraded to the hire of the most depraved of humans, and is pronounced an abomination unto the Lord. Contempt would seem to have been expressed by the remark of Goliath to David when they met in duel: "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" The unfortunate Job, after bemoaning his former prosperity and honor; after a profuse recitation of the events of an upright career, refers with bitterness to the treatment he was receiving from the younger element: "But now they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock." Incidentally we may express a sympathy with Job, for he was a man "perfect and upright, and one that feared God and eschewed evil." When smitten with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown, when his wife said to him "Curse God and die," he retained his faith, but did feel some resentment that those who should have been his friends had abandoned him. After all, Pope struck it about right when he inscribed on the collar of a dog he gave to the prince:

I am his Highness's dog at Kew!
Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?

We do estimate the cat about right: subtle, ungrateful and treacherous. In mediæval times it was in superstition that Satan's favorite form was a black cat; and it was said it was the familiar of the witches. Among the Romans the cat was the symbol of liberty; that of all animals it was most opposed to restraint. By the Egyptians it was held in sacred veneration; to kill one, even by accident, was punishable by the death of the man. In so high esteem were they held that it is related an army of invasion equipped themselves with cats, and the Egyptians dared not to assail lest harm should come to the sacred animals. Cats are traditionally combative among themselves. There is related the story of the Kilkenney cats—two that fought in a sawpit so ferociously that when the battle was over only the tail of each was left. It was of superstition the cat had nine lives; it is tenacious of life. In Romeo and Juliet we read:

Tyb. What wouldst thou have with me?

Mer. Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives.

The horse has ever been respected, perhaps that he has the docility, speed and strength to lessen the labor of man. He has distinguished himself in war and on the turf; in more humble line at the plow. Alexander the Great named his war charger Bucephalos; he was the only man that could mount the steed. A city was built for his mausoleum. The horse is capable of adapting himself to most any situation or climate, so readily even as man. It would appear he is strictly a vegetarian, yet if we will believe J. Ross Browne horses will sustain themselves on fish when grass gets short. In his "Land of Thor," Mr. Browne, in speaking of the horses of Iceland, says: "Nothing, in fact, could astonish me after learning that the horses in Iceland are fed during the winter on dried fish. This is a literal fact. Owing to the absence of grain and the scarcity of grass, it becomes necessary to keep life in the poor animals during the severest months of the season by giving them the refuse of the fisheries; and, what is very surprising, they relish it in preference to any other species of food. Shade of Ceres! what an article of diet for horses!"

There are numerous characteristics attributed by man to the animal creation that are more or less appropriate. To instance: As brave as a lion; as blind as a bat; as wise as a serpent; as black as a crow; to go the whole hog, or to hog it; a pig in a poke; he has brought his pigs to a pretty market; he follows us about like an Anthony pig; please the pigs; as dirty as a pig; you have got the wrong sow by the ear; as still as a mouse; as the crow flies; to crow over one; I have a crow to pluck with you; a snake in the grass; to cherish a serpent in your bosom; their ears have been serpent-licked; the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head; as weak as a cat; let the cat out of the bag; gone to the dogs; the dog in the manger; barking dogs never bite; a horse in clover; as swift as an eagle; as slow as a snail; as strong as a bull; he is on a high horse; as wet as a drowned rat; I smell a rat; owl-like wisdom; as fleet as a deer; as sly as a fox; "go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise; which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest" (Proverbs vi-6, 7, 8); as lively as a flea; a bee in his bonnet; to put an ape in your hood; as dumb as an oyster; as patient as an ox; I sent him off with a flea in his ear; as proud as a peacock.

Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

The officers who have commanded the armies of the United States, since the foundation of the military service, are as follows, together with their rank and term of service:

General and Commander-in-Chief George Washington, from June 5, 1775, to the close of the Revolution.

From that date in September, 1789, the army consisted of eight companies of infantry and a battalion of artillery (act of September, 1785), when Brevet Brigadier-General Josiah Harmer, Lieutenant-Colonel commandant of the infantry, was assigned and held until March, 1791.

Major-General Arthur St. Clair, from March, 1791, to March, 1792, when he resigned.

Major-General Anthony Wayne, from March, 1792, to December 15, 1796, when he died in a hut on the banks of Lake Erie, in Pennsylvania, while en route from Maumee to the east.

Brigadier-General James Wilkinson, from December 16, 1796, to July 2, 1798.

Lieutenant-General George Washington, from July 3, 1789, till his death, December 4, 1799.

Brigadier-General James Wilkinson (again), from June, 1800, to January, 1812, when he was promoted to Major-General.

Major-General Henry Dearborn, from January, 1812, to July, 1815, when he was mustered out.

Major-General Jacob Brown, from June, 1815, till his death, February 24, 1828.

Major-General Alexander McComb, from May, 1828, till his death, in June, 1841.

Major-General Winfield Scott, from June 25, 1841, to November, 1861, being also breveted Lieutenant-General from May, 1861.

Major-General George B. McClellan, from November 1, 1861, to March 11, 1862.

Major-General Henry W. Halleck, from July 22, 1862, to March 12, 1864.

Lieutenant-General U. S. Grant (appointed July 5, 1863), from March 12, 1864, to March 4, 1869.

General William T. Sherman, from March 8, 1869.

At the close of the war Congress passed an act establishing the grades of General and Lieutenant-General. Grant and Sherman were appointed. When Grant was elected President the grade of General was continued, and Sherman appointed to that office and Sheridan made Lieutenant-General. When Sherman was retired by reason of age, the office of General became vacant, and Sheridan remained in command of the army with the rank of Lieutenant-General. When Sheridan was on his death-bed, Congress passed an act restoring the grade of General, and he was appointed to that office a short time before his death. Schofield succeeded to the command with the rank of Major-General.

Dogs on Money.

There is an important group of about forty coins containing outlines of dogs, which deserve careful study. The interest of some of them is mainly mythical, as with Lælaps, the hound of Actæon, presented to Cephalos by Procris with the dog of Segeste, which symbolized the river Crimissus. But there are enough to show how extensive were the operations of the dog fancier in early times. The coins afford no evidence of the development of a spaniel, there being no example of a pendulous ear; or of a mastiff, though bulldogs were undoubtedly known in the arenas of imperial Rome. But they prove conclusively—that is shown, indeed, by the less artistic products of Egyptian pictography—that the ancients had four kinds of dogs—the wolf-dog, the hound the greyhound and the terrier. The Umbrians had their wolf-hounds, the Apulians of Asculum their greyhounds, the more rugged hunters of the Tuscan forests their fox dogs. The favorite dog of Artemis Laphria, as on coins of Patrice and Sparta, was a greyhound, while Actæon's dogs must have been half-bred deer-hounds. Rhegium, if the coins may be trusted, had his sheep-dogs, the Macedonian city of Mende its terriers, and Cumæ, just above the bay of Naples, to which all the luxuries of the ancient world were brought, its poodles. Further pursuit of this line of inquiry would probably throw some useful light upon the direction of canine domestication.

Why Thiers Accepted a Duel, Not a Wife.

M. Thiers, the late eminent statesman, would never have been so great if he had not been so small, for it was his being one of the smallest men in France that saved his life. When he was about 20 years old, and studying in the town of Aix, the future historian fell deeply in love with a young lady belonging to a family of considerable local importance, proposed, to the object of his affections, and was accepted. Marriage was, however, out of the question at the time, on account of Thiers' narrow finances; so he started for Paris.

At first Thiers wrote frequently, with all the ardor of a lover; then a passion for the beautiful girl began to cool, and he wrote only at intervals; and, finally, not at all. This terribly enraged her father, who started for Paris to bring the false Lothario to book. Having at length discovered Thiers' lodgings, the father demanded that he should either fulfill his promise to his daughter or else give him (the father) satisfaction in the usual way, with pistols.

Thiers, though no fighter, thought it better to "spend five minutes with a weapon which he did not understand than a life with a woman whom he understood only too well." So he elected to take his chance in the duel, rather than in the hymenial lottery.

The duel came off, and Thiers fired in the air; but the father did not look on the proceedings as a joke at all, and he did his best to avenge his daughter's wrongs. So good an aim did he make that his bullet went through M. Thiers' hat.

Had the latter been a trifle taller, the future president of the French republic would have then and there finished his career.

Criminal Epidemics.

It has been frequently noticed that there are epidemics of robberies, as well as of suicides and other crimes. Recent developments in stage and train looting only emphasize the above assertion. A criminal epidemic, peculiar to half a dozen large cities of the United States that have a large and vicious population, is that of Sunday murders, which are the results of a day of idleness spent in open saloons. Then, again, murders with peculiar features often occur in groups in all parts of the country. In France there is a tradition, centuries old, that epidemics of suicide return in regular cycles at each recurrence of the suicidal furore the successive victims of their own murderous hands vieing with each other in the ghastliness of the tragedy that they enact.

Stories of wife-murders in various parts of the country, relieved by a few exceptional murders of husbands by their wives, reach the press simultaneously from many different sources. "Murder is in the air" has become a stereotyped expression among newspaper men and detectives, who know from experience that such epidemics will run their cycles and cause many bloody records to be made before they have spent their fury.

With bank robberies it is the same. It is not often that a single robbery is made—one is sure to breed others; "they come not singly, but in whole battalions." This is not because the same gang engages in many different enterprises, but because a universal similar impulse permeates the minds of the classes devoted to that form of guilt.

A curious study might be made of the causes of epidemics of crime. In mediæval times, and even now in superstitious countries, all evils were and are attributed to the influence of adverse stars. Probably this is an approach to a great scientific truth, or its advance shadow, to say the least. That meteorological conditions seriously affect the health and spirits is a fact of such every-day experience that it is no longer regarded as phenomenal. The causes of meteorological changes must be the causes lying back of the pervading disposition to commit peculiar kinds of crime. A suicidal or a murderous atmosphere must, therefore, have its origin in some of the secret springs of nature. There are causes for all things in life and nature, and no study of such causes is in vain.

Have All the Good Things Been Said?

There are doubtless learned men—experts, so to speak, in the anatomization of humors—who firmly believe that every jest that wakes a tickled feeling in the modern ear is utterly rococo and antique; that all the good things possible to be said by human speech were uttered ages ago by the early Grecians, and that nineteenth century humor must necessarily be a repetition of that which was spontaneous before the Christian era. Thus, as a writer in the St. James' Gazette has lately put it, "our best jokes were invented some thousands of years ago—more than that, they were written down; more still, they have been preserved. It does not follow, however, that modern wits are all plagiarists; but they lie open to suspicion."

Nothing is easier than these sweeping and dogmatic generalizations on abstract literary questions. Their fallacious character becomes readily apparent when put to the test in concrete shape and measured against the standard, say, of American humor in its typical forms. The stovepipe, for example, and the wheelbarrow may be called prototypes of our national humor in its domestic phases. It is doubtful if such domestic accessories, so redolent of those mirthful touches that make the land akin, were known to the early Grecians. The mother-in-law was not thus unknown, and it may be that we are thus enabled to trace the genealogy of that unending and irresistible theme of drollery.

The deadlatch key is also a comparatively modern invention, and the paternal Athenian could hardly have fumbled at his classic portals with that elusive implement in hand, after a convivial and protracted evening, in the manner celebrated by the foremost humorists of America. The early Greeks must have had soap. Anyhow, London began to make it in 1524; so that the mad jest about soap on the back stairs no doubt justly belongs to sixteenth century chronology. Tacks, too, were known to the ancient Gauls and Germans; so possibly the humor which invests the act of stepping upon a tack may be somewhat primeval.

On the other hand, the facetious reference to the young bride's first batch of bread clearly exhales an aroma of American domesticity, since it is inconceivable that the romantic maid of Athens could have been practical enough to set a batch of dough, or know when the loaf was "light" enough to be put in the oven.

But enough has been said to rebut the assumption that modern wit of the [American] school is a strutter in borrowed plumage. It may not have the Attic flavor always, but for the most part it is sufficiently racy of the soil to indicate its paternity. As to English humor, and English appreciation of that quality—that opens another question.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

It is the little puffs which raise the wind for the poor actor.

Burlesque actresses as usual this season will wear nothing but divorce suits.

If this world is a stage, the bald headed man must be a supe, for he has no part.

Maurice Maetterlink is the newest pessimistic dramatist. He lives in Ghent, was a lawyer once, and is called the local Shakespeare. The cheerful name of his last and first play is The Atheist's Tragedy.

A noticable thing about women who kindly take off their bonnets at the theater is the disappearance of the Psyche knot, and the substitution of the pyramid coil. A lady's description of the latter is: "Draw the braid up to the crown, not the top; and tie it to stand out."

Never were there three women, employing their talents for the same object, and laboring in the same field of professional endeavor, more widely dissimilar than Mme. Modjeska, M'lle Bernhardt and Mrs. Langtry. One is a passion flower, one a brilliant carnation, one a languorous lily. The first beguiles your interest, the second fascinates you, the third compels your admiration. Each has her different method, each her peculiar power of drawing audiences to her side.

Charlie Reed is one of the most original and genuine of comedians. He is never at a loss for the right word, and his company never knows what he will say on the stage. But one night he surpassed himself. In the last act the business requires him to break some crockery. That night he picked up a couple of the fragments and, turning to May Yohe, who had been speaking French, he said: "Excuse me; can you speak broken China?" For a few moments the laugh was on the company, who were convulsed by the unexpected joke.

Jessie Bartlett Davis, the handsome contralto of the Bostonians Opera Company, like the majority of her sister professionals, cherishes a unique fad, says an exchange. In the long procession of trunks which accompany Miss Davis upon her theatrical travels there are four that contain nothing but pink tea gowns. There are twenty-five or thirty of them in all, and the number is steadily growing. Every possible shade of pink is represented in a dozen different materials, and the designs range from a plain, every-day sort of a robe, turned out by a Boston dressmaker, to a supremely dainty creation by Felix. The wrappers have resulted in developing Miss Davis into an afternoon tea enthusiast, and the quantity of English breakfast which she and her friends consume during the week would almost float the average frigate.

Sie Wird Gekueszt—she shall be kissed—is the name of a light comedy translated directly from the German stage. The following is the interesting plot of this little comedy: A flashy young lieutenant makes a vow to kiss a lady whose handkerchief he picks up, and agrees to do it within a certain time. A piece of ribbon on which the kiss is indirectly prayed for is wrapped in the handkerchief, which is replaced in the cloak pocket from which it has fallen. The cloak belongs to the young lady's mother and the lieutenant finds himself in one of a series of predicaments. At a ball in the last act, when all hope seems to be lost and only ten minutes of the specified time remains, the lieutenant's one friend who is not taunting him about the time, provides a piece of mistletoe, tells the English custom and volunteers to lead the mother to the desired place. It is done, she is kissed, shown the mistletoe, acknowledges the point and introduces to the guests her future son-in-law in the person of the young lieutenant.

Nobody can tell a funny story better, or appreciate one more, than Bert Davis, the successful manager. But he simply can't smile. Frank Daniels and his company were playing Little Puck at the Grand, and Manager Freeman gave Bert a box to witness the performance. He sat through the two first excruciatingly funny acts and never moved an eyelash, while the audience were in spasms of laughter. But towards the close of the second act the piece dragged a little. The players were evidently nervous. Manager Freeman went behind the scenes to investigate. Instantly he appeared Daniels button-holed him. "Who is that Jonah in the box on the right?" he excitedly demanded. "He's quered the whole play. The whole company have been playing straight at him for two acts, and he's never even smiled. Take him out—take him out, I say, or I won't raise the curtain." Freeman explained, but it was no use. "I don't care if he is the President of the United States, he's got to come out of that box or I don't go on," said Daniels. Freeman went into the box and suggested refreshments, and they went out and winked the other eye. Then the play went on, much to the delight and gratification of all concerned. But Davis never smiled.

Book Chat.

It doesn't follow that a versifier always produces fervid results.

Pere Hyacinthe, it is said, has become a Theosophist, and will deliver lectures on his new faith.

Senator Sherman, in his library at Mansfield, has a large fireproof vault containing his enormous private correspondence with prominent men and women.

Marie Bashkirtseff's tomb, near Passy, consists of a vault and chapel. Her portrait hangs just above the sarcophagus and is wreathed in flowers in true French fashion, and day and night a lamp is kept burning close by.

The largest sum ever paid for a single novel is said to have been $200,000, to Alphonse Daudet for "Sapho," published in 1884. Eighty thousand dollars was received by Victor Hugo for "Les Misérables," published in ten languages.

Marion Harland is a large woman of matronly appearance, somewhat above medium height. She has a brown complexion, black hair that is beginning to turn gray, and a broad forehead. She began to write stories when she was a child of six.

Some of the women who write what are called "society novels" complain that their books are not appreciated and do not bring the revenue they were led by the publishers to expect. The revenue is what occasioned more regrets, perhaps, than the lack of literary appreciation.

Hall Caine, who has been selected by Dr. Herman Adler, chief rabbi of England, to study the Hebrew question in Russia, is the author of the powerful historical romance on Ishmael called "The Scapegoat," which is now running in the Illustrated London News. Perhaps no living writer, not even Gen. Lew Wallace, of "Ben Hur" fame, has made so close a study of the history and home life of the Israelites of old.

This story of Emerson is afloat: Having risen one night, he unintentionally aroused his wife, who inquired: "Are you sick, Waldo?" "Oh, no, my dear," was his reply, "but I've got an idea. What's the matter with these matches? I can't make them ignite. Let it go, now," sighed the philosopher, "my idea is gone." The next morning, upon arising, Mrs. Emerson found all the teeth in her comb broken out. This is supposed to have happened in the days (or nights) when matches came in cards.

Shakespeare wrote 144 sonnets distinguished by "a linked sweetness long drawn out," and also by an utter disregard of the Petrarchan rules. In his sonnets the rhymes alternate until the last two, which form a rhyming couplet clinching the rest. Milton adhered to the old Italian form. His sonnet upon his blindness is considered the finest in our language. Joseph Blanco White's sonnet upon "Life and Death" ranks next, in the opinion of such critics as Leigh Hunt and Coleridge. This sole splendid outburst of an else silent muse has given him literary immortality.

Swinburne, in his article on "Social Verse," which is published in the October number of the Forum, maintains that "there is no lovelier sonnet in the world than the late Lord Rosslyn's 'Bedtime.'" Here is his sonnet which Swinburne esteems so highly:

BEDTIME.

'Tis bedtime; say your hymn and bid "Good night."
"God bless Mammy, Papa and dear ones all."
Your half-shut eyes beneath your eyelids fall;
Another minute you will shut them quite.
Yes, I will carry you; put out the light;
And tuck you up, altho' you are so tall.
What will you give me, Sleepy One, and call
My wages, if I settle you all right?
I laid her golden curls upon my arm,
I drew her little feet within my hand;
Her rosy palms were joined in trustful bliss,
Her heart next mine beat gently, soft and warm;
She nestled to me, and, by Love's command,
Paid me my precious wages—"Baby's kiss!"

Moore, as is well known, was greatly enraged by the lines in which Byron, in "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," ridiculed his absurd duel with Jeffrey, and sent him a challenge, which did not reach the young satirist for a year. This challenge led to several letters passing, and finally, as Moore had now calmed down, to a friendly meeting in the hospitable house of Samuel Rogers. The latter had first proposed that Moore and Byron and himself, of course, should alone form the party, but Thomas Campbell chancing to call, he too was pressed to join. When Byron came he made an excellent impression, and Moore, as was not surprising, was delighted and struck by "the nobleness of his air, his beauty, the gentleness of his voice and manner, his kindness to myself. Being in mourning for his mother, the color of his dress, as of his glossy, curling, picturesque hair, gave more effect to the pure, spiritual paleness of his features, in the expression of which, as he spoke, there was a perpetual play of lively thought, though melancholy was their habitual character when in repose." Unfortunately, there was nothing for the young poet to eat; for Byron, in his dread of getting fat, lived on vegetables, and the biscuits and soda water for which he asked could not at that day, even in such a wealthy house as Rogers', be got. "He professed, however," continues Moore, "to be equally well pleased with potatoes and vinegar, and of these meagre materials contrived to make a rather hearty dinner." The meeting went off admirably.

Professional Chat.

Justice is made blind so that she can't see what is going on in the court-room.

An English religious paper recently printed the following remarkable advertisement: "A cultured earnest, godly young man desires a pastorate. Vivid preacher, musical voice, brilliant organizer. Tall, and of a good appearance. Blameless life. Very highest references. Beloved by all. Salary, £120."

A revival of the famous Tichborne case is threatened. It is alleged that the veritable Arthur Orton has turned up in the lunatic asylum at Paramatta, Australia. Warder Carroll, of Ballarat, who served in the Carabineers in which Sir Roger Tichborne was an officer, and who was an important witness in the original trial at Westminster, has been sent to interview the alleged Orton, and it is possible there may be some interesting developments soon.

Senator Call, of Florida, is noted for his tedious speeches. One day Mr. Call took the floor for the third or fourth time, and there was a murmur of discontent in the chamber. Mr. Edmunds jumped to his feet to ask him to suspend for a motion, but Mr. Ingalls pulled the Vermont senator by the coat. "Don't interfere," he said, "the senator is only performing his function as assistant sergeant-at-arms. I am about to make a motion to go into executive session, and he is clearing the galleries." Mr. Call heard the remark, and for once cut his speech short.

The paragraph in the Baltimore Sun entitled "Must Wear Coats," reminds a reader of that famous lawyer and wit, Judge Pettigrew, who graced the bar of South Carolina many years ago. A judge had issued an order that all attorneys appearing in his court should wear "black coat and trousers." His honor, with frowning visage, accosted him. "Mr. Pettigrew, do you know, sir, that you are transgressing a most positive order of this court?" "In what way, may it please your honor?" "The order says you shall wear black coat and trousers," yelled the judge. "I have on a black coat and trousers," replied the wit. "But," roared the judge, "the order means black coat and black trousers." "I don't read it so," replied Pettigrew. "It also says the sergeant-at-arms should wear a cocked hat and sword. I see the cocked hat, but I don't see any 'cocked' sword." There was no further judicial comment on the nankeens.

"Why did you tell what was not true?" was asked in court of a detective. "In the interests of justice," was the prompt reply. This was the statement of a detective who had been placed in the cell next a man accused of grand larceny, and who told him falsehoods in order to make him confess. To the official eye of a policeman such conduct may seem justifiable, but to the unpartisan gaze of an ordinary American, does it seem right to tell lies for any purpose? Can it be justified by anything save the old, accursed maxim that the end justifies the means? If it shall be judicially determined that a lie may honestly be told in the interests of justice, will it not require a casuist of more than mediaeval discrimination to decide when it is not right to tell lies? Is lying ever honorable, O most expert of detectives? And if so, is truth any longer as such a virtue? It is at least clear that the virtue of lying in the interests of justice is likely to be abused, if it be not rigidly defined and limited.

Apropos of bad spelling by lawyers a Wabash attorney tells the following good story: "The cyclone which visited East St. Louis several years ago lifted a Wabash engine from the track and carried it into the ditch. In replacing it on the track, a rope being used for that purpose broke, injuring a looker-on. He brought suit against the company at Belleville for $20,000 damages. His lawyer, in stating plaintiff's cause of action, in his declaration, said that the 'rath' of God had visited East St. Louis with a cyclone. The attorney for the railroad company made fun of his opponent's spelling, and said that if anything would excite the divine wrath it was bad spelling, and that East St. Louis might expect cyclones, pestilence, and famine as long as she tolerated the presence of such outlandish spellers as the attorney for the plaintiff; whereupon the latter rose, and, addressing the court, gravely said: 'I suppose that the learned counsel for the defendant never drew up a long legal paper and dropped the final letter of a word, but as it appears that I have done so in this case, to his great amusement, with the permission of the court I will add e now.' He was then permitted 'to add the e,' which he did to his great satisfaction, and the spelling of the word 'rathe' received judicial sanction, but the laughter which followed engulfed the plaintiff's counsel and his case as well."

NOTES.

The crank with a theory is like a dog chasing his tail—it's nothing new when he grasps it.

The new remedy for consumptive patients called chlorphenol is said to have shown remarkably good results in Italian hospitals.

To test eggs put them into a pail of water. If good, they will lie on their sides; if bad, they will stand on their small ends, the large end always uppermost.

The Italian Queen is noted throughout Europe as a pedestrian. She also displays an endurance in mountain climbing that is considered remarkable for a woman.

There are more women workers in the United Kingdom, Great Britain and Ireland, in proportion to the population, than in any other country in the world. Twelve per cent. of the working classes there are women.

Better a small business with your own name unsullied over it than large warehouses under a borrowed name. Give up all, store, goods, jewels, clothes, everything but your character, your good name, your integrity. Have that, and you have all.

Woman is the link between man and angel; woman is also the link between man and devil—divine and demoniacal. In mythology the Fates and the Furies, Siren, Siva and Sphinx, as well as Niobe, Thalia, Vishnu and Vesta, are represented as women.

The great Napoleon smoked tobacco but once, and then at the instance of the Persian Ambassador, who presented him with a magnificent oriental pipe. The experiment upset the Emperor's stomach, and he never repeated it, though later in life he became a devotee of the snuff-box.

The London Tidbits lately offered a prize for the best definition of money. The prize was awarded to Henry E. Baggs, of Sheffield, who defined it thus: "An article which may be used as a universal passport to everywhere except heaven, and as a universal provider of everything except happiness."

An ingenious application of electricity for ventilation has been brought out in France. An electric fan furnishes the current of air, which can be cooled by means of ice or other cooling agent. If hot air is required electricity is sent through a series of meshes of wire whose high resistance causes it to become hot, and the air passing through these is given the heat required.

Better poor but honest than wealth with the tears and imprecations of widows and orphans, of poor laborers and hard strugglers clinging upon it. Better to surrender the last cent, if it is yours, and start anew with unimpeachable integrity for your back and support, than to keep what is not yours, and simulate a virtue which you have not got.

"The honest man, though e'er so poor,
Is king o' men for a' that" (Burns.)

Our neighbor, the Sunday Leader, has just commenced a new volume, being the fourteenth year of existence. Friend Larkin presents a neat paper, and has recently embodied the latest telegraphic news. The Leader is the only Sunday paper in Central California, and has a field all to itself. We commend our neighbor for discarding the sensational and devoting its columns to legitimate news.

That is a remarkably queer law they have in Mexico regarding political prisoners. All persons who are suspected of revolutionary tendencies, captured recently, have been ordered to attempt to escape, and during this effort are shot in the back. These unfortunate creatures are given the alternative of being shot in this manner or executed at the prison. This is not an advanced step in civilization, and smacks much of barbarism.

The Democrats call the McKinley law a "worse-than-war tariff." But it has increased our foreign trade during the first ten months of its operation in the sum of $53,435,123. It has increased free importation from 34.09 per cent. of the total imports to 56.23 per cent., thus bringing in more than half of our foreign supplies absolutely free of duty. And it has reduced the per capita revenue from duties from $3.62 to $2.59. But facts never interfere with democratic allegations.

If "some are born great—and some have greatness thrust upon 'em," there are the others that "achieve greatness." If some are creatures of circumstances, there are the creators of circumstances as well. If there are geniuses that gaily dance into success, there are also those that climb up, wearily, painfully, the steep and rugged hillsides of fame. And we have more of the latter than of the former. Much of what passed for genius is proven, when subject to a critical analysis, to be nothing but hard, real hard, work. Enter the laboratories, the studios, the libraries, the workshops, the offices, the home, and see genius at work, and you will change your definition of it.

The man who makes the funniest speech at the stag dinner and keeps all the boys in a roar of laughter frequently has nothing to say when he gets home to his wife.

Miss Frances E. Willard sends this dictum and plea to the Woman's Journal, current issue: "We must, as women of common sense, agree to stand by each other in wearing street skirts that do not fall below the ankles. To do less is uncleanly and costs us the respect of every thinking person who sees us shuffling along on our street-mopping expeditions. Let us insist on this reform for simple decency's sake, to say nothing of health or wholesomeness. This is the first step, this the hour's demand; all else that health, modesty and good taste indicate will follow."

We are prone to boast of the great superiority of the human family. There is no creature born so utterly helpless as the human babe. Hunger pains it, cold pinches it, other ills torture it, and it has no power to tell its troubles or designate where they are. The lower order, that are not as highly organized, become independent and self-supporting almost from the moment of their birth. The moth and butterfly take to wings immediately on emerging from the chrysalis; the birds peck at and capture insects as soon as they come from the egg. Many years must pass before the human-born can do what the lower creatures do from the moment of their birth.

Greatness is the possibility of youth. Man is, to a large extent, arbiter over his own fate during the first thirty years of his life. These passed unmissed—all is passed. He that lays the foundation early, and lays it well; he who, early in youth, gives a purpose to his life, sets before himself a goal, while yet he may and can, while free and unshackled, and then aims for it with all his heart and soul, prepares for it, studies for it, trains for it, makes sacrifices for it, suffers for it, concentrates all his energies upon it, shuns dissipation of power and interest, makes all minor purposes subservient to his one great purpose, becomes the very embodiment of his life's purpose, lives it, eats it, drinks it, talks it, dreams it, success, if at all attainable, will be his.

It may be all wrong to attach so much importance to trifles, the gruff man may mean as well as the polite, and be even more sincere. But human eyes are neither microscopes nor telescopes. They may see what is near and on the surface, they cannot read the mind nor see into the heart. The average man cannot apply the moral stethoscope to hear what is going on within, nor try the assayer's test to separate the precious metal from the dross. The eye that wants to be pleased, is pleased when it is pleased. The heart, that needs a word, a look of sympathy, appreciates and remembers even the slightest effort made to comfort it. The person that wants to be taken notice of, made something of, feels deeply grateful to the one that supplies that want.

The election of fifteen freeholders to frame a new organic law for this city is now a fixed fact. The Board of Trustees has reflected credit upon itself and done a justice to the people. If the proper men are selected to perform this duty, there is no possible doubt of the adoption of their work when consummated. The trustees, we understand, have determined to suggest to the nominating conventions of all parties fifteen names whom they will recommend for this work. We trust that all partisan consideration will be ignored in this matter. It is not a political party affair, but one for the people alone. There is a bright prospect for this city when we can have a form of government abreast of the times and in accord with the Constitution and general laws. Our progress has been long retarded by an inefficient charter.

In an interview with a reporter of the Record-Union, Sheriff Stanley suggests several improvements at and about the county courthouse. The suggestions of the sheriff are extremely sensible. The public buildings of Sacramento county and the city, save those controlled by the school and the fire departments and the county hospital, are not at all creditable to a community so large and representative of so much wealth. The improvements that have been made at the courthouse, and those proposed by the sheriff, have and will cost but little, yet they will be of much benefit. In one particular we disagree with Mr. Stanley: in his suggestion that a stone pavement be put down on the Seventh-street side of the courthouse. Some years ago that section of street was covered with slag from the smelting works that were then in operation, and since it has been that it is almost impossible to hear that which is spoken in the west court-room whenever a wagon passes along the street; it is not at all infrequent the proceedings have to stop until the outside noise ceases. Our suggestion is that the street should be improved with a coating of asphalt, to deaden the sound. The time that would be gained in court sessions would soon more than offset the cost of the improvement, for it must be recollected jurors, officers, and in some cases witnesses, are paid by the county.

Dr. W. R. Cluness, Jr., in the last number of Occidental Medical Times, makes an eloquent appeal to the medical fraternity to erect a monument to the memory of that great physician, Benjamin Rush, whose name, among the honored ones, "stands alone resplendent in its glory, borrowing light from none, shedding its rays upon all, and challenging universal admiration." While there has been many years neglect in paying this tribute, it is not too late to erect an enduring monument to his memory. The fame of this great physician is not confined to America. The King of Prussia presented him a coronation medal. The Queen of Etruria, King of Spain and Emperor of Russia made substantial recognition of Dr. Rush's medical character. Dr. Cluness closes his address with these words: "Something more is demanded of us as his successors than mere mental remembrance or written and perishable memorial. Such a shaft should arise ere the close of this century as will endure as long as the pyramids of Egypt or the very name of Rome itself, and to which the members of our profession the world over will point with pride as the gift of Americans to their father and to humanity's friend."

Old '49ers at Dinner.

NEW YORK, October 8, 1891.

EDITORS THEMIS: One of those enjoyable occasions which add a little pleasure to the ills of life took place in this city last evening, when twenty-five old '49ers held an informal dinner party at Morello's famous hostelry. The only wines drank were of California vintage. Among the company was Dr. Gardner Q. Colton, who in the early days, at San Francisco, issued the famous "Colton grants." Another was Captain Samuel L. Clapp, once of Marysville, and later an officer of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; Hon. Dennis Strong, ex-Mayor of Sacramento; Colonel William Colligan, who, in 1846, was attached to the United States ship Congress, under Commodore Stockton, and who, as one of the land forces, made the march in the winter of '46, with Fremont, from Monterey to Los Angeles; Major Francis D. Clark, President of the New York Society of California Pioneers, and who went to California in Stevenson's regiment; James J. McCloskey, a member of the "Eagle Theater" Company at Sacramento in 1850. During the evening Captain Clapp exhibited a New York Herald of December 26, 1848, which contained a full-page map of what was then known of California, and in connection therewith a "table of distances" from Monterey, then the capital and military headquarters of the army in California; viz: San Jose, 13 miles; San Francisco, 50 miles; San Rafael, 15 miles; Bodega, 50 miles; Sonoma, 30 miles; Napa, 12 miles; Sutter's Fort, 45 miles; Sutter's saw mill, 25 miles; Weber's store, on Weber creek, 14 miles; Stanislaus river mines, 25 miles. The Herald also has a notice of the arrival of the St. Loiseux with samples of gold and dispatches for Colonel R. B. Mason at Monterey; one long letter from Captain J. L. Folsom, quartermaster at San Francisco, to the quartermaster-general at Washington, D. C. On the map "Old French Camp," five miles south of Stockton, is located north of the Calaveras river. Captain Clapp also produced a copy of the Sacramento Transcript of May 15, 1850, Messrs. Fitch, Upham and Ewen, proprietors. Major Clark exhibited a late Sacramento Bee with cuts showing how the restoration of Sutter's Fort is proceeding. He said that he should inaugurate a popular subscription of one dollar among the California pioneers to aid in this noble work of the Native Sons of the Golden West. The evening passed most agreeably to all. In January the regular annual dinner of the Society of California Pioneers takes place. CALIFORNIAN.

[For THEMIS.]

Physiognomy.

It has been objected that M. Lavater wants system. To me his work seems altogether systematic and artificial. Although each particular principle appears to originate in the mere dream of imagination, yet with that dream he theorizes until every fragment seemingly has its aim and its end, while his details are minute and spun out so fine that through mere feebleness in finishing, the thread of the argument is seldom entire, but rather, through its various twistings, liable to be broken. If the detached features of forehead, eyes, nose, and mouth are pleasingly correct, yet when he unites these in order to form a perfect whole, seldom, perhaps never, does such union produce either the beautiful or the interesting. And yet this theory is specious, though in its elements ideal, and certainly not verified by actual every-day's observation; since that theory is found to particularize, when it ought to generalize, connecting genius or virtue or temper with a precise form of individual feature, when experience shows that those may exist under every construction, color and stature, that are human. To the simple judgment of the present writer it has seemed that the moral habits, the disposition, the understanding, and the passions, give expression, and, in effect, stamp character on the features, without changing the tints or altering the strong lineaments of original nature. Hence, under the personal deformities of Gibbon, Johnson, Pope, Esop, and the divine Socrates himself, men of inspired understanding and of sublime moral attainments were found; neither does it appear that the indulgence, the dissipation, the passions, or the genius of Alcibiades, Edward the Fourth of England, Spencer, Milton, and Bolingbroke, could disturb or distort the surpassing, but dissimilar beauty of their divinely intelligent faces. But M. Lavater is still found iterating and reiterating, that to such and such specific form of feature, displayed in his sketch, we may always look for the alliance of goodness or talent or refinement; as on the reverse, for stupidity or baseness or vulgarity. And yet, if at the first attentive observation of an individual, hitherto unknown, we receive sensible impressions, or form actual opinions, it is without mental reference or critical regard to the complex laws of Lavater. As physiognomy is a sentiment, even in nature, of which the infant who cannot reason and the brute animal who only fawns and fears, are susceptible, we are gratefully attracted by certain characteristic features, and painfully repelled by others. But does this impulsion or that repulsion surely indicate either virtue or vice in the subject of our attention? Is it not rather the result of something that assimilates with our aversions or sympathizes with our propensities?—for sure, though perhaps secret, is the prepossession we feel for what bears our likeness, provided that likeness be not in effect a fac-simile; and the resemblances, somewhat diversified, are the result of simple nature, without design or affectation. Does not the most irresistible likeness exist in sketches of caricature? Yet who would choose to be delineated after that fashion? And what is more offending than the mimicry of our manner and attitude, unless, indeed, it is the constant echo of our uttered sentiments? In fine, to recapitulate, it appears that certain individuals of the human race are so instinctively, that is, irresistibly, attracted and attached at sight of each other that, like the bloom and perfume of flowers, or particular notes in music, they seem intended by nature to assimilate and as of necessity to accord together. Indisputably, the virtuous will love virtue and admire its influence under every form and feature; while the vicious, in fearing, would rather abhor its delineations. That the passions do surely impress, and for a time distort, is readily conceded; but that these can displace or irrevocably destroy the original color or construction of forehead, eyes, nose and mouth, giving to Grecian symmetry of feature and delicacy of contour the broad irregularity of African deformity, is as surely denied; it being equally true that wickedness may be born, and continue to exist, beneath a beautiful exterior; nor can any power or possession of human genius, or habitual goodness, render the originally squalid and distorted countenance lovely and attractive. Truth cannot be founded on deception in striving to improve the understanding; and to amend the principles, should we expect miracles for ourselves or predict prodigies for others? We are, individually, as God in his infinite wisdom has created us; and such shall we remain, with the sole exception of being instructed and improved, or depraved and degraded, by time, effort or accident, the physiognomy at a certain age usually expressing the sentiment or betraying the passion. Yet, since nothing in our material or mental existence remains stationary, the characters which were written and read in the features yesterday may be blotted out to-morrow, or may bring new ideas in another language to the coming observer, as indefinite to mature judgment, as unjust to correct principle.

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

CALL ON THE AGENT OF THE
SUN INSURANCE CO.
AT
1014 FOURTH STREET,
WHEN WANTING INSURANCE.
Losses Paid Since Organization, - $1,082,224.46
THEO. J. MILLIKEN,
Manager Sacramento Branch.

FLASHES.

The cheapest shoes always squeak the loudest.

The weakest woman can shake the strongest man.

The best politics is to study the welfare of the people.

A good liar is better company than a solemn person.

While a puff benefits most everything, it destroys a cigar.

The smile of a pretty girl is very vacant, when directed to somebody else.

Some of our alleged self-made men must have become tired before the job was finished.

Most men who think themselves cunning are like a veil—you can see through them easily.

It takes grasshoppers and famine to give democracy success in the middle and western States.

Whether drunkenness is a vice or weakness depends upon whether he is a man of property or a tramp.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The attractions at the Metropolitan theater during the past week have not been of the very first order, consequently the patronage has been light.

The dramatic critics of the Examiner and Chronicle, at San Francisco, seem to vie with each other in the "roasting" process. If Peter Robertson says a play or company is good, then Tom Williams at once proceeds to denounce the same. It seems that these two men have become veritable cranks, and are therefore a source of worry to theatrical managers. Merit does not enter the question with them, and the impulse to "roast" takes the place of just criticism. It is said that managers have to extend "personal" favors to those two cranks in order to have anything like a fair chance with new plays or companies.

I. O. O. F. Encampment Entertainment.

At the new pavilion, October 21st, a grand entertainment and parade will be given in honor of the Grand Encampment of Odd Fellows. There will be a vocal and instrumental concert by one hundred voices, under the direction of Prof. W. H. Kinross. A competitive drill of the California State Cantons and Patriarchs Militant is also to take place. The entertainment will conclude with a grand ball.

New Announcements.

Attention is called to the following announcements appearing in THEMIS to-day: Theo. J. Millikin, manager Sun Insurance Company, 1014 Fourth street; G. W. Railton, railroad and steamship agent, 1004 Fourth street; C. H. Krebs & Co., dealers in paints, oils, glass, etc., 626 J street.

Sermonettes.

You must be sure of two things: You must love your work and not always be looking over the edge of it, wanting your play to begin; and the other is, you must not be ashamed of your work and think it would be more honorable to you to be doing something else.

Contentment abides with truth. You will generally suffer for wishing to appear other than you are, whether it be richer or greater or more learned. The mask soon becomes an instrument of torture.

Influence is to an individual what flavor is to fruit or fragrance to the flower; and no one can define the limit of that influence which constantly and imperceptibly escapes from our daily lives.

Every man has in his own life foibles enough; in his own mind trouble enough; in his own fortune evil enough, without being curious after the affairs of others.

Men of character are the conscience of the society to which they belong.—Our Society Journal.

A gentleman and his wife, both of whom were greatly respected by their neighbors for their Christian charity, entertained a visiting clergyman from a distant city, says the New York Press. Among the guests were members of their own church. The bright little daughter of the host was greatly interested in the good doctor, and very curious to know why people should say grace before dining. The doctor was pleased at the question, and hastened to inform her that all good people endeavored to return thanks in that manner for the good things which were given. "Yes," exclaimed the little inquisitive, "but you don't say grace just like my papa did last night." "How did your papa say grace, little girl?" "Well, papa came in, and as soon as he got in his chair at the table he looked hard at mamma and said, very solemn like, 'My God, what a supper!'"

Ten Commandments.

FOR THE HUSBAND.

Here, from Good Housekeeping, is a Sunday string of new "commandments" for husbands:

1st—"I am the source of many an unhappy marriage," says the mighty dollar, therefore, shalt thou make mutually satisfactory arrangements with thy wife concerning her pecuniary allowance, immediately upon entering the matrimonial ranks.

2d—Thou shalt not make thy wife's duties burdensome by comparing her cooking and household management to thy mother's, for every true wife doeth the best that she possibly can.

3d—Thou shalt not take thy wife to account for shortcomings, but overlook slight failings and bear patiently with faults, as thou wouldst that the Lord thy God did unto thine own weakness.

4th—Remember that thy wife is assisting thee very materially (financially) by being maid of all work, housekeeper, seamstress, nurse and cook. Six days shalt thou overlook unavoidable delays and mishaps (which annoy thy good wife as much as they do thee), and every seventh day thou shalt allow her to rest from arduous household duties and enjoy thy cheerful companionship.

5th—Honor thy wife with thy implicit confidence in all things, that she may counsel and advise thee, and lend her assistance over hard places in time of trouble.

6th—Thou shalt not kill thy wife's respect for thee by doing those things which would grieve thee if done by her.

7th—Thou shalt not commit the great error of being ashamed to apologize to thy wife, and thou shalt always do unto her as thou wouldst that she should do unto thee.

8th—Thou shalt not steal happy moments from thy wife by parting from her in anger, but "forgive and forget," and avoid the quarrels which are the greatest destroyers of matrimonial bliss.

9th—Thou shalt not bear ill will against thy wife without just cause, but shalt at all times permit her to defend herself.

10th—Thou shalt not covet the pleasure of the club, nor any other entertainment where thy wife must be excluded, but find comfort and enjoyment in the bosom of thine own family, whom it is thy duty to love, cherish and make happy.

FOR THE WIFE.

1st—"I am a great barrier to perfect matrimonial harmony," says Quick Temper; thou shalt, therefore, make every effort to get me thoroughly under control, or be sure thy husband doth not possess the same unfortunate trait.

2d—Thou shalt not make unto thee any evil imaginations concerning thy husband (being jealous and suspicious), for thou canst never be truly happy without placing implicit confidence and trust in him.

3d—Thou shalt not take for granted that matrimony is the chief end of woman's existence, and thou requirest no further knowledge and cultivation; but, rather, keep thyself thoroughly posted upon all interesting topics and endeavor in every way to retain thy husband's admiration and respect.

4th—Remember, it is the wife's first duty to please her husband. Six days shalt thou labor as a good cook, a tidy housewife and a cheerful companion, to satisfy thy husband, and every seventh day thou shalt strive to make the happiest in his existence.

5th—Honor thy husband and spend not thy days upon earth in brooding over his faults; but count up his good qualities, and see what a blessing he will become to thee, and what a happy and contented wife thou shalt be.

6th—Thou shalt not kill his affections by being unsympathizing in his troubles or expecting too much love-making.

7th—Thou shalt not commit the error of restricting thy husband in his own home. Let him do as he pleases, and do thou thy utmost to make home the most charming spot on earth to him, where he will forget business cares and worldly troubles, and where he will find comfort, peace and genuine happiness.

8th—Thou shalt not steal from thy husband his respect for thee by becoming less attentive to dress and manners than during courtship.

9th—Thou shalt not bear tales to others concerning thy husband's actions and family affairs, nor unveil his shortcomings to a third person.

10th—Thou shalt not covet luxuries which may bring thy husband to financial difficulties or perhaps ruin; nor social pleasures which thy husband doth not enjoy; nor mission work which causeth thee to neglect thy household duties; for home is woman's sphere, and here, in blissful communion and happiness with husband and children, should lie her chief duties and pleasures.

Language of the Face.

The faculty of truth—that is, the love of it—is indicated by the muscles which surround the eye, causing folds and wrinkles. Justice is indicated by the muscles which cause perpendicular wrinkles between the eyebrows. Fullness and wrinkles under the eye, for which some persons are remarkable, indicate the love of mathematical accuracy; and curving upward from the lower angle of the eye and eyebrow indicate probity or personal truthfulness.

There are three degrees of the faculty of justice. The first is a kind of exactness or strict accuracy in small money matters, which some people would call closeness, and is indicated by a singular perpendicular wrinkle between the eyebrows. The second is a disposition to require justice in others, and is indicated by two perpendicular lines or wrinkles, one each side of the center—a very common sign. The third degree is conscientiousness, or the disposition to apply the rule of justice to one's self, and is indicated by three or more wrinkles, or lines, especially noticeable, extending above the eyebrow when the muscle is in action.—Phrenological Journal.

A Mile a Minute.

A world-record beating train is run daily over the New York Central from New York to Buffalo. The distance is 436 miles, and the run is made in eight hours, including stops, or practically a mile a minute. It is likely that other roads will follow suit on one limited train of lightning speed a day from New York and Philadelphia to Chicago. A movement is on foot there among eastern railroad managers to have only one fast train and to reduce the speed of all others. It is claimed that a saving of twenty per cent. can be made in passenger traffic by a reduction of the speedy trains, and the thing is to be tried.

The investiture of a clergyman with the rank of bishop in England is attended by some curious survivals of mediaeval mummery. When the Bishop of Peterborough was ordained recently he rapped his pastoral staff on the door of the church, and waved his hand, for the purpose of exorcising all evil spirits from the interior. Then when he entered the sacred edifice he was preceded by a chaplain bearing a crown, and marched up the broad aisle arrayed in an antique cape of white satin, elaborately and ornately trimmed. On his head he wore a mitre of white satin covered with red trimmings of silk braid.

Capt. E. M. Stevens is again on deck at the old stand, 228 J street, where he will be pleased to see his old friends and new patrons. Entire new stock.

Grand Entertainment

AT THE NEW PAVILION,

Wednesday, October 21st,

AND

PARADE IN THE EVENING

TO BE GIVEN IN HONOR OF THE Grand Encampment,

I. O. O. F.

Grand Vocal Concert. One Hundred Voices, under the leadership of Prof.

W. H. Kinross.

Competitive Drill of the California State Cantons, Patriarchs Militant, and Decoration of Chivalry.

CONCLUDING WITH A GRAND BALL.

ADMISSION, FIFTY CENTS.

UNCLE IKF,

THE DIAMOND BROKER

302 K Street, Sacramento.

G. W. Railton,

RAILROAD and STEAMSHIP AGENT

1004 FOURTH STREET.

Special Facilities for Passengers from Trans-Atlantic Points, by First-Class Steamers to and from ITALY, GERMANY, FRANCE and GREAT BRITAIN.

Through Car Service to and from CHICAGO Daily.

A. H. ROTT.

C. H. KREBS.

C. H. KREBS & CO.,
PAINTS, OILS, GLASS,

Varnishes, Wall Paper, Brushes, Window Shades and Picture Mouldings.

Ready Mixed Paints and Building Papers.

House and Sign Painting, Plain and Decorative Paper Hanging, Glazing and Gilding, Pictures, Frames and Mouldings.

626 J STREET,

Between Sixth and Seventh,

SACRAMENTO.

TELEPHONE 267.

L. B. MOHR.

C. A. YOERK.

MOHR & YOERK'S
MARKET AND PACKING HOUSE

1024 and 1026 J Street, Sacramento.

Dealers in Fresh and Salt Meats and all kinds of Sausages. On hand during the Packing Season: Spareribs, Tenderloins, Hogs' Heads, etc.

MRS. M. L. SWILLING,

FRENCH DRESSMAKER,

No. 1012 Eighth Street, between J and K,
SACRAMENTO.

Agents for Mrs. Graham's Face Bleach for Beautifying the Complexion.

THE COQUETTE.

A Very Neat, Stylish Shape, from $3.90 to $6.00, at Mrs. M. A. Pealer's, 619, 621, 623 J St.

Fine Table
Wines

From our Celebrated Orleans
Vineyard.

Producers of the
ECLIPSE
CHAMPAGNE,
530 Washington St.
SAN FRANCISCO.

SACRAMENTO

FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP,

FRONT AND N STREETS.

All kinds of Iron and Brass Castings, Gutenberg's Patent Ground Roller; all kinds of iron doors and gratings for sidewalks and awnings.

WM. GUTENBERGER, Proprietor.

The Spirit Bird.

There was one man, Tom Withers, on the Albatross, whom no one could understand. He walked apart from all, moody and silent and would speak to no one. One day we sighted a great sea-bird, and, although the men fired at it, it continued to follow the ship unharmed. This bird seemed to worry Withers exceedingly, and at last he turned to the captain and cried:

"You can never kill that bird. It is my father's spirit."

The captain thought him insane, and pressed him to explain.

There was no need of calling all hands, as we were all then standing in the waist of the ship, and at a signal from the mate we gathered around Withers, who thus commenced his tale:

My father was a respectable farmer in Vermont, and I his only son. But I was from my youth possessed of an ungovernable temper. When about 15 years of age, for some trifling offense, my father chastised me severely; it was then I took a solemn oath never to work on his farm again, and at some future day to be revenged; and fearfully have I kept that oath. I left my home and followed the sea. For eight years I was absent, and during that time had visited almost all parts of the habitable world. By this time my revengeful feelings had been softened down, and I wished once more to behold my parents, particularly my mother, who was always kind and indulgent. I accordingly returned to my native village. I saw my parents, and was reconciled to my father; I lived with them eight weeks, and nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of my visit until one fatal evening I accompanied my father to a husking frolic. The flowing bowl—accursed by its pernicious influence—passed freely around, and by midnight we all became somewhat merry. Indeed, my father, who had partaken too freely of the intoxicating draught, could with difficulty keep his feet, and I was obliged to support him on his way home, although my brain seemed on fire and I could hardly walk myself.

When about half-way home we came to a cross-road, which, my father insisted, was the right path. In vain I told him he was wrong. He would pursue the wrong path, and on my attempting to prevent him, he struck me a violent blow on the face. This roused the demon within me.

"Ha!" said I; "old man, a blow! You will find I am a boy no longer, to be abused by you!" And raising my arm, struck my poor, inebriated father a powerful blow, which felled him to the earth; and then the recollection of my former injuries unrevenged rushed into my mind. I caught up a stake from the fence, and struck him repeatedly over the head as he lay on the ground.

I took up the corpse in my arms, and wept bitterly over it for more than an hour. At length I felt the necessity of doing something in order to hide the traces of my guilt, and I laid the body among some rocks which were near the foot of a steep precipice, and then fled from the accursed spot; but still that awful voice pursued me and whispered: "He is your father!" Even the trees seemed to stretch forth their long arms to arrest my flight. Since that time I have never known comfort. I see my father in my dreams, and sometimes when I am awake he stands before me. Last night, while I sat upon the windlass, I fell into a doze, and saw him in the shape of a bird that flitted around us today, and he whispered in my ears: "Your time has come."

Such was the tale of blood told by the wretched Withers, and, although we all felt detestation at the unnatural crime he had committed, we could not help pitying the poor wretch.

While we were listening to the wretched man's confession, dark clouds arose above the horizon, and the appearance of the heavens betokened a heavy squall. Preparations were made accordingly. The flashes of lightning were frequent and vivid, and the deep-toned thunder uttered fearfully in the distance. Soon a ripple was seen on the water, followed by a ridge of miniature waves, breaking as soon as formed, presenting the appearance of a moving sheet of foam.

"Now, mind your helm, my lad," said the captain to the helmsman, who had relieved Withers. "Keep her right before it."

"Aye, aye, sir," responded the man at the helm, and in a few moments the storm struck the vessel on the starboard quarter.

The ship flew before the wind, which blew with the violence of a hurricane, at the rate of ten knots. The rain fell in torrents, and what, with the roaring of the waves, the howling and whistling of the tempest, the dazzling flashes of lightning which seemed to play around the masts, and the echoing peals of thunder, the scene was absolutely terrific.

The thrilling tale told by the self-accused parricide was for a while forgotten; but suddenly a strange and awful voice was heard, which sounded louder than the conflict of the elements, as if entered by the spirit of the storm.

"My poor, murdered father calls me! I come! I come!" Then with a wild and prolonged shriek of agony, which even now rings in my ears, the mauiac Withers sprang on the bow, and ere any one could prevent him, precipitated himself into the seething ocean. No human effort could save him. He arose in the eddying wake, and with his body half out of water, with agony of the most intense description depicted on his ghastly features, he gave another shrill and dying shriek—then sank to rise no more.

The Women of Romance.

In one of the stories of that gentle dreamer, Theophile Gautier, writes Theodore Child in Harper's Bazar, the hero is represented as being irresistibly attracted to the radiant types of buried ages. Semiramis, Cleopatra, Helen of Troy, peopled the palaces of his retrospective ideal with visions of beauty free from the prosaic and ridiculous details of reality. One day this hero, whom the poet calls Octavien, visits the museum of Naples, where he is fascinated by that strange and touching imprint of a woman's breast found at Pompeii, in the cellar of the villa of Arrins Diomedes, together with seventeen other skeletons. Inspired with vague feelings of regret and even tenderer emotion, the young man muses over the horror of the hot ashes of Vesuvius that destroyed this fair creature twenty centuries ago. Absorbed in these meditations he visits Pompeii, passes the night in the ruins, and in the hallucinations of his overexcited brain sees the town restored and the streets full of people.

The phantoms of the past people infinity. Paris continues to carry off Helen in an unknown region of space. Theodora rules an empire and her husband. The galley of Cleopatra swells its silken sails on the blue waters of an ideal Cydnus. And as Faust ravished the daughter of Tyndarus from the mysterious depths of Hades, and hid her away for worship in the secret alcoves of his Gothic stronghold, so have certain passionate and puissant minds been able to bring back to themselves ages that were apparently past, and to resuscitate personages that were, as all believed, dead. And yet why should we seek to narrow our horizon by dividing ages into dead or living, ancient or modern? Of the centuries that are past we can count scarcely fifty. In our individual lives we have but just time enough to wail, to blink at the sun, and to ask what it all means. Life alone exists, and that which is living is alone true and eternally modern, to whatever epoch it may belong. It is the province of art to affirm life. It is thanks to art that the Greek Helen is almost our contemporary.

Some have spoken evil of women; others, the majority, have eulogized them even to hyperbole; others, still, have remained dazzled by the complex mystery of femininity; some few, in the depths of their despair of ever comprehending the enigma, have declared that woman is not the female of man, but some strange daughter of Lilith, a creature of another race.

The beauty of woman, the pessimists will tell us, is one of the many pitfalls and tricks invented by ironical nature in order to ensnare men, and perpetuate that undesirable and undelightful interruption of nirvana which is called life. Be that as it may, feminine beauty is a phenomenon which has always been of absorbing interest since the world began. La beauté vaut la vertu ("beauty is as good as virtue") a modern thinker has said in a volume of grave historical speculations, and the philosopher's paradox is confirmed in a sense by the instinctive memory of humanity.

History does not forget those women who have been notorious for their virtue, but it remembers with indulgence the women whose beauty was more notorious than their virtue. The gentleness of Ruth is contrasted in our memories with the tragic heroism of Judith; Martha and the repentant Magdalene are held in equal honor in the Pantheon of virtue; but Herodias and Salome are remembered for their grace as well as for their cruelty. We cannot speak of the glorious days of Greece without mentioning Phryne and Aspasia. We delight in the domestic and original purity of Nausikae; but who shall dare to arraign Helen, and to condemn her mysterious and enchanting memory at the bar of austere morality?

Hereafter what shall it profit the good young man to go into battle with a Bible in his pocket for a breast plate, as in the days that were? The new style of gun, with a capacity of sending a bullet through two men and killing a third if he happens to be standing in the way, would not be content to pierce a Bible as far as the Book of Proverbs and then stop—for the purpose of pointing a moral and adorning a tale. Bibles for good young soldiers must hereafter have chilled steel covers and American tin leaves if they are to stand the racket.

HOWE'S

High School and Normal Institute

SIXTH STREET, BET. J AND K,
SACRAMENTO.

Its course of instruction is thorough, and its methods of teaching systematic and ORIGINAL. Those who desire a THOROUGH education, and especially those who expect to make teaching a profession, are cordially invited to examine for themselves its methods of instruction. Its doors are always open; there are no vacations.

DON'T BE CARELESS ABOUT YOUR COMPLEXION

It is woman's chiefest physical charm. It is often her only capital. It is always worth a great deal to her in business, love or social affairs. No matter how browned, or rough or sallow your skin may be, or how much it is disfigured with freckles, moth-patches, blackheads or pimples will remove every blemish and leave your skin as pure and clear and white as it was in baby days. Your complexion will then be as nature made it. Instructions go with each bottle how to keep it so. Price $1.50. All druggists sell it.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

FACE BLEACH

CELEBRATED

WEINER LAGER BEER

CAPITAL BREWERY

LOUIS NICOLAUS,

Corner Twelfth and I Streets

SACRAMENTO.

J. SLAUGHTER,

Lathing, Plastering, Whitening,
Wall Coloring, House Cleaning, Fire Wall
Cementing.

Cess Pools and Water Closets Renovated.

Any one needing any of the above work done in a prompt and workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms, need not call on any other party than
J. SLAUGHTER,
Sixth and M streets.
Telephone 318.

CHANGED HANDS.

SACRAMENTO EXCHANGE

(Formerly Wm. Gamble's.)

1012 SEVENTH STREET.

Fine Wines. All the celebrated brands of Liquors
and Cigars. ROBERT ALLEN,
Formerly of Agricultural Park.

J. FRANK CLARK,

UNDERTAKING PARLORS

1017 and 1019 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

EMBALMING A SPECIALTY.

GEO. H. CLARK, Funeral Director and County
Coroner. Telephone 134.

RHOADS & TOWNSEND HOUSE

On European Plan.

Cor. Second and J Streets, Sacramento.

ARTHUR MILLER, PROPRIETOR.

J. H. CAMPBELL,

No. 1025 Fourth Street, Sacramento.

Cesspools and Vaults

CLEANED, BUILT AND REPAIRED.

SEWER PIPE PROPERLY LAID.

ORDERS SOLICITED.

R. DAVIS,

NOTARY PUBLIC,

Real Estate and Insurance Agent.

Representing the following companies:

Manchester of England; Caledonian of Edinburgh,
Scotland; London and Lancaster, England.

1002 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

Weinstock, Rubin & Co.

LARGEST GENERAL RETAIL
HOUSE ON PACIFIC COAST

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING AND

HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND
SAMPLES MAILED FREE TO
OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS.

400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412 K Street

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

W. R. STRONG CO.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN

Fruit and Produce

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Gregory Bros. Co

Established 1852.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Packers and Shippers of California
Fruit and Produce,

126 and 128 J STREET,

San Francisco Office, 313 Davis St.

SACRAMENTO.

Waterhouse & Lester

DEALERS IN

IRON, STEEL, CUMBERLAND COAL,

Wagon Lumber and Carriage Hardware,

SACRAMENTO.

PACIFIC HOTEL,

Corner Fifth and K Streets, - Sacramento.

MEALS, 25 CENTS.

Centrally Located. Convenient to all Places of Amusement.

C. F. SINGLETON, - Proprietor.

Gruhler's Saloon

No. 522 THE PIONEER J Street.

A Resort for Gentlemen. Frequented only by Gentlemen.

ELEGANT READING-ROOM ATTACHED.

With all the LEADING PAPERS Constantly on File.

CHOICEST VIANDS,

Dispeused by urbane and competent attendants.

PRINTING

D. JOHNSTON & Co.
410 J STREET.

ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY PROMPTLY FILLED

Agent for the Celebrated W. J. LEMP'S ST. LOUIS LAGER BEER

WISEMANN'S SALOON,

Klebetz & Green's Old Stand,

1020 FOURTH ST., BET. J AND K, SACRAMENTO.

GEO. WISEMANN, PROPRIETOR.

Families and Saloons supplied by bottle or keg.

BOHEMIA PILSNER,

BAVARIA HERSBRUCKER.

B. Ruhl

Bookbinder, Paper Ruler and
Blank Book Manufacturer.

Periodicals, Magazines, Music, and all kinds of Binding neatly done at the lowest prices.

No. 409 J STREET,

SACRAMENTO.

CONSTANCE DUFOUR.

Somewhere—a little below the momentous line dividing north from south—there lies a city, and to it belongs a quaint old fort, which interposes itself between some of the streets and the river.

A small garrison is still kept there, but it can no longer afford protection to the city, and there is some talk of turning the place into a public park. I, at least shall shed tears when that happens, for it is a dear old place, with its piles of cannon balls and dismounted guns, its deep slopes of grass-grown earthworks, its sunshine and shadow. It in nowise brings thoughts of war to mind, but only "ways of pleasantness and peace."

You enter through a deep stone arch, leaving the dusty, noisy street behind you, and there is a sentry pacing slowly back and forth, who salutes, but makes no attempt to stop your progress. On the other side of the arch, stretching out before you, is a white shell road leading to the barracks and officers' quarters; on either side level sweeps of green, the drill grounds; and then, looking away to the left, is the river sparkling in the sunshine as it broadens out to meet the bay.

You may walk all around the fort on the "sea wall," as it is called, and listen to the lapping and washing of the water against the stones.

At one place is a little wharf with a rickety ladder, and a boat continually bumping against the posts.

Back of the officers' cottages are the stable and an empty field, and further on a graveyard—the last resting place of friendless soldiers who have died at the fort.

The whole place exercised a great charm over me, and whenever I had a day to spare I would go there to sketch and dream. It was thus that I came to know the sergeant's daughter. The first time I saw her was on a breezy afternoon in early spring. She was leaning on a cannon, her figure darkly outlined against the blue water beyond, and her hand raised above her head, waving a blue handkerchief in farewell to a boat full of sailors who were rowing down the river. There was an officer in the stern, who stood up and raised his hat to her. Instantly the oars went up in the salute, their wet blades flashing in the sunlight.

The whole made such a pretty picture that I wanted to see the chief figure in it closer; and presently, when the boat was out of sight, she came toward me. She had black hair, gray eyes, that looked rather fearful just now, and a sweet little mouth, without much character in it—an extremely pretty face, wistful in expression and of Irish type.

She asked to see what I was painting, and from this we talked on, till I soon knew all her history.

Her name was Constance Dufour. Her father was a sergeant, very old now and soon to be retired. He was a Frenchman, and her mother had been Irish.

"My mother died so long ago I don't remember her," she said, "but father loved me enough for two. He's coming now," she added, and ran to lead him to me with much pride.

He was a little, old man, very gray, but still active in his motions, and every inch a Frenchman and a soldier. He reminded me of a drawing by Detaille.

Although his daughter was quite as tall as himself, he spoke of her as "petite Con," and while he talked he gave her hand little caressing pats, that spoke eloquently of his love for her.

From that evening we three became great friends. Whenever I came to the fort Con was watching for me, and off we would go together—I to paint and she to lie on the grass watching, or else, with her hands under her head, gazing up into the blue sky—dreaming.

She was a curious girl, with little or no education, and yet a power of imagination that was astonishing. Nearly all her time was spent in a dream world of her own.

"When I was little," she said, "I always wanted to be a princess, and even now, when I'm lonesome, I tell myself long stories about what I'll do when I get my kingdom."

"But, Con," I said, "a fairy story has a prince in it. Haven't you got one, too?"

"Indeed, madam, I have," she said quite simply, "only he's gone away, and it'll be six months before I see him again. He went off in the boat that afternoon I first saw you. He's a lieutenant on a man-of-war, and when he comes back we're going to be married."

Fortunately she was looking away and did not see the look of quick surprise I gave her.

A lieutenant in the navy, no doubt of good family, and a sergeant's daughter—poor little Con!

"And his name?" I asked.

"Henry Warwick, madam. He came here just to see the captain on business, and since then he comes—for love of me. He is on shore duty now for a year, and after he has seen his people, beyond in the north, he's coming back to marry me. He is such a handsome gentleman, and I shall be a real princess, after all."

She was so sure of him, so happy, that I had not the heart to raise a doubt.

I soon found that the little old sergeant knew nothing of this love affair, and that there was also another element in the little romance.

It seemed that Con's gray eyes had been working havoc with the affections of a certain young ship carpenter who worked in a yard below the fort. I am not certain, but I think his name was Jack.

The sergeant evidently favored his attentions, for on several occasions he brought Jack up with him and requested Con to show him around the grounds.

She always started immediately, but with a business-like air that argued ill for any sentimental conversation poor Jack might be contemplating.

One day, the sergeant being absent, Jack came by himself and carried Con off. In a little while I was surprised to see him return without her, and take his stand directly before me. There was evidently something on his mind, and yet he did not know how to say it.

I waited patiently, and finally he came to the point with startling abruptness and evident confidence in my full knowledge of the situation.

"She talks a lot to you," he said. "Is there any other fellow?"

I was aware, of course, that there was another fellow, but I thought it just as well, perhaps, to keep the knowledge to myself.

"I suppose you mean Constance," I said. "You should ask her."

"I have asked her," he cried, excitedly. "I've asked her to marry me—I've asked her to love me—and she just opens them eyes of her'n wide and laughs at me. Nother wian'd hate her for it, but I'm that durn big a fool I'd love her if she killed me. Why, there ain't no wian who can love her as I do—"

"Cepting her father, boy—'cepting her father."

It was the little sergeant, who had come up quietly while Jack was talking; so I gladly left him the task of comforter.

At the gate Con was waiting for me to say good-by; but I was so provoked with her that I pretended not to see the little outstretched hand, and couldn't resist saying:

"Jack is worth six of your five lieutenants, Con. You're a fool not to marry him."

Really, I was the fool—to expect a girl to love the man she ought to. Con was only following the law of nature—or what seemed to be

For nearly two months circumstances prevented my going to the fort; when, one day, I was exceedingly surprised to receive a visit from the sergeant.

When he came in he seemed to be struggling between intense excitement and a desire to retain military composure.

He stopped just inside the door and saluted.

"Madam," he said, "I have come to take Constance home with me."

I looked at him in blank amazement.

"Constance!" I repeated; "she isn't here. I haven't seen her."

My words seemed to take all the strength away from him, and he dropped into a chair. "Mon Dieu! madam," he cried appealingly, "don't say that again; she must be with you."

"I assure you I am telling the truth, sergeant. But what has happened?"

"What has happened? Alas! ma petite Con has left me. It happened thus, madam: Three days ago I called to her in the morning. She did not answer. I knocked at her door. Still no answer. I went into the room. She was not there."

"Everywhere I searched for her. The men who had been on duty at the gate in the early morning said that about an hour before sunrise she went out and walked toward the city. That is all the clew I have to find her, for she hasn't any friends outside the fort. I went to Jack, but he had seen nothing of her."

"He loves her, madam, yet he says hard things of my little girl. Things that I have ordered him out of my sight for saying," the old man added proudly.

"Then, madam, I thought of you. Perhaps Con had got tired of the fort, and her father, who's dull company at best, and had run away to pay you a visit for a little holiday. It has taken me three days to find you, madam. It wasn't dutiful of her to leave me without a word."

Then he suddenly remembered that he had not yet found her, and he got up with a groan.

"Wait," I said. "What are you going to do now?" Has she no relatives she might have gone to?"

He looked at me sadly and shook his head. The tears were running down his cheeks, and he seemed incapable of speaking. He evidently knew nothing of Con's love affair, but I began to have a grave suspicion that the brave lieutenant was at the bottom of the mystery.

After a moment he took a newspaper from his pocket and laid it on the table.

"I found that on her bed," said I. "I noticed it because Con's not much at reading."

The paper was a week old, and one of the marriage notices had been cut out. I knew it was the notice that had been wanted, because the reverse of the column was the middle of a political article. I made the sergeant sit down and take a glass of wine while I sent for another copy of the paper. He waited in patient silence, his eyes fixed on his cap, which he held tightly clasped, and his hands pressed between his knees. After waiting an eternity—as it seemed—the paper came, and there was the notice, just what I had feared, yet expected to see:

"WARWICK-WILBURN—On Tuesday, July 15, at Rochester, by Rev. Dr. Colton, Henry Warwick, U. S. N., to Catharine Merritt Wilburn."

Poor little Con had seen that notice, and gone at once to find out if it were true. I knew from my talks with her that her ideas of places and distances were of the vaguest, and that she was capable of starting on her quest for the lieutenant with nothing but her love to guide her.

All that I knew and all that I guessed I had to tell the sergeant. It was no easy task. It was very difficult to make him believe that his little Con had had a sweetheart and never told him. When he did, he wanted to go at once to send a challenge to the lieutenant. Then he remembered it was more important to find Con, and he sat down again, feeble and heartbroken.

At last I made him go back to the fort, and promised at once to get detectives to look for his daughter.

We hunted for weeks without finding her, and in the end she came back herself, and as quietly and mysteriously as she had disappeared.

Her father found her ghost, as he thought at first, stretched across the doorway of his quarters one evening.

She was burning with fever and out of her mind. No one could find out where she had been or what she had done. Although she talked incessantly, it was all about beautiful dresses and a prince.

"Such a handsome prince," she would cry, with shining eyes, "and he is going to marry me—to make me a princess—and then I shall have my kingdom."

Poor little Con! In the cheerless light of daybreak she went to inherit her kingdom—the kingdom of heaven.

It is November now, and the leaves are beginning to fall on Con's grave. I went to the fort to day for a little talk with the sergeant. All his brisk little movements are gone, and he seems twice as old as when I first saw him. Even his military air has vanished, though occasionally he makes an effort to straighten up and salute.

He lives with Jack. Jack is very good to him, but every day the old man comes back to the fort and sits basking in the sunshine, for we are far enough south to have plenty of warm days, even in November. Con is not dead to him; she is always with him, a living presence that he talks to by the hour—his little girl whom he loved and lived for—"Ma pauvre petite," he fondly murmurs.

The Story of "The Bells."

It was in the winter of 1849 that a young lawyer, who had recently been admitted to the bar in Baltimore, was sitting late one evening before his cheerful fire in his office indulging in a reverie, when he was suddenly aroused from dreamland by a loud knock at his front door. The lawyer arose and went to the door. As he opened it and looked out he observed a gentleman wildly gesticulating, who appeared to be talking to himself. "Did you knock?" inquired the lawyer.

"Yes, sir," was the reply, in a pleasant tone, "and I trust you will pardon me for disturbing you at so late an hour. I should not have done so had not some thoughts come to me as I was passing along which I very much desired to put upon paper. Seeing your light, I ventured to obtain permission to enter your office, where I might, through your kindness, be allowed some paper on which to jot them down."

"Certainly; you are quite at liberty to walk in and make yourself at home," said the lawyer.

The stranger followed, and the lawyer, placing some writing material at his disposal, at the same time offering him a seat at the table, remarked that, if he would not deem it impolite, he would retire to his private apartment for the night, since, being a bachelor, he kept bachelor's quarters adjoining. "But you are very welcome to remain as long as you want to," added the lawyer, and bade him good night.

Early next morning the lawyer awoke, and his first thought being of the stranger, he hastily dressed himself and opened the door which led to his office. There, to his great astonishment, he beheld his guest of the previous night, still sitting where he had left him hours before, his head resting on the table, and he fast asleep. But the slight noise awakened the stranger, who, quickly rising, apologized most profusely for remaining so long, remarking that, being exceedingly fatigued the night before, he had unintentionally fallen asleep. His friend would pardon him, perhaps; and extending his hand toward the lawyer, he turned to go. "But you have neglected to take your manuscript," said the lawyer, stepping forward to the table and taking up several sheets of paper covered with the most beautiful chirography.

"Oh, no, sir," replied the stranger, smiling; "I have left that for you in token of your great kindness to me. I have a copy of what I have written. Good morning."

The lawyer examined the manuscript and found it to be a lyric of captivating beauty entitled simply "The Bells." But his surprise was deepened when, at the end of the singular poem, he read the author's name—Edgar Allan Poe!

Poe was at this time on his way from Richmond to Philadelphia, where his wedding was soon to take place, and while stopping in Baltimore he fell into the company of convivial spirits, which resulted in his indulging in a terrible and prolonged debauch. Recovering from his spree, with nerves unstrung, the pangs of remorse fixed upon his conscience, and the thought of his lady love haunting him, this weird, beautiful inspiration came to him; and the following stanzas are the original poem as written on that occasion, he having subsequently changed and added to it:

The bells! hear the bells!
The merry wedding bells!
How fairy-like a melody that swells
From the silvery tinkling cells
Of the bells—bells—bells!
Of the bells!

The bells! oh, the bells!
The heavy iron bells!
Hear the tolling of the bells!
Hear the knells!
How horrible a melody there floats
From their throats—
From their deep-toned throats!
How I shudder at the notes
From the melancholy throats
Of the bells—bells—bells!
Of the bells!

—Raphael S. Payne.

Attorneys at Law.

A. L. HART, Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J streets.

JOHNSON, JOHNSON & JOHNSON, 504 J street

CHAS. T. JONES, 607 I street, between Sixth and Seventh.

CHAS. N. POST, 627 J street, Rooms 3 and 4

R. M. CLARKEN, southwest corner Fourth and J streets.

MATT. F. JOHNSON, 607 I street.

A. ANDERSON, No. 209 J street.

JAMES B. DEVINE, 604 I street.

W. A. GETT, JR., Bryte Building, corner Seventh and J streets.

HOLL & DUNN, Fifth Street, between I and J.

C. W. BAKER, Northeast corner Fourth and J Sts.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Rooms Nos. 5, 7 and 9, Postoffice Building.

GEORGE A. BLANCHARD, 405 J Street, up stairs.

J. W. HUGHES, Sutter Building, corner Fifth and J.

McKUNE & GEORGE, Northeast corner Fourth and J Streets.

ROBT. T. DEVLIN, Southwest corner Fourth and J Street.

CHAS. H. OATMAN, No. 418 J Street, up stairs.

J. W. ARMSTRONG, No. 405 J street, up stairs.

GEORGE G. DAVIS, Room 26 Postoffice Building.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, 920 Fifth Street, Sacramento.

H. L. BUCKLEY, Court House. Practices in all Courts of the State.

E. C. HART (City Attorney). Practices in all the Courts of the State. Office, up-stairs in City Hall, Front and I streets.

ISAAC JOSEPH, N.W. corner Sixth and K streets.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—TAKE Notice.—That on the 30th day of October, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 1811 to 1821, inclusive. The nature of the business to be conducted by me is keeping a dairy and selling milk; the place of my said business is Sacramento County, Sutter Township, and the name of my husband is J. L. Clark. KATIE E. CLARK.

se26-5t

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO, State of California.—In the matter of the Columbus Brewing Company, a corporation, an insolvent debtor. An adjudication of insolvency herein having been duly made, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the 23d day of October, 1891, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., at the court-room of this Court, in Department No. 1, in the city of Sacramento, be and the same are the time and place appointed for the meeting of the creditors to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the city of Sacramento, at least once a week during the period prior to the time appointed for the meeting of creditors.

A. P. CATLIN,

Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated this 17th day of September, 1891.

A. J. & ELWOOD BRUNER, Attorneys for Petitioners.

MRS. CLEVELAND'S BABY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 3.—"Baby girl born a little after midnight; large, healthy and strong, and perfect in every respect. Mother and child doing remarkably well. G. C."

The hand that penned the above message had oftentimes written of affairs that had attracted the attention of the world; but the world at large will read the latest message from Grover Cleveland with as much interest as they did some of his most formidable documents of state. Ever since the Cleverlands returned home from Buzzard Bay, on September 22, the newspaper reporters have been calling at their residence, No. 816 Madison avenue, daily and nightly, and inquiring after the health of the family. The ex-President smiled at these extra attentions from the press, and Mrs. Cleveland sent them many kindly messages. But it was believed there was news to be had at the house, and the reporters hung around like Mary's little lamb, and exhibited Job-like patience. They were at last rewarded. It was in answer to the journalists that the ex-President, who was at his wife's bedside, penned the message noted above.

Five or ten minutes after midnight this morning—the doorkeeper, who gave out the information, thought it was just 12:06—Mrs. Grover Cleveland, wife of the ex-President, gave birth to a girl baby. The event occurred on the second floor of their residence, No. 816 Madison avenue, and the reporters who were awaiting news of such an event at the time got no news of it at all. The news did not get out, indeed, until noon to-day.

The Cleveland house was besieged by a flock of inquirers this afternoon. The doorkeeper hadn't much to tell. "All there is," he said, "is that Mrs. Cleveland gave birth to a daughter about six minutes after midnight this morning."

Dr. Joseph D. Bryant, of No. 54 west Thirty-sixth street, attended her, and the only other person who was present was her mother, Mrs. Perrine Folsom, who said: "I think they said the baby weighed eight pounds, but I'm not sure. Both Mrs. Cleveland and the child are doing well."

To a reporter Mr. Cleveland said: "Yes, it is true. My wife was safely delivered of a little girl this morning at six minutes past midnight, and both the mother and the child are doing splendidly. Mrs. Cleveland has rested quietly all day. The child is strong and healthy, and at its birth weighed eight pounds."

Mr. Cleveland was uncertain whether his wife and child would remain in the city, but he thought that a change of air might do both good. He acted as if he were greatly pleased, and said that it was too early yet to talk about the christening and that sort of thing. He said he had received dispatches of congratulation from his sister, his wife's relatives and many of his personal friends.

The father don't want to brag, but the ex-President is quoted as saying: "I don't want to brag any, but this baby now is as stout and as good as most babies are when they are three or four days old."

Grover Cleveland and Frances Folsom were married in the blue room of the White House on Wednesday, June 2, 1886. Public interest in the event had been heightened by attempts to keep the engagement and the preparations for the marriage secret until almost the last moment. Rumors that the President was about to wed got into the newspapers early in the year, and the speculation that followed as to the identity of the bride settled down a month or so before the wedding into a conviction that she was the daughter of the President's deceased friend and law partner, Oscar Folsom.

Miss Folsom had known Mr. Cleveland from her babyhood up. He was a constant visitor at her father's house in Buffalo until 1875, when, Mr. Folsom having died, the family removed to Medina, N. Y. They returned to Buffalo later, in order that Miss Folsom might attend Mme. Brecher's school there.

While the country was discussing the approaching marriage and the identity of the bride, Miss Folsom was in Europe with her mother and her cousin, Ben Folsom. Every effort was made to keep her return secret. When the party embarked on the steamship Noordland, at Antwerp, no announcement of the fact was made in the newspapers here.

The Folsoms went to the Gilsey House, and President Cleveland, who came to New York to review the Decoration Day parade and to meet his bride, first saw her at the hotel on the Sunday after her arrival. He returned to Washington on Monday night, and the next evening Miss Folsom and her companions followed.

The wedding took place on Wednesday evening in the presence of a few close friends of the bride and groom and the members of the Cabinet and their families, except Attorney-General Garland, whose aversion to social functions of any kind kept him away.

Mr. Cleveland was the only President who had married in the White House, and Mrs. Cleveland, in her 23d year, was the youngest lady of the White House who had presided as a President's wife. She became at once immensely popular.

W. D. Comstock, 501--507 K, Cor. Fifth
FURNITURE and BEDDING.

On Exhibition, THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK

FAIR DEALING!

LOW PRICES!

W. J. HASSETT.

D. JOHNSTON.

D. JOHNSTON & CO.,

Book and Job Printers,

410 J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

S. A. WOLFE,

Photographic Art Parlors

426½ J Street, Sacramento.

SADDLE ROCK

Restaurant and Oyster House

1019 SECOND STREET,

Between J and K, SACRAMENTO.

First-class in every respect. Ladies' Dining-room separate. Open day and night.

BUCKMAN & CARRAGHER, Proprietors.

DAVE'S.

1022 FOURTH STREET.

Next door to Postoffice,

SACRAMENTO

EBNER BROS.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in

Wines and Liquors.

CALIFORNIA WINES and BRANDIES.

116 and 118 K Street, bet. Front and Second,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

JOHN D. SHEARER & SON
CONTRACTORS.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks

Latest Designs and First-class Work.

Estimates Furnished for Residences.

Wood or Iron Foundations.

Southern Pacific Company

PACIFIC SYSTEM.

October 1, 1891.

Trains LEAVE and are due to ARRIVE at
SACRAMENTO.

Lv.	Trains Run Daily.	Arr.
6.50 A	Calistoga and Napa	11.00 A
3.05 P	Calistoga and Napa	8.40 P
12.50 A	Ashland and Portland via Chico	4.00 A
4.30 P	Deming, El Paso and East	7.00 P
7.35 P	Knight's Landing and Oroville	7.40 A
10.50 A	Los Angeles and Mojave	9.35 A
11.50 A	Second Class Ogden and East	2.25 A
11.00 P	Central Atlantic Express	5.25 A
3.00 P	Oroville	10.30 A
3.00 P	Red Bluff via Marysville	10.30 A
10.35 A	Redding via Willows	4.00 P
2.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.25 A
4.35 A	San Francisco via Benicia	12.30 A
6.50 A	San Francisco via Benicia	11.05 A
5.40 A	San Francisco via Benicia	10.40 P
3.05 P	San Francisco via Benicia	8.40 P
*10.00 A	San Francisco via Steamer	26.00 A
10.50 A	San Francisco via Livermore	2.50 P
10.50 A	San Jose	2.50 P
4.30 P	Santa Barbara	9.35 A
6.50 A	Santa Rosa	11.05 A
3.05 P	Santa Rosa	8.40 P
8.50 A	Stockton and Galt	7.00 P
4.30 P	Stockton and Galt	9.35 A
11.50 A	Truckee and Reno	2.25 A
11.00 P	Truckee and Reno	5.25 A
6.30 P	Colfax and Way Stations	2.30 P
6.50 A	Vallejo	8.40 P
3.05 P	Vallejo	2.40 P
*8.20 A	Folsom and Placerville	*10.20 A
*12.15 P	Folsom and Placerville	*8.00 A
*4.45 P	Folsom

*Sunday excepted. †Sunday only. ‡Monday excepted. A for morning. P for afternoon.
RICHARD GRAY, Gen. Traffic Manager
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

California State Bank

DOES A GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

DRAW EXCHANGE ON ALL THE PRINCIPAL CITIES
OF THE WORLD.

OFFICERS:

PRESIDENT.....N. D. RIDGOUT
VICE-PRESIDENT.....FRED'K COX
CASHIER.....A. ABBOTT
ASSISTANT CASHIER.....W. E. GERBER

DIRECTORS:

C. W. Clarke, Jos. Steffens, N. D. Ridgout,
Geo. C. Perkins, J. K. Watson, Frederick Cox,
W. E. Gerber.

People's Savings Bank

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

CAPITAL STOCK PAID UP - - - - $225,500 00
RESERVE AND SURPLUS, - - - - 54,253 26

Term and Ordinary Deposits Received.
Dividends Paid Semi-annually.

Money Loaned on Real Estate Only.

WM. BECKMAN, President.

GEO. W. LORENZ, Cashier.

BAKER & HAMILTON,

San Francisco and Sacramento,

Importers and Jobbers of

Hardware, Iron, Steel, Coal, Powder,

MACHINERY

And Agricultural Implements.

Send for Catalogue.

THE PASTEUR
GERM-PROOF FILTER COMPANY

WHY DRINK IMPURE WATER, WHEN FOR
a trifling amount expended in the purchase of one of our various styles and sizes of Filters you can obtain an abundance of

Pure Wholesome Water

Every person who has a

PASTEUR FILTER

Placed in his residence has

A Living Spring of Sparkling Water.

Filters placed on trial, and satisfaction guaranteed
in every case before sale is closed.

F. M. EGAN, - - Manager.

OFFICE AND SALESROOM:

408 J Street, - - Sacramento, Cal.

JOHN MCGILLIVRAY,

CONTRACTOR.

Artificial Stone Sidewalks.

2321 G Street, Sacramento, Cal.

THE NEWS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1891.

No. 36.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Prosperity doth bewitch man, seeming clear;
As seas do laugh, show white, when rocks are near.

So it was written with much of truth. To instance: There has been kept standing in the editorial column of our evening contemporary, the News, the following bewitching paragraph:

Within six years the bonded debt of Sacramento, or so much thereof as shall be due at that time, will be liquidated. The remaining bonds will be easily provided for, and Sacramento's credit will be considered gilt-edged by the bankers of the world. The revenue of the city will be ample to meet all contingencies, and there will be no difficulty in issuing bonds to complete all needed public works. Capitalists are beginning to realize this, and are looking here for investments. Our people are awakening to the fact, and the price of real estate is steadily advancing. Prosperity stares us in the face.

It would be extremely unfair if we should call upon the editor of the News to furnish reasonable data to back this broad declaration. We have been in a position to observe the unpardonable mismanagement of the city indebtedness; have felt, as have other taxpayers, the outrageous tributes that have been levied; have heard the promise years ago, from the same general quarter, that there would come to the inhabitants of unfortunate Sacramento the olive branch of hope. The dove, however, has been extremely tardy; perhaps has found no olive tree within a reasonable distance from us. There has been criticism from some that this journal does not join the shouting brigade and aid the masquerade; and that we will not misrepresent facts that are patent to the financial world concerning the situation of this city. This statement that the bonded indebtedness of Sacramento will be paid off in six years is absolutely absurd, if we are to judge anything by what has been accomplished in the past. In November, 1883, we had occasion to investigate this matter, and so far as we could ascertain the then par value of the outstanding bonds was $1,540,100, of which $479,200 worth were the property of the city, having been purchased by the funded debt commissioners. These figures have no relation to the interest. It should be recollected the bonds purchased by the commission at the first were at a depreciated value, and represented by no means the expenditure of the sum named. At that time we did charge that a scheme had been formed to give life to paper then esteemed about worthless, and that persons in Sacramento were concerned in it. Time has passed; then it was Mr. Bates was an attorney for the city in the bond suits; he shows up rather differently now. Curious it would be to attempt to balance the books at this time; compare the footings with those of 1883, and reason out to our own simple minds how this incubus will be wiped out in six years. Our contemporary states that the revenue of the city will be ample to meet all contingencies. In the name of heaven what more in revenue will be demanded from us. Now it is 55 per cent. of the direct municipal taxes go into the bond fund; 55 per cent. gross of the water rates fall there; license and fine collections bear a large share of the burden.

And "Prosperity stares us in the face!" While not particularly acquainted with prosperity, we are not disposed to be surprised it does stare. Were it a man garbed in a suit he had worn for thirty years, and a mendicant, should approach us and say, "While I appear rocky; while I make no pretense to keep up with the times; while I permit myself to be hoodwinked, and have a financial black eye, it is all right; invest your means with me and it will be all right," we would stare him in the face and feel that under like circumstances prosperity is justified in staring at Sacramento. We are not aware there are any particular number of capitalists that will be liable to break their necks in a wild rush to make investments here. We are not disposed to dispute the proposition that if tribute enough is levied an unlimited amount of money can be raised. It would, however, tax the ingenuity of man to conceive a more perfect scheme of extortion than the inhabitants of this city now suffer. Nothing does escape. Let us instance: A man possesses a noble steed; the animal is taxed on his worth and for the very water he drinks—the appalling 55 per cent. may be said to be branded upon his hip. The patient cow brought here to manufacture milk (and about the most important manufactory we have) is in the same boat, and it is her owner must even pay 55 per cent. of the gross cost of the water she needs to maintain her life and to run her milk manufactory for the liquidation of the city debt. Then, there is the hen, that will do that which man would not—set in a constrained position for weeks to incubate the eggs perhaps of another, when her mission is ended and her brood grows to arrogant young chickenhood, they are rated upon the assessment roll, and the 55 per cent. goes to wipe out the city debt in the mythical six years. The unfortunate inebriate is not excepted; when he takes a drink he helps to pay the liquor license of the saloon man; if he becomes so drunk and disorderly that he is arrested and fined, he gets a second dose, 55 per cent. of his fine going into the hands of the bondholders. Then there is the dog. Be it the pampered pet of wealth or the humble follower of the beggar, its owner must buy a tag, the price of which is governed by the accident of the dog's sex. Its non-payment subjects the dog to the indignity of an arrest by the pound master, to the humiliation of being carted through the streets of this fair city in a cage, and to a death of ignominy. Death even does not relieve the animal from the iniquitous 55 per cent. Its remains are denied sepulture; its skin is sent to the glove factory and the very grease is tried from its body that merchandise may be produced that will add to the 55 per cent. We are aware of no object in Sacramento, animate or inanimate, that does not contribute to this 55 per cent. except the air, the Thomas Cats and Prosperity. There is a grave oversight that the air and the cats have been exempted, for they are really among us. If prosperity came within speaking distance, we doubt not it would be taxed 55 per cent. for its quizzical stare.

These exactions
Whereof my sovereign would have note, they are Most pestilent to the hearing; and to bear 'em
The back is sacrifice to the load.

There is a remarkable solicitude always manifested in behalf of the bondholders by the head of the funded debt commission. At all times every effort is made to exact the utmost dollar from the taxpayer in their interest. Every plan or suggestion to loosen the hold of the bond creditors on the city treasury has been opposed by this influence. It certainly seems strange that we should be taxed in an exorbitant figure to hasten the payment of the bonded debt. It is claimed that $190,000 each year for the future will be in the interest and sinking fund raised by excessive license and other taxes. Now, it is evident that this desire to swell the interest and sinking fund is to secure money enough to prevent the overdue bonds from falling under the ban of Judge Hunt's decisions, which were affirmed by the Supreme Court. Under these rulings all bonds four years overdue will be barred by limitation; and there is no remedy to collect them, unless the interest and sinking fund is replenished to such an extent that there will be funds to pay them. In January next the first issue of bonds will be barred. Singular to relate, the bulk of the bonds held by the funded debt commission are of this issue. The amount standing out, however, is about $200,000. It certainly does look like somebody friendly or close to the commission is deeply interested in seeing that these bonds are not allowed to become barred. It may be claimed that we ought not to invoke such a defense, but we are justly entitled to assert this as a legal defense, and upon the moral question we should not have any conscientious scruples, in the light of the history of the infamous origin of the debt.

It would seem to any one who has the welfare of the city at heart, that it would be our interest to prevent excessive taxation, and accumulations in the interest and sinking fund for the purpose of defeating as much of the bonded debt as possible. But the converse of this proposition is the rule with those holding, or claiming to hold, the financial destiny of the city. We have often called attention to the fallacy of this funding system and its tendency to increase rather than diminish the value of the debt. We repeat, that from an obligation which was originally worth about $400,000, this scheme has caused us to pay over one million and a half, and the debt now remains nearly three times as great as it was at the time of the inauguration of the scheme. Now, in place of trying to get rid of those bonds, which might cease to be a legal, or even a moral obligation, it is proposed to enforce the last dollar to swell the fund which goes to redeem the bonds. Of course, if we tax ourselves $200,000 each year for this purpose, the obligation will soon be met. Another singular statement is made: It is claimed that by purchasing bonds due in 1893, for the face value, it will be equivalent to getting $1 72 for $1. There is no such thing as an obligation for interest until the time for its payment accrue. We might give our note for $1,000 to-day at 10 per cent. per annum, payable in ten years, and to-morrow pay it, and then say that we have made a hundred dollars. While it would be gratifying to take up as much of the debt as possible and thus prevent the running of interest, there is no occasion for this excessive taxation of our citizens, either for property taxes or for licenses.

It might be interesting to our fruit growers, in the light of the wonderful strides in horticulture and the higher art of agriculture, to call attention to the census returns showing the vast increase in the United States. It appears that there are in the United States 4,510 nurseries, valued at $41,978,835 80, and occupying 172,806 acres of land, with an invested capital of $52,425,669 51, and giving employment to 45,657 men, 2,279 women, and 14,200 animals, using in the propagation and cultivation of trees and plants $990,606 04 worth of implements. Of the acreage in nurseries 95,025.42 were found to be used in growing trees, plants, shrubs, and vines of all ages; and the figures, based upon the best estimate of the nurserymen, make the grand total of plants and trees 3,386,855,778, of which 518,016,612 are fruit trees, 685,603,396 grapevines and small fruits, and the balance nut, deciduous, and evergreen trees, hardy shrubs, and roses. The largest acreage is devoted to the production of apple trees, viz.; 20,232.75 acres, numbering 240,570,666 young trees, giving an average of 11,890 per acre, while the plum, pear, and peach have, respectively, 7,826.5, 6,854.25, and 3,357 acres, producing 88,494,367, 77,223,402, and 49,887,894 young trees, or an average of 11,307, 11,266, and 14,861 trees to the acre. Comparing this result with the origin of horticulture in this country we gather some very remarkable scraps of history. In fact this is the first time there has ever been any attempt to collect the facts relating to this branch of our industry and production. A memorandum in the records of the Massachusetts Company, March 16, 1629, says:

To provide to send for New England Vyne Planters, Stones of all sorts of fruites, as peaches, pears, plums, filberts, cherries, pear, apple, quince kernells, pomegranats; also, wheat, rye, barley, oates, woad, saffron, liquorice seed and madder rootes, potatoes, hop rootes, currant plants.

George Fenwick, of Saybrook, Connecticut, wrote on May 6, 1641, to Governor Winthrop, of Massachusetts:

I have receaved the trees yow sent me, for which I hartly thanke yow. If I had anything heare that could please yow, yow should frely command it. I am prettie well storred with cherrie & peach trees, & did hope I had had a good nurserie of aples, of the aples yow sent me last yeare, but the wormes haue in a manner destroyed them all as they came up. I pray informe me if yow know any way to prevent like mischiefe for the future.

March 5, 1665, John Mason, of Saybrook, Connecticut, wrote to Mrs. Elizabeth Winthrop:

Haue sent ten apple trees by Goodman Stolyon to yourselfe. I suppose they will most of them be planted in the north end of your orchard. I would haue sent more if I had thought there were a place to receive them. I haue alsoe sent Thomas Bayley thirty grafted trees as hee desired mee. They are in Goodman Stolyon's boate. I would entreat you to acquaint him with it. Hee told mee hee would put it to Mr. Winthrop's account. They come to thirty shillings.

Prince's nursery and botanic garden was established at Flushing, Long Island, about the middle of the last century by William Prince, and for more than 100 years was continued by his descendants. John Watson established a nursery near Charleston, South Carolina, about 1760, and a botanic garden was established there in 1786. In 1768 the Society for Promotion of Arts at New York awarded a premium of £10 to Thomas Young, of Oyster Bay, for the largest number of apple trees, the number being 27,123. In 1796 George Heusler, on the farm of Elias H. Derby, in the town of Danvers, Massachusetts, was offering trees for sale. In 1796 two brothers by the name of Vaughn established a nursery at Hallowell, Maine, and by importing and testing all the leading varieties of Europe, did much to advance the horticulture of Maine. Ephriam Goodale also started a nursery at Orrington, Maine, about 1800. Of the value of nurseries, California stands second, New York being first.

"I must have it in black and white;" that is, "I mean to say I want it written, that there can be no mistake." The superlative folly of man, that he did and does presume that his ideas can be perpetuated, and that his meaning will not be misunderstood! We are not so sure that the traditions that have been handed down by rote among unlettered peoples are equally as accurate as the history which among the more civilized is sought to be perpetuated in what we are pleased to call "recorded history." It has always been the human instinct to preserve a record of events in some shape enduring, and in large degree there has been an approach to certainty; yet time hath so changed the knowledge of man that that intelligible in one age doth become a sealed book in the succeeding ages. Among all peoples, primitively, the records were kept in the shape of hieroglyphics. They were engraven on the marbles of Egypt, upon the natural stones by the American aborigines, and in countries destitute of stone, like Chaldea, on artificial substance, as clay intermixed with reeds and indurated by fire. Of this substance, formed into square masses and covered with mystic characters, the walls and palaces of Babylon were in most part constructed; and in this day from its ruins bricks are dug that are as great a puzzle to antiquarians of learning as are the hieroglyphic characters of Egypt or the more rude work of the American Indian. In sacred history we do read that the Ten Commandments for "the government of men were engraven on tables of stone by the finger of God, and were delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai.

It did come that from hieroglyphics ideas were sought to be perpetuated by means of alphabetical characters, representative of primary or syllabic sounds. The origin of this art is not known positively. The Egyptians ascribed it to Thoth; the Greeks to the mythical Mercury or Cadmus, and the Scandinavians to the god Odin. Profitless it would be to discuss the origin of alphabetic or syllabic writing. Were the discussion pursued, it is not impossible the Chinese would outreach us in its antiquity. Upon our own continent, within the memory of men now living, there was an instance of the invention of an alphabet entirely original—that of the Cherokee language by Sequoyah, or George Guess. He was born about 1770 and died in 1843. About 1826 he invented a syllabic alphabet of the Cherokee language, and it is, perhaps, the most perfect ever devised for any language. Of him, in a letter written by an Indian agent to the Secretary of War concerning his invention, it was stated: "His name is Guess and he is a native and unlettered Cherokee. Like Cadmus, he has given to the people the alphabet of their language. It is composed of eighty-six characters, by which in a few days the older Indians, who had despaired of deriving an education by means of the schools, may read and correspond." In 1845 an Indian agent did write: "The Cherokees, who cannot speak English, acquire their own alphabet in twenty-four hours." Of Guess it is related he did regret he had made the invention, in that about its first use was in the publication of a Christian Bible, and he was opposed to that religious belief. From writing there did come printing; and of that we do say it is "the art preservative of all arts."

What folly is there in the expression "I must have it in black and white." There never has been, and will not be, more than an approach to certainty, either in writing or printing. Statutes carefully considered by congresses, legislatures and executives, when promulgated, are frequently found to express a meaning different from that which was manifestly intended. Legal documents, as very many know to their sorrow, do not, when the time for accounting comes, express the conclusion of the minds of the contracting parties; letters have shattered the ambitions of many a hopeful politician, shaken and destroyed the thrones of monarchs, embroiled nations into war, and, in more humble life, have wrecked happiness and lives. It is but human nature, when misfortune comes upon us we do desire to speak or write concerning it, in hope we will get sympathy; and many there are who have appreciated the sentiment of Job when he did say: "Oh, that my words were now written! oh, that they were printed in a book!" and feel, with him, when he reconsidered and did say: "Oh, that one would hear me! Behold, my desire is that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book."

It is a matter curious that neither pen nor types do express that which we intend to convey to the minds of those who read. Perhaps the book upon which the most care has been bestowed in its printing is the Bible, and we do find in history that in one edition Genesis III, 7, was rendered: "The eyes of them bothe were opened * * * and they sewed figge tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." This edition was printed in 1579. In an edition published in 1717, the heading to Luke, XX, was given as: "The parable of the vinegar," instead of "the vineyard." The famous "wicked Bible," printed in 1632, was so called because the word "not" was omitted in the seventh commandment, making it read: "Thou shalt commit adultery." We cite these instances as illustrative of errors that will inevitably be made where the greatest possible care is exercised, and where it would appear they would be inexcusable.

There is a system of writing that has come in use in comparatively modern times that is more uncertain, and yet of those who practice it, it would seem people generally expect absolute accuracy; it is shorthand. There recently arose, in the Fassler will case, tried in the Superior Court here, an instance of its uncertainty and of the importance that was attached to a simple stroke of a lead pencil. Through the courtesy of the Bee there has been furnished us an engraving which exactly reproduces the hand-writing of the shorthand reporter. The dotted lines represent the lines of writing. Mrs. Fassler had been assaulted by unknown parties at a late hour in the night, and received shocking and mortal injuries. She was conveyed to the house of a neighbor, and when information came to the authorities the Chief of Police, the District Attorney, the City Physician, the Court Reporter and other officers called upon her to obtain from her a statement that would lead if possible to the detection of the parties who had assaulted her. Mrs. Fassler was suffering extreme pain, and after relating the circumstances attending her injuries, and expressing the belief that she would surely die, said that she desired to settle her affairs, and stated what she desired to do with her property. Her statement was taken in shorthand, and after her death her will was contested upon the ground that by reason of her injuries her mind was in such condition that she was not a free agent, and would answer affirmatively to suggestive questions. She had devised the bulk of her property to a woman not related to her. In the line marked 1 in the accompanying engraving the question turns upon the meaning of the next-to-the-last character. The last stroke through the line stands for a period, and the character immediately preceding, the quarter circle stricken downward, if written light, as the first character on line 2, represents the letter "R;" if written heavy, as the second character on line 2, it represents "W." The character "R" may represent a variety of words; to illustrate: when written above the line it may be read "here," on the line, as written on line 2, "her;" through the line, or in the position of the second character on line 2, but written light, "our," and written below the line it is implied that any word it is meant to represent is preceded by the word "to," as "to hear," or "to her." The character "W," the last character on line 2, when written above the line, means "why;" on the line, "way," and through the line, as it appears on line 2, "away," and, of course, it may in its different positions represent any word in which "W" is the only consonant. The point turned upon the character we have indicated on line 1, and as to whether the question read: "Have you any other property you want to give her?" or, "Have you any other property you want to give away?" If it read "her" it would have directed her mind to a particular individual; if it read "away" it would have been general. On line 4 the shorthand sign, which means "tl," written as it there is, may mean "at all," or "until." Some years ago a confusion occurred over this little pencil mark regarding a question that was asked a witness in a murder case in this county. The shorthand writing is represented on line 3, and it can be rendered, "Did you see him at all yesterday?" or "Did you see him until yesterday?"—direct opposites. When these hairline distinctions are considered, and when there is regarded the liability of mishearing and the quickness with which a reporter is compelled to write, it is, indeed, wonderful that more errors are not committed.

The Descent of Man.

Man's brief and bootless journeyings adown this vale of tears Reminds me of the numerals we learned in childhood's years;

For—
He starts out filled with confidence, the race already 1—
At least to him it seems 2 he, though really scarce begun.
Wi(th) 3-sounding speech and daring deed he tries his name to score
In bolder, brighter blazoury than ever man be-4.
Yet soon, if 5 misjudged him not, nor estimate him wrong,
His world-6-soul reminds him that his life is not for long;
His 7-ly prospects seem to him in quite a shaky state,
And, as he ponders o'er his ways, he groweth less el8,
And satur-9 becomes; and sad, concludes his day is past,
Gives up his breath, and eke the ghost, and comes to 0 at last.

No, son, don't marry a widow. She is too calculating; and loving by arithmetic is not romantic. Love should not have any more sense than a bottle of soda water suddenly tapped. It should sizz and fuzz just like there wasn't anything else on earth.—Burdette.

The Stage.

(Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.)

The manager of the Theater Libre, in Paris, says that he will have no more Ibsen. He has discovered another dramatic genius in Spain.

A very poor actor having played the part of the ghost in Hamlet for many years, Saphir, the German wit, on seeing him, said: "It would be a good thing if this man gave up the ghost, so that somebody else could take his part."

Joseph Barber, a young man lately cashier in Lowe's Exchange, in London, fell in love with Beatrice Cameron while transacting business for her. He dared not tell his love to the lady, who never knew of it, but he became maudlin, lost his situation and has committed suicide.

In theatrical circles there is a revival of the rumor that the foreigner whom Marie Jansen, the soubrette, is about to wed is the Hon. Thomas Ochiltree, of Texas. Ochiltree saved Marie's life some years ago when that fascinating actress was bitten by a centipede at Galveston. He dosed her freely with Houston whisky, on the principle of similia similibus curantur.

There is a story told concerning the book-loving comedian, Augustin Daly, and the late duke of Manchester. Three years ago Mr. Daly was browsing in the duke's library and lovingly handling the almost priceless books. The duke saw the genuine appreciation he displayed, and when Mr. Daly heaved a sigh as he reluctantly laid back the volumes on the shelves, his grace generously begged him to accept an armful. In vain the actor protested; the duke persisted. And Mr. Augustin Daly possesses to-day a most remarkable two score or more of these books.

Fred Hallen says that the new play in which Hallen & Hart will appear next year will be a step up the ladder for them. "It is called The Idea," said he, "and is by Herbert Hall Winslow, with whom Mr. Hall is collaborating. I think this season will about finish farce-comedy. Companies are now going to pieces all over the country, and only those with a trademark like Evans & Hovey, Donnelly & Girard and Hallen & Hart are likely to pull through. The people are tiring of farce-comedy and want something better, and we are going to give it to them."

The Christmas-tree scene in W. J. Scanlan's new play, Mavourneen, was suggested by an incident which occurred several years ago. One Christmas, while Mr. Scanlan was playing in Brooklyn, he left the theater after the matinee to take a hurried dinner alone at a neighboring restaurant. It had just grown dark and the street lamps were lighted. Outside the stage entrance a little girl was leaning against a lamp post and crying bitterly. She was poorly clad and shivering with the cold. The picture was a touching one and attracted the attention of the young actor. He stopped and asked, "Why are you crying?" The answer came: "Oh give me a few pennies, please, sir. I want to buy something nice to take home to my mother and little brother." He questioned the child further and learned that her family was in distress and starving. Scanlan had two hours before it would be necessary for him to return to the theater, and he decided to spend them in bringing a little happiness to that household. He took the child to the nearest store, and, after filling a large basket with food, accompanied her home. He lost his own dinner, but had the pleasure of seeing three hungry people eat as they had probably never eaten before.

E. S. Willard, the great English actor, will probably be with us during the next season, in The Middleman. It is an English play, with all English sentiment and humor, but said to be strong, and is founded on a grand moral: "The high and mighty put down." The exemplification of this moral may be phrased in the grand text: "He hath put down the mighty from their seat, and hath exalted them of low degree." "Cyrus Blenkarn" is a potter of an inventive turn. "Joseph Chandler" is his employer. The employer grows rich on the labor and genius of his employe. One of the latter's two daughters is loved by and loves "Captain Chandler," "Joseph's" son. The captain is a deceiver, but one who means well. We cannot respect him over much, however, for he deserts his love. The story of shame by chance comes to "Cyrus'" ears. He asks "Joseph Chandler" to bring back his son, but he won't even try to. Then "Cyrus" begs heaven to give him riches that he may confound his wealthy employer and his rascally son. Riches come to him through the discovery of the secret of a certain "glaze" in making porcelain, and he finally actually takes the place and the very factories of his employer, "Joseph Chandler." But "Cyrus" is magnanimous in his triumph. Then the erring daughter, who was supposed to be dead, reappears; this time as the wife of "Captain Chandler," whom she has married abroad; and the play ends with a conventional binding up of hearts and general distribution of justice.

Book Chat.

In searching for a successor to Tennyson as Poet Laureate, Queen Victoria seems disposed to slight William Morris for the obscure verse-writer Lewis Morris. More's the pity.

Mr Gladstone is said to believe that Milton was first to sell a manuscript. With all the good done by the author of "Paradise Lost," it is hard to think of him as the original man with a poem for sale.

In a recent poem Ella Wheeler Wilcox speaks of the "wistful mouths of unknissed nuns." Will Ella kindly send the postoffice address of these ladies to the Discourager of Wistfulness, care of this office.

People who long for what they call "a truly American school of literature" might find comfort in considering that all works written in America have a distinctly American flavor, even though the writer may have been born in another land. The theology of the Mathers, for instance, and the poetry of Mrs. Anna Bradstreet were not English. The environment gives a tone alike in Europe or America, Australia or South Africa.

The knowledge, such as it is, which the well-known novelist "Ouda" possesses of English society was produced while acting as governess to the daughters of the Hon. Mrs. Herbert, of Muckross, at Dublin and in London. One of "Ouda's" principal patrons and friends—the one, indeed, to whom she is indebted more than to any one else for such social currency in Italy as she has managed to obtain—is Lady Paget, wife of the English ambassador at Vienna, who was for so many years ambassador at Rome.

